

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

If the noble Earl substituted "Board of Admiralty" for "Commissioners of Greenwich Hospital," there would be no objection to the last part of his Motion.

VISCOUNT PORTMAN said, that if the object of the noble Earl was to know the fact relative to the Duchy, and not to require a formal Return, he would give him the fact, and beg him to omit the Duchy of Cornwall from the Return. The noble Earl was verging on an inquiry into personal affairs—although he (Viscount Portman) must admit that the management of the Duchy was of public importance, inasmuch as good management averted requisition for public money, while a bad system, such as existed in former reigns, was a public evil. The fact, then, was that as to the advice given by the Council of the Duchy to the Prince of Wales as to contracting out of the Act; more than two-thirds of the Duchy estate was on lease, and therefore out of the Act. The remainder was held on agreement until the terms could be arranged for leases. The Council had advised to contract out of the Act where intermixed lands were in question, because in respect of these it was of great importance that they should be unfettered. Once under the control of the Act, no one could escape it; but while out of it any one might contract into it wholly or in part, at any time. It should not be forgotten that Parliament had so little confidence in the provisions of the Act that it directed all owners and occupiers to decide within a given time whether to accept or to decline to accept the scheme; and no one who was responsible to successors could fail to decline while the data for valuations under the Act were so imperfect that only now were experiments about to be made to enable honest valuers to form a calculation of the value of unexhausted manure. The Duke of Bedford, with the wonted liberality of his family, had placed land and money at the disposal of eminent men to try to form a basis for valuation; but he ventured to predict that the best we could hope for was a series of negative results. The House of Commons struck out of the Bill the only test of value which the noble Duke the President of the Council proposed—namely, the increased letting value of the farm. Parliament had put before them a scheme, and they must work it out patiently, always recollecting that science and practice were both required to guide them.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN agreed with the noble Viscount, rather than with the noble Duke, as to what had been said about the Duchy of Cornwall. He would amend his Motion in the way proposed.

Motion amended, and agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS (ENGLAND) ACT (1875).

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN moved, That there be laid before the House—a Return showing whether the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1875, have or have not been adopted upon the estates held by the Duchy of Cornwall, the Charity Commissioners, and the Commissioners of Greenwich Hospital.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he thought the noble Earl would see the propriety of amending the Return moved for by omitting the reference to the estates of the Duchy of Cornwall. It seemed to him that they had no more right to require a Return with reference to those estates than they had with reference to the private estates of any Member of that House. Therefore, he hoped his noble Friend would strike out that portion of his Motion. With regard to the Charity Commissioners, he had to say that they did not hold land, and, consequently, the portion of the noble Earl's Motion which referred to them was inapplicable. As to the Commissioners of Greenwich Hospital, they were abolished by an Act passed in the 28th and 29th of the Queen—a fact of which he had supposed the noble Earl would have been aware.

placed upon the words "public ceremonies and manifestations," and therefore I cannot say whether or not the "position of persons dissenting from the established religion will be prejudicially affected." But it is evident that under the law a considerable discretion will be left in the hands of the Executive, and I can assure my hon. Friend that Her Majesty's Government will not fail to use their exertions, in case they should be necessary, in favour of the cause of personal freedom.

INDIAN TARIFF ACT, 1875 — THE DESPATCHES.—QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he will have any objection to give, as an Unopposed Return, the Despatch in which Lord Northbrook replied to Lord Salisbury's Despatch of November 11th 1875 in reference to the Indian Tariff; and also the reply of Lord Salisbury to Lord Northbrook's Despatch, together with the opinions of any Members of the Council of the Secretary of State on that reply?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, the first Despatch referred to in the Question of the hon. Member had been distributed on Saturday morning. He should have no objection to lay on the Table the remaining Papers asked for.

THE IONIAN ISLANDS—TREATY OF 1864, ARTICLE 7—THE PUBLIC DEBT.—QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government have received from Her Majesty's Minister at Athens any intelligence as to the manner in which the Greek Government are carrying out the stipulations contained in Article 7 of the Treaty of the 29th day of March 1864 for the fulfilment by that Government of all Contracts entered into by the Ionian Islands when under British jurisdiction, and more especially with regard to the Public Debt of those Islands; and, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House any Correspondence with the Greek Government upon the subject?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, a correspondence upon this subject has been going on for some time with Her Majesty's Minister at Athens. Her Majesty's Government have now entered into communication with the other guaranteeing Powers with respect to it. There will be no objection to lay the correspondence before Parliament when it is concluded.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, On what day he proposes to move the Sessional Order which stood upon the paper of business on the 13th instant, and was then dropped by the adjournment of the House?

MR. DISRAELI: I regret that the adjourned debate on the Sessional Order became a dropped Order, but my hon. Friend must feel that at this period of the Session, and in the present state of Public Business, it is extremely difficult to make an arrangement such as he intimates, but I will bear it in mind. Perhaps the House will permit me to state now what I consider the most convenient order of the Business for the present week. I propose if the Education debate is finished, and no doubt it will be finished to-night, to proceed with the Report of the Poor Law (England) Bill. On Tuesday morning I propose to take the Report on the Commons Bill, and then go on with the Irish Jurors Bill. On Thursday we will take, if the House permits us, the second reading of the Prisons Bill; on Friday morning the Irish Judicature Committee; and on Monday we will take the Navy Estimates. It was my hope, certainly it was my intention, that Monday might be devoted to Scotch Business; but through the interposition of the perfervidum ingenium of Scotch Members we lost our chance of the Navy Estimates the other night, and therefore all I can say is that, proceeding with the Navy Estimates on Monday, I shall take the earliest opportunity practicable of devoting the public time to Scotch Business.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the University Bills were omitted from the measures mentioned. When were they to be taken?

MR. SERJEANT SIMON wished to know when the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill would be proceeded with?

Mr. Bourke

MR. DISRAELI: I confined my remarks, in the programme I laid before the House, to the Business of the coming week, and I will not venture to pursue the speculation further. As to the University Bills and the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill, they will, as soon as possible, occupy attention. Certainly they will not be neglected.

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT hoped the Prisons Bill would not be taken on Thursday. Next week the quarter sessions would be held, and he thought it would hardly be fair to proceed with the Bill before it received consideration throughout the country. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to name a later day.

MR. DISRAELI said, he would consider the point, and state to-morrow the course the Government would pursue.

ARMY—CAPTAIN ROBERTS, 94TH REGIMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS asked the Secretary of State for War, in relation to Captain Roberts of the 94th Regiment, On what day Captain Roberts was placed under arrest; on what day he received warning of a court martial for the 27th instant; on what day he was asked, as stated by the Right honourable gentleman, whether he desired to have the court martial appointed for an earlier date than the 27th; and, whether any time or opportunity was afforded him of consultation with his legal or other advisers before answering that question?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, it was on the 13th June that Captain Roberts received an intimation that the court martial on him would be held on the 27th, and at the same time he was asked if he would like an earlier date. He did not request any time in which to make a reply, but on the 15th instant he said he should not be ready before the 27th.

PERU—CASE OF THE "TALISMAN." QUESTION.

MR. GORST asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any further steps have been taken by Her Majesty's Government in reference to the case of the "Talisman?"

MR. BOURKE: This case, Sir, has not ceased to occupy the careful and anxious attention of Her Majesty's Government. I mentioned the other day to the House that after the sentence of banishment had been passed upon the captain and mate the captain had appealed against this sentence; that the mate was content to abide by the sentence; that Her Majesty's Minister at Lima was exerting himself to get the mate's case separated from the captain's, in order that the mate should not be prejudiced by the conduct of the captain. Since that we have been informed that the law of Peru will not allow the cases of the two prisoners to be separated, and the mate has been kept in prison as well as the captain. We have been further informed that all sentences of Courts of First Instance must be confirmed by a superior Court. Now, the superior Court has affirmed the sentence in this case; but besides the appeal of Haddock, the captain, an appeal has been made to the Supreme Court by the Attorney General of Peru, who is dissatisfied with the decision. On the 10th of last month the Secretary of State had an interview with Senor Galvez at the Foreign Office. My noble Friend then drew the Minister's attention to the painful sensation which had been caused in this country by the case of the Talisman. On the 7th of June, upon the receipt of further despatches from Mr. St. John, my noble Friend addressed a letter to Senor Galvez recapitulating what had occurred. The despatch of my noble Friend concludes thus—

"In these circumstances, Monsieur le Ministre, it becomes my duty to remonstrate in the strongest manner, as I now do, in the name of Her Majesty's Government, against the continued detention of King, who has signified his acquiescence in the sentence passed upon him; against the unreasonable protraction of the proceedings in the case, and against the unfriendly conduct of the Peruvian Government in the matter. I have the honour to request that you will be so good as to forward this remonstrance to your Government, and that you will recommend it to their very serious consideration. Her Majesty's Government have every wish to maintain friendly relations with the Government of Peru; but unless the case of these prisoners is brought to a speedy issue it will be impossible that those relations should continue."

To that despatch Senor Galvez, on the 13th of this month, sent a reply which goes over the old ground again, but adds nothing new in information, concluding thus—

“For these reasons, I doubt not for a moment that my Government will hasten to manifest its constant purpose to maintain friendly relations with your Excellency's Government, as there is neither motive nor feeling for an alteration of them. And I even hope that when all the circumstances connected with the case of the Talisman are finally considered it will be seen that the Peruvian Government, far from having acted with any want of friendliness towards Her Majesty's Government, has done all that was in its power to fulfil the obligations of friendship as well as of consideration which the British Government is entitled to.”

In these circumstances it appears to Her Majesty's Government that the continued detention of King, the mate, cannot be justified, and that it is their duty to request the Peruvian Government to give immediate orders for his release.

EGYPTIAN FINANCE—MR. CAVE'S REPORT.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked, When the Report would be laid on the Table? The Question was asked some time ago, and the Report was then promised, but nothing had since been heard of it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that when he made the statement referred to by the right hon. Gentleman, he was in hopes that the Papers would have been ready shortly after the Whitsun Recess. It appeared, however, that the translation of some of the Papers had required time. The right hon. Gentleman could understand that, under present circumstances, the Foreign Office was very much overworked, and that the Printers also were very much pressed, and this would account for the delay. He was every day expecting the Report; but his hon. Friend the Under Secretary would be better able to say when the Papers were likely to be ready than he was.

PARLIAMENT—ORDER—BALLOTING FOR MOTIONS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. ANDERSON said, he wished to call the attention of the Speaker to what he considered an irregularity on the part of two hon. Members in the proceedings on Friday, and in order to give hon. Members an opportunity of explaining their action, he would conclude with a Motion if necessary. Early in the Session it would be remembered that the Speaker's attention was called to the fact that Irish Members had succeeded, by a peculiar expedient, in appropriating most of the Wednesdays—namely, by putting down the names of several Members for each Bill they wanted to introduce. The Speaker declared that was an irregularity which, if persisted in, would make it necessary for the House to pass a Resolution on the subject, to the effect that no Member should be allowed to ballot without first putting his Notice of Motion on the Paper. He (Mr. Anderson) supposed that that rule applied equally to balloting for places on Tuesdays and Fridays. The hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Butler-Johnstone) and the hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham) were the two Members to whose conduct he wished to call attention. The hon. Member for Canterbury had had a Motion on the Paper for a long time on the subject of the Treaty of Paris; lately he balloted, and got the fourth place on the list for the 7th of July, so that his Motion had very little chance of coming on. Wishing to improve his position, he put his name on the ballot Paper on Friday, and balloted again. He was not successful, but the hon. Member for West Cumberland, who previously had no Notice whatever on the Papers of the House, was successful, and as a consequence the Resolution which formerly stood in the name of the former Gentleman for the 7th July now stood in the name of the latter for the 4th. He did not wish to allege that anything absolutely unfair had been done, for certainly each Member had a right to put his name on the balloting paper, but by exercising their right in this peculiar manner clearly these hon. Members had two chances of success, while other Members had only one, and therefore he wished to ask if this was regular; and, if it was not, whether the hon. Member for West Cumberland ought to be asked to resign the place he had gained by that expedient?

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM submitted, with all deference to the Speaker, that there had been in the case in question no violation either of the Rules or the Forms of the House. The facts of it were that nine or ten Members of the House—he hoped a greater number—took an interest in the Declaration of Paris, and wished to bring the subject on for discussion. It was to them, he might add, a matter of perfect indifference who brought it forward so long as it was brought on, although the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) seemed to have some confused sort of notion that he (Mr. Percy Wyndham) had inherited some advantage which properly belonged to his hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury. Such, however, was not the case; the only thing for which he was indebted to his hon. Friend being the drafting of the terms of the Resolution that was placed upon the Paper, the Motion itself being original.

MR. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE said, the fact was, that there was such a competition with respect to submitting to the House the question of the Declaration of Paris, that as soon as he had put down his name with that view five or six hon. Members came to him and said that they were anxious to bring it forward. His reply was, that he had been balloting unsuccessfully for some time, and that if they were willing to put down their names and come off better than he did, he should be only too glad. It was not right, he thought, that hon. Members should put down their names for a particular Motion, and then shift the onus of bringing it on on to somebody else's shoulders. But when, as in the present instance, several hon. Members were perfectly ready to get up a question, he could not see how the spirit of any of the Rules or Regulations of the House had been violated by what had been done. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Glasgow, he might add, seemed to know so little about the subject that he talked of the Treaty, instead of the Declaration of Paris. It was not at all that the Motion related to, but to the Declaration of Paris.

MR. RITCHIE thought that if the spirit of the Regulations of the House had been violated in the case of the Irish Members, to which the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) had alluded, it had also been broken in the present instance, and he contended that it would be highly detrimental to the due progress of Public Business if all those hon. Members who held similar views on any particular subject were to put down their names for the purpose of securing a better place for it on the list. When he raised the question in the early part of the Session, he did not make any special reference to the Irish Members, he simply desired to prevent the practice of which the hon. Member complained.

MR. NEWDEGATE, as one who had been a victim of the pre-occupation of the Order Book, wished to offer a few remarks on the matter under discussion——

MR. SPEAKER: I wish to point out that there is no Motion before the House. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) has addressed to me a question on a point of Order. The point is one which was brought under my notice at an early period of the Session, and I then stated my opinion upon it. It appeared to me then, as it appears to me now, that if two or more Members of the House, holding the same opinions on some specific Motion, combined together to ballot for precedence, with the view of giving undue precedence to that Motion, such a practice is an evasion of the Rules of the House. I think it right also to observe, as was stated by the hon. Gentleman who spoke last (Mr. Ritchie), that when this proceeding was brought under my notice at the early part of this Session no special reference was made to the conduct of hon. Members from Ireland, but the question was raised with respect to Members of the House generally. I then expressed a hope that, notice having been taken of the irregularity of the practice, it would be sufficient to prevent a repetition of it; but I regret to find from what has been stated that the practice has again been made use of.

MR. NEWDEGATE, who rose amid cries of "Order," said he thought the subject ought to be considered by a Committee of the House, for while such a thing might be done inadvertently, he believed that it had also been done designedly, and that he and other hon. Members had in consequence suffered. The remedy, in his opinion, was to require hon. Members when putting down their names to state the subject of their Notice. He would conclude by moving the Adjournment of the House.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY, in seconding the Motion, admitted that the practice to which reference had been made had undoubtedly originated with Irish Members, but contended that they had been driven to have recourse to it as a matter of self-defence. He was sure that there was no hon. Gentleman in the House who would not be unwilling to do anything against the spirit of the Rules; but the remedy proposed by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Newdegate) would not meet the difficulties of the case, for nothing would be easier than to alter slightly the terms of any Motion which was about to be brought forward, and, unless greater facilities were given to private Members, expedients such as that under discussion must be resorted to, or the business of that part of the United Kingdom which he and those around him represented must come to a standstill. If it had not been for the course they had taken, subjects which were of vital importance to Irishmen would not have been brought under the notice of the House, as the systematic policy of the Government appeared to be to put off Irish business till as late an hour of the morning as possible. He, for one, was glad to find that there were some 59 Irish Members greatly interested in that business, who, instead of trying to deal with it as in former Sessions at 2 o'clock in the morning, had at last hit upon a mode of bringing it forward at a reasonable time, and he was not surprised that other hon. Members had taken a leaf out of their book.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Newdegate.)

MR. ANDERSON said, the second part of his question—whether the Motion ought not to be withdrawn from the position it now occupied—had not been answered.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL.

(Viscount Sandon, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Cross.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [15th June], "That the Bill be now read a second time;" and which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words

Mr. Mitchell Henry

"in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the recommendations contained in the recent Report of the Factory and Workshops Acts Commission, relating to the enforcement of the attendance of children at school, should be introduced in any measure for improving the elementary education of the people,"—(Mr. Mundella,)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. KAY - SHUTTLEWORTH: The first feeling of Members who supported my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster) six years ago in passing the Education Act must be one of strong satisfaction at the advance in public opinion, and in the readiness of the country for general education, which the introduction of the present Bill and the manner in which it has been received by the House indicate. A new principle tentatively proposed in 1870 can now be more or less boldly carried forward; and the debate shows that the House with few exceptions does not shrink from the plain and simple duty of filling our schools and making national education a reality. The differences between us are only as to the precise mode in which that should be done; how, having schools, we can get the children to attend them; how, having teachers, we can provide them with scholars; how, having a law of education, we can enforce it. In 1870 our first anxiety was not with respect to the question of attendance. It had reference to the provision of adequate school accommodation, sufficient teachers, and an efficient quality of instruction. In the year 1870 school accommodation existed for only 1,878,584 children, whereas in 1875 there was accommodation for 3,146,424 children. The number of teachers was 12,467 in 1870, and 20,940 in 1875. In the same period the number of assistant teachers had increased from 1,262 to 2,713; and the number of pupil teachers from 14,304 to 29,667. With respect to the efficient quality of the education I rejoice to think that it has been improved by recent changes in the Code of the Education Department; but with regard to the standard attained by the children I fear I can say very little. Our main anxiety now is to secure the attendance of children who do not attend school, the regular attendance of those children who attend irregularly, and the attendance throughout the school age of those who now only attend one, two, three, or four years. Since the year 1870 no less a sum than £1,606,298 has been expended on new voluntary schools and enlargements. Moreover, in August, 1875, there were 1,136 board schools; £1,500,000 has been spent by the London School Board on such buildings, while £2,750,000 has been so spent by school boards generally. Some of these board schools, including those in London, may no doubt be filled by the action of the compulsory bye-laws under the powers of the Act of 1870; but the other schools throughout the country remain very thinly attended. The average attendance in 1870 was very low, only 1,152,389; being out of all proportion to the accommodation, which was for 1,878,584 children. The school accommodation has increased 67 per cent; the teaching staff 90 per cent and more; but the increase in the average attendance has been less than 60 per cent. These figures show that partial compulsion in less than half the country is not enough. The average daily number of empty seats in 1870 was 726,195, and in 1875 it was 1,309,244. Although there has been an increase of 67 per cent in the school accommodation, the number of empty seats has nearly doubled. The question we have to solve is, how are we to fill these empty seats? How are we to supply the teachers with scholars, and to secure that the money which has been thus spent on school-building shall not be wasted but that it shall be really reproductive? The figures I have given clearly show, I think, that a Bill was necessary; and hence the Bill of the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council on Education. The Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) seems to me to do good service by placing in contrast with this Bill the proposals of the Royal Commission which was appointed by Her Majesty to inquire into the working of the Factory and Workshops Acts, the extension of any of their provisions to other trades, industries, and occupations, and the question of further provisions for improving the education of children. In considering these proposals I shall ask the House to inquire for a moment what are the conditions which a Bill on this subject ought to fulfil. I say that, in the first place, it should be simple and clear, so that all the parents in the country may know what the law is. It should be equal in its operation in different districts, and equal also in the manner in which it weighs on children employed in different trades. Again, it should not give a freedom to the idle that is denied to workers, nor should it impose on one trade an obligation from which another trade is capriciously left free. It should be just to the employer, just to the parent, and, above all, it should be effective for its main purpose—the lasting benefit of all our children. There is also another principle which a Bill on this subject should now fulfil. While not centralizing administration, Parliament should, I think, boldly and completely take upon itself the whole work of legislation, and should not delegate it in any manner to local authorities. I will now ask the House to let me analyze the Bill—pointing out what it does and what it does not do. First of all it prohibits the employment of children under the age of 10; and it likewise prohibits the employment of all children over 10 who have not obtained a certain educational certificate. It repeals the Agricultural Children Act, which—in a manner however imperfect—provided that children employed between the ages of 11 and 13 should attend school 300 times between the ages of 10 and 12. What measures, then, does this Bill take to secure attendance, and thus to insure a less wretched standard of attainments, to save expenditure on schools from waste, and to fill the 1,300,000 empty seats in our schools? It takes no simple direct measure for this purpose. Let me here remind the House what we did in the Scotch Act but three years ago. It was enacted that—

“It shall be the duty of every parent to provide elementary education in reading, writing, and arithmetic for his children between 5 and 13,” and that, “it shall be the duty of every school board to appoint an officer to ascertain and report what parents have failed to perform the duty.”

The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Birley) says that parental responsibility is secured by this measure. Yes; but where? There is “parental responsibility” in the Preamble, but you will not find it in any of the clauses. There is nothing in the clauses declaring that it is the duty of a parent to send his children to school. I hope, therefore, that in Committee the House will adopt the Amendment of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster). I was glad to hear my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester say he was prepared to accept that Amendment; and I hope that when he said that he expressed the views of many Gentlemen opposite, who, I am willing to say, are quite as earnest as Members on this side in their desire to secure the attendance of children at school. What are the wants of the parents on this subject? I think a parent wants the same advantages for his child as for a Scotch child. Moreover, he requires that the law in the next parish should be the same as in his own parish. He does not want the law to press more hardly on the trade in which his child is employed than it presses on the trades in which his neighbour's children are employed. He wants as strict a law for the idle as for the working children. I think the parent may fairly say to us also—"Do not tell me in 1881 when my five year old child becomes 10 that he must not work because he has no certificate, unless meanwhile you plainly say to me, 'you must send him to school.'" I believe that all these demands of the parent ought to be carefully considered in legislating on this subject. I will separate the children into two sets—the children who are prevented by the Bill from working and the children who are at work. What does the Bill do to secure that either set shall attend school? I might almost say it does nothing at all. Work is prohibited at the age of 10, unless a child has obtained a certificate. Now what is there in the Bill to insure that the child shall obtain a certificate or that the child shall not consequently be kept idle till 14, neither at work nor at school? The 7th and 8th clauses of the Bill apply only to children whom the noble Lord called "wastrels"—a word with which Members from the North of England are perfectly familiar. I do not propose to include these clauses in my analysis, as they only apply to cases of vagrancy or crime, or of continuous and habitual, as well as inexcusable neglect on the part of parents. I look upon the case of the "wastrel" children as an entirely exceptional case, and the mode of dealing with these children proposed by the noble Lord—where there has been continuous, habitual, and inexcusable neglect by parents—shows that he himself views their case as exceptional. So far, then, we have nothing but these permissive bye-laws. Indeed, I think this Bill in its permissiveness outdoes the efforts of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson). It is more permissive than the Permissive Bill. The hon. Member for North Northumberland (Mr. M. W. Ridley) says that where there are rural school boards those school boards do not pass bye-laws. Well, this may be true in many cases; but surely that is the strongest argument which the hon. Member could have adduced against permissive bye-laws, and in favour of our doing in this House what we are proposing to delegate to local authorities. It is the strongest argument against our leaving any option to local authorities. The Bill, therefore, only provides for direct compulsion by bye-laws, that is, for bye-laws in places where school boards choose to adopt them, in places where Town Councils choose to pass them, and in places where Boards of Guardians are requested by a meeting of the ratepayers of a parish to pass them for that parish. I am not surprised that hon. Members opposite admit that there is little or no direct compulsion in this Bill. During this debate attention has not been directed to sub-section 2 of Clause 20. It appears from this sub-section not only that Boards of Guardians are not to adopt compulsory bye-laws unless the ratepayers ask them to do so, but the Guardians are to adopt such sort of bye-laws as the ratepayers like to ask them to adopt. Ratepayers may say what kind of bye-laws they desire, and Boards of Guardians are to have regard to such wish. For example, the ratepayers may wish that the bye-laws should not touch children engaged in labour, or engaged in some particular kind of labour, or should not affect children above the age of 10; or they may wish that children should be allowed to be employed at home at any age, or that children who have passed a very low standard should be exempt from the operation of the bye-laws. In the same Union, therefore, there may be districts with effective bye-laws, other districts with half-

hearted and ineffective bye-laws, and districts with no bye-laws at all. You may have visitors in one parish and no visitors in the next parish. Children engaged in a particular trade in one parish may escape all compulsion whatever, while in the next parish this trade may be under the influence of strict bye-laws. You will have stringent bye-laws here, no bye-laws there, and weak and useless bye-laws elsewhere. I do not think that any one fairly considering this subject can deny the injustice to children under 10 years of age which such a diversity in law would produce in different districts of the country, more especially in districts of the same county and even of the same Union. Take the case of a child who is uneducated in a parish where the ratepayers ask for no bye-laws, and who at the age of 10 goes to a town, as is often the case. I happen to live in a manufacturing district, in which, however, there are large tracts of country given over to agriculture. In one parish there may be no manufactures at all, while other parishes teem with factories. In this district there is one school board, and plenty of parishes that would be under the Board of Guardians. Take the case of a child uneducated in one of these rural parishes who, at the age of 10, is taken by his parents to Burnley to be employed in a factory. Having no certificate, that child will not be allowed to be employed; and, fortunately, in Burnley he will come under bye-laws which will oblige the parent to send the child to school. But suppose that, instead of going to Burnley, he goes to one of the little towns, of which there are plenty in the district, which are not in a school board district, and in which there are no bye-laws. At the age of 10 this child will neither be allowed to work, because of the general law, nor will he be sent to school, because of the absence of bye-laws. Such a state of things will involve the grossest injustice not only to the child, but to the parent. It will be unjust also to the employer; and being unjust to employers, it will be injurious to the country. I think I have pointed out strongly the effect of the permissive nature of the bye-laws as regards children under 10. Passing now to another point, I feel that we cannot dwell too often on the injustice to parents of saying to them, when a child is 10 years old—"Your child shall not work; he has no certificate," if you have not before said—"Your child shall go to school, so that he may obtain his labour pass." This system of endeavouring to secure education before work by requiring certificates at a certain age as a condition of work, has been tried and found wanting. There was such a provision in the Coal Mines Act. The evidence laid before the House showed that the Act failed to secure the education of the boys engaged in coal mines, and one main reason why it was a failure was because of this illusory requirement. The same attempt was made unsuccessfully in the Agricultural Children Act. The system is condemned by Mr. Tufnell, who was one of the Commissioners appointed to inquire in 1869 into the subject of the employment of women and children in agriculture. I will read the condemnation of this system of certificates by the Royal Commissioners on the Factory and Workshops Acts. They say, speaking of the system as developed in the Agricultural Children Act—

"There is the inherent defect in its principle, if it stands alone, that it presumes a degree of forethought in a parent which is not to be expected from the parents of working children. A parent must foresee, 12 months beforehand, that his child will require the certificate of attendance, must keep it in view throughout the year, must count the number of times he plays truant, in order to be sure that the minimum of attendances required by law shall be made up, and must have faith that the watchfulness of Government will be sufficiently all-pervading to prevent him from finally escaping its requirements.

I beg the House to attend to these concluding words of the Commissioners—

"Without affirming that such a provision will always be impossible to enforce, we think it may be laid down that, by itself, it will combine the minimum of efficiency with a great deal of hardship."

Now, the Bill goes farther than the Act which was thus so strongly condemned by Royal Commissioners. That Act required 12 months of foresight on the part of parents. This Bill presumes at least five years of forethought on the part either of parents or of ratepayers. Now, having the Reports of Royal Commissions, and abundant evidence in the Library, and representing in this matter the whole country, why should not Parliament exercise this forethought? Sir, there is one question which has not yet been asked during this debate, and which

I wish to put to the Government. I hope we shall have some reply to the question — Who is to grant these certificates? The Bill says that the Education Department is from time to time to make regulations for the purpose. But I am not satisfied with this provision, and think the House should have some further information. We have strong evidence—and, if it were necessary, I could cite the opinion of Mr. Kennedy, Her Majesty's senior Inspector of Schools—to show that it would be very objectionable if schoolmasters were allowed to grant these certificates; that it would expose them to strong temptations and leave a loophole for all sorts of abuses. I cannot, then, believe that the power to grant certificates will be entrusted to schoolmasters. By whom, then, will it be exercised? It is very desirable that we should receive an answer to this question before the second reading of the Bill. The Bill leaves the law as to children whom it will prevent from working in a state which is unjust to children, unjust to parents, unjust also to employers, ineffective for purposes of general education, unequal, and illogical. I come now to the question—What means does the Bill take or contemplate to secure schooling for those children above 10 and under 14 whom the law allows to work? The agencies upon which the Bill relies for this purpose are scarcely greater, and in one respect are less than those now existing. In one respect they will be less—namely, by the repeal of the Agricultural Children Act. The Bill relies entirely upon the Factory Acts, permissive bye-laws, and Clauses 7 and 8. I will take these in the reverse order. (1) Clauses 7 and 8 may be left entirely out of consideration, for their application is limited to vagrants and criminals, or to cases of continuous and habitual and inexcusable neglect on the part of parents. (2) All that I have said respecting bye-laws applicable to children who are prevented by the Bill from working, applies equally to these bye-laws as regards children during work. But there is another objection to this system of permissive bye-laws, and that is the objection to our delegating legislative as distinguished from administrative functions to local authorities. I hold that objection in a very strong degree; but it has also been held by authorities who, I think, will be respected by Her Majesty's Government. I am glad to see the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) in his place, for, if the House will allow me to do so, I wish to make a quotation to which I am sure the House will listen with pleasure—as it does to everything said by the right hon. Gentleman—from a speech made by him in Committee upon the Education Bill of 1870—

“ Was their experience of permissive legislation so favourable that they thought it due to the credit of the House to delegate their functions to others upon a point so important, and to call upon school boards to enact something which they were not prepared to enact themselves—not to pass bye-laws to carry out in detail that which the Legislature had indicated, but to perform the work of legislation itself? Was that a power to place in the hands of school boards? What would happen? If it were true that the great mass of intelligent working men, who would have votes, were in favour of compulsion, then, where they were in the majority, school boards would be elected to put in force the compulsory powers of the Bill; but, on the other hand, in places where compulsion was most needed, and where there was less enlightenment among the working classes, the school boards would be elected upon a solemn pledge not to exercise their compulsory powers. He held that it was not becoming the dignity of the Legislature to delegate its authority upon a question of such importance. If the Committee meant to have direct compulsion, let them enact it . . .” [3 Hansard, ccii. 1749.]

I leave the right hon. Gentleman to answer himself; I think he will find it exceedingly difficult, because those statements are so logical, that I do not believe any Member in this House could answer them. The right hon. Gentleman will say, no doubt, that we had permissive provisions in the Bill of 1870. But that Act was an experiment, and the country at that time was not prepared for compulsory attendance at schools. But now we are in 1876, and can it be said that we are not prepared to attempt it? Well, then, if we are prepared, let us introduce compulsory attendance into our law, and not leave it to the local authorities, who will have plenty of things to bicker about, plenty of things to contend about, without this fruitful source of contention. The Bill continues to rely mainly on the Labour Acts to secure the attendance of working children at school. But the present working of the Factory and Workshops Acts with their various and conflicting regulations for different kinds of labour is highly unsatisfactory. I will not use my own language in condemnation of it, but I will quote the language of a high authority, and when I finish the quotation I will state whose language it is—

“Did those Acts give sufficient security that the children of this country went to school? . . . They gave the impression of general confusion, general inconvenience, and very inadequate results. . . . Again, between the different kinds of labour—that of textile factories, of workshops, and of mines—they had constant conflict and confusion, the employers frequently complaining of the injury inflicted on their various industries by the inequalities as to age and other matters; while for the parents nothing could be more vexatious than to find that on a change of their abode they were brought under different rules. Why should a parent in choosing a particular industry for the employment of his child be hampered by having to calculate how far his choice would be affected by these conflicting rules? What they wanted in these matters was simplicity and uniformity of arrangement.”

These most important words were the words of a Member of the Government, the words of the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council in introducing the Bill. I want to ask the noble Lord where in this Bill are the provisions to remedy the confusion of which he complains? I want to know what has been done in this Bill to remedy the defective state of the Factory Acts? Then there is another point which ought to be cleared up in this Bill, and that is whether the bye-laws of the school board, if more stringent than the rules of the Factory Acts or of the Workshops Act with respect to the labour and employment of children, are to override them or not? There appears to be a complete conflict of opinion on this subject. Mr. Cumin, Assistant Secretary of the Education Department, in his evidence before the Commission, and Mr. North Buxton, of the London School Board, maintain that the school boards' bye-laws do override the Factory Acts. The contrary is maintained by Mr. Chamberlain, Mayor of Birmingham. Why is this point not made quite clear by the Bill? I may illustrate the state of the Labour Acts by reference to the well-known and now notorious Workshops Act of 1867, which is either a dead letter, or only means 10 hours' schooling a week—that is, two hours a-day for five days. Mr. Kennedy, the senior Inspector, speaks unfavourably of the educational requirements of the Act, and of the insufficiency of the enforcing body. He says the Workshops Act was a nullity when first begun, being left to the local authorities to carry out, that the enforcing authority is still very insufficient, and that there is no hope of efficient education for children under this Act. Mr. Redgrave, the Factory Inspector, speaking of the Workshops Act, says—

“There are very few places, indeed, where the children attend school for half-time;” and he adds, “It is painful to us to be obliged to administer the Act, because we have to be very strict and to require attendance at school when we know that it is next to valueless. It is the constant habit of parents, under the Workshops Act, the school hours being say from 9 to 12, to send their children in from 10 to 12, or from 9 to 11. The whole object is to get some certificate.”

And so on. I will not weary the House by reading the whole of the evidence; I will merely say it is a complete condemnation of the Workshops Act. And so also under the Mines Act 20 hours' schooling a fortnight is all that is required. Moreover, the Factory Inspectors have over and over again pointed out that they are not the right persons to look into the efficiency of schools. In my opinion, an opinion supported by the Report of the Factory and Workshops Commission, attendance under the Factory Acts should be at schools recognized as efficient by the Education Department. That principle was recognized in the Factory Act of the Home Secretary passed two years ago, and why the same provision should not be applied to other industries I cannot imagine. On this point I will quote a few words from the evidence of Mr. Cumin—

“1631. One inconvenience which has arisen is that most inconvenient of all things—a conflict between the Factory Inspector and our Inspector. The Factory Inspector sometimes insists that a school is efficient, and we say it is not. Then we order a school board on the ground of deficiency, and after the school board is up the children continue to go to what we call an inefficient school, but what the Inspector of Factories calls an efficient school. Then the rate-payers are compelled to build a school, and they say—‘It is very hard we are made to build a school because you say the school is inefficient, and the Factory Inspector says it is efficient, so that our new school is of no use.’ In this case there is a direct and mischievous conflict.”

“1634. You would extend the provisions of last year's Act to the case of all factories?—Yes; when we ask about it we are told that nothing but the grossest inefficiency can authorize a Factory Inspector to declare a school inefficient.”

I need not point out how improper and unfair it is to the parents to compel the child to go to school if you do not take security that the school is efficient. Four arguments are given by the Royal Commissioners against proceeding by the way of indirect compulsion, and in support of the view that direct compulsion is necessary:—First, that stricter provisions will lead to more frequent evasion; secondly, that the obligation of school attendance should not be a tax on the energies of working children only, and on those working children only whose occupation has for other reasons been selected for regulation as to hours of work; thirdly, that it is an anomaly that a child thrown out of work is released from obligation to go to school at the very time when school attendance could be exacted with the least hardship. And their fourth argument is that children too young to work are not touched by indirect compulsion, though in this case compulsory attendance is most required, can be most easily enforced, and would cause the smallest loss to parents. The principles the Commissioners lay down are strengthened by a consideration to which I hope the House will give its attention, that half-time schooling should be regarded as a privilege for the working child, and not as a special burden. The Royal Commission point out the disadvantage, amounting to a confusion of thought and an error of principle, of leaving the administration of a half-time system of school attendance to the Factory Acts, instead of making it part of our Education Acts. The law with respect to parents and employers should be in complete harmony; and half-time schooling—in place of full-time—should be conceded under the Education Acts to those parents whose children are beneficially at work, and should be enforced by Factory Acts on the employer. But at present, under the Factory Acts, the child is subject to the exceptional obligation, as an operative or labouring person, of having to attend school half-time as a condition of being allowed to work. On that subject I will only refer hon. Members to the very strong arguments most forcibly put, but which are too long to read to the House, which will be found in Paragraph 146 of the Report of the Commission. And now I come back to Clause 4, and the two good steps which the Bill proposes to take. The Bill has two good points, but I fear that they are only good at first sight, being weak, and even objectionable, standing alone. The first is no employment before 10, the second no employment without educational certificate between 10 and 14. As to the first point, is there any hope that a Board of Guardians will enforce non-employment of children under 10 years of age in a parish which does not ask for, and which has not, bye-laws? I do not think they will have the courage to enforce it, when they have no law for compelling attendance at school. As to the second point, the non-employment of children after they are 10 without an educational certificate, I think it would be much better if there were any prospect that, when 1881 comes, and also when the earlier times provided for in 1878, 1879, and 1880 arrive, with their temporary modifications, it will be possible to enforce this provision. I fear it cannot be done, because you do not take sufficient security that the children will go to school in the meantime. I desire now briefly to summarize what the Bill does not do. I leave the case of the "wastrels" out of account. First, the Bill takes no direct means to enforce attendance except where school boards and Town Councils pass bye-laws, or where the ratepayers by requisition cause Boards of Guardians to frame bye-laws. Secondly, the Bill does not assert or declare parental duty, and thus enact as a law that children shall attend school, as is done in the Scotch Act. Thirdly, it does not make any provision whatever—other than permissive bye-laws—for education, either before 10, except the requirement of the certificate as a condition of employment after 10; or after 10, except the present half-time regulations of the numerous and conflicting Factory Acts and of the very defective Workshops Act. Fourthly, it neither touches, nor extends, nor improves, the existing half-time legislation, nor does it base it on educational principles as recommended by the Royal Commissioners. Still leaving the "wastrels" out of the question, in the fifth place, under the Bill, in districts where there are no bye-laws, there will be no compulsory education before 10; only the certificate required at 10; no compulsory education after 10, or during work, except under the Half-time Acts; and no one but an authority that passes no bye-laws to enforce Clause 4. Sixthly, in districts where there will be rural ratepayers' bye-laws, the bye-laws will be weak in themselves, and, what is more, will be weakly administered. I am unwilling to apply hard words to the measure, but if the Bill passes in its present form it will be an Act to prohibit labour and to permit education. It will be a compulsory Bill which does not compel; and I am afraid it will be an Education Act which will not educate. Parents, employers, and children may well say—"Do not prohibit labour, unless you compel education: do not compel here, unless you compel there." I may be asked this question, whether I think the Bill can be made a good and useful measure in Committee, and whether, therefore, I can support the Bill at all. I am glad to be able to answer these questions in the affirmative. We must, however, criticise its provisions: we must advocate such additions as will complete it: we must endeavour to graft upon it the recommendations of the Royal Commission. If the Government proposals are, as we are told, such as the country will approve, then the logical corollaries of those proposals are also such as the country will approve. I will mention briefly to the House what the recommendations of the Royal Commission are, as the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter), seemed not to know them the other night. They are these: The school attendance of all children, whether they are at work or not, should be enforced by law, subject to the three exceptions in Section 74 of the Education Act of 1870; the regular school age should be from 5 to 13; the rule of attendance should be full time, or five hours daily and 25 hours weekly; it should be conceded as a privilege that the attendance should be only half-time in cases of children beneficially and necessarily employed. The attendance should be at a school recognized as efficient by the Education Department; no child under 10 should be allowed to begin attending half-time, and no child under 10 should be employed in regulated labour; there should be an alternate day system in certain trades, on account of distance or dirty occupation; and the attendance of children employed in agriculture should be during part of the year not less than six months. I might quote to the House the opinions of the Assistant Commissioners under the Commission that inquired seven years ago into the condition of women and children employed in agriculture to show that you can reasonably require some sort of half-time attendance from children employed in agriculture. Here are great authorities on the agricultural districts who, as early as 1869 said that you could exact a certain amount of school attendance there. Mr. Henley recommended 150 attendances in the winter months. An hon. Member, whom we are all sorry not to see here, the Secretary to the Board of Trade (Mr. E. Stanhope), then an Assistant Commissioner, says you could require 100 days of schooling in each year up to 12 or 13—that is 200 attendances; and that this would deprive the families of very little money, and hardly interfere with the days required for the farm. Then I might refer to the experience of Mr. Paget, who for a long time carried out the half-time system in agricultural work. The hon. Member for North Northumberland (Mr. Ridley) spoke as if nothing of this kind was required in this country. Let me quote from Mr. Tufnell, the Agricultural Commissioner, who says that if all other places in England were like Northumberland, the Commission would have been useless. Therefore we must not take the opinion of the hon. Member for North Northumberland on this matter of the state of the agricultural districts generally, because if all the rest of England were like his county, there might be little or no necessity for compulsion. There is a point which I would here suggest—namely, that where local boards exist would it not be better to make them the local authority rather than the Board of Guardians? In my own neighbouring town there is a local board, and the ratepayers would regard them as more fitting persons to carry out this law than the Board of Guardians sitting in another town some distance off. I merely throw out that for consideration. Then the proposal to enable local authorities to delegate to committees of unknown persons the powers of compulsion and of spending rates is very objectionable. I cannot see how you could delegate to a committee under this Bill, which might not be composed of Guardians at all, the powers of applying compulsion and of spending the rates. It may be possible, perhaps, to make some arrangement by which the majority of the committee or its quorum should always consist of Guardians. Let me also call attention to the requirement of 250 attendances at school in each year. This seems to be regarded by the Government in this Bill as a full-time attendance at school, and they have taken it from the Education Code, which declares that to be the minimum number of attendances qualifying a child to be examined at the time of the annual inspection. But the school must meet—according to the Code—at least 400 times in the year; and the grant is given on the average attendance at those 400, or more than 400, meetings; how, therefore, could 250 attendances on the part of the child be regarded as sufficient? The Commission recommend that for half-time 220 attendances of the child at school should be required, or 110 days in all. Full-time, therefore, should be about 400 attendances. The Secretary of the Board of Trade, when an Agricultural Commissioner, proposed that 200 attendances should be the number required for half-time in agriculture. I hope that the Government will muster courage to insist on at least something stronger than merely 250 attendances. We are told that this Bill is opposed by a large number of Nonconformists. There is nothing more easy than to oppose a weak, half-hearted, and inefficient Bill of this kind. But I venture to assert that if a really bold measure—a measure which would give to the country universal education—were proposed, it would be very difficult for the Nonconformists, patriotic men as they are, to resist it, and to put their grievance in its way. It is much more difficult for the Government to pass a feeble and an inefficient Bill than to carry through a really strong and bold one. I do not know whether many Members of this House are accustomed to play at the old-fashioned game of chess; but they may often see in the papers chess problems that are to be solved by three or four moves. This is a great chess problem; and the problem of making the children attend school might be solved in three or four moves. But if you take a wrong move, it will require a great many more. I am afraid that my noble Friend (Viscount Sandon) is not now taking the right move. Instead of advancing a queen to the point of attack he is advancing a pawn; and in place of solving the problem in three or four moves, I am afraid that at his rate of progress he will have to take many, and that he will have to retrace his false steps and then to take the right ones. I hope he will review his position and decide to adopt the bold course at first, by accepting the Amendments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster), and those of the noble Lord near him (Lord Frederick Cavendish), and embodying them in the Bill in Committee. Then we may this year pass a measure that will really advance the object which we all have at heart—namely, that of bringing into school the 1,300,000 children who ought to be at school, and for whom there is room, and thus rendering the money which has been so freely spent truly beneficial to the country.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth) had referred to the game of chess. He (Mr. Hardy) did not profess to have any special skill in that game, but he had always understood that skilful players employed their pawns before bringing their queen to the front, lest by bringing out the queen too soon, the game might be imperilled. The hon. Member proposed that the Government should play his game—a proceeding to which they entirely objected. They were playing their own game, and not that of the hon. Gentleman, and they believed that by the course they had adopted they should win the verdict of the country, while at the same time they satisfied its expectations. The hon. Gentleman had shown great inconsistency; for after dissecting the Bill with the skill of a vivisector, he had come to the conclusion that he could not oppose the measure, but he wished to see it brought more into conformity with his views. He thought the hon. Gentleman, without knowing it, had made a covert attack on the existing system, for almost all his arguments against it would equally apply to the existing law, which, to a great extent, had proved successful. The hon. Gentleman had told them there were only two good points in the Bill, and they were so weak and objectionable that it was not thought they could ever answer. He (Mr. Hardy), however, would turn to a great educationist, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh, who said he saw in the measure a sincere attempt to deal with a great question. He said that by the ordinary action of the Bill a large step would be taken towards increasing the number of attendances, though he felt that more was necessary to bring the whole of the children into school. Complaint was made of the silence of the Government by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), who undertook to direct the Government as to the time when they ought to interfere in the debate. He was as ready to interfere then as now; but what was the course of the debate? It was not a debate directed against the principle of the Bill, nor against the Bill itself. It was a debate of criticism. His noble Friend (Viscount Sandon) had introduced the measure in a long and able speech. Everything connected with the Bill was before the House. Members rose one after another. The hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), who took certain objections to the Bill, was followed by the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Evelyn Ashley), who, if he might use the expression, "said ditto" to the hon. Member for Sheffield. But he did say that what he wanted to fix was parental responsibility, and that had been repeated that evening, and indeed it had proved the cry of almost all the speakers upon the Bill. He thought, however, he could show there was abundance of parental responsibility in the Bill. But it must be remembered that the speeches of partial objectors to the Bill were met by speakers on the other side. There were the hon. Members for North Northumberland (Mr. Ridley), Manchester (Mr. Birley), Leicestershire, and Exeter (Mr. Mills), and, last but not least, for Berkshire (Mr. Walter), who in the most manly way stated his opinions, and made a speech calculated to do the greatest good—he did not say to the Bill, but to the cause of education in the country. The hon. Member for Sheffield told them that they were bound to take the recommendations of the Factories Commission as the basis of the Bill. Now, the Government had carefully considered the question involved in that view, and with a real respect for the ability of the Members of the Commission. At the time when the Bill was under consideration in the first instance that Commission had not then reported, but still it did report in abundant time to have its recommendations considered; yet the Government were of opinion that direct and absolute compulsion was not a mode in which they could most properly deal with the question in accordance with the public feeling of the country so as to secure the objects which they had in view. He did not think they were bound to take the dictum of the Commissioners on a subject of this kind, more especially when that particular point had not been definitely referred to them. The hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) was a Member of the Commission, and had made a separate Report. In that Report he had made a statement, with which he (Mr. Hardy) perfectly agreed, and it was this—that the reference to the Commission was in regard to certain trades existing under certain Acts of Parliament, and they were asked whether they would extend those Acts to other branches of trades, and how far they would interfere with those trades which came under the Factory and Workshops Acts. They had not the question of general education or of universal compulsion throughout the country referred to them, but only one special part of education—that in connection with trades under the Acts referred to. The hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth) said there was no provision for children between the ages of 10 and 13; but his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department said, when asked the question, that the Report as to children over 10 required the most careful consideration and legislation with respect to trades and factories, but the proper time had not come for that. At all events, after the separate Report of the hon. Member for Roscommon he thought the House would hold that he was justified in saying that he could not agree with the Commissioners, for they had not the whole question before them. The hon. Member for Roscommon said—

"They recommend general compulsory education, not alone where factory and workshop children are concerned, not alone in the large towns and cities, but for all children in all places. . . . I am not quite prepared to join in this recommendation. I do not admit that it legitimately comes within the scope of our inquiry, and certainly, if it does, we have never gone into it sufficiently to be able to pronounce a decisive opinion upon it. . . . Into such an investigation we did not go. I do not believe it was our duty to have gone; and, not having made this investigation, I do not think we are justified in pronouncing a decision upon a subject upon which we are not more capable of forming an opinion than if we had held no inquiry at all."

No one could read that hon. Gentleman's Report without seeing the intelligence which he brought to bear upon the inquiry. He (Mr. Hardy) had not been able, he confessed, to read the whole of the evidence which was taken, but he had from the index referred to points in that evidence, and he had looked at the statements of those witnesses whose evidence appeared to bear upon this part of the question, and he did not in the inquiries which appeared to have been made find enough to justify general legislation. He agreed in fact with the opinion of the hon. Member for Roscommon. It might be supposed from what had been said that there was under school boards a universal system of compulsion, and the hon. Member who had just sat down had called his attention somewhat critically to Hansard, as to opinions he had expressed six years ago. If he had changed his opinion he would not have been at all ashamed of it after an experience of six years upon the matter of education; but he found that he, at that time, expressed the opinion that he was now about to express upon the subject. He said then that the time had not come for the Bill that was then being introduced, or to introduce direct compulsion in any shape; and least of all, he said, before they had gained more knowledge they should not commit the power to local bodies to decide whether they should have compulsion or not. But he also said that if the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Forster), had provided a system of indirect compulsion, the alleged deficiency would be supplied. Now, that indirect compulsion was the groundwork of the Bill, and he said now, as he said then, that indirect compulsion was the best mode of proceeding to bring the country into the mind to bring up their children in the way in which they desired. The principle of the Education Act was decided against him, and doubly so, for the decision was in favour of direct compulsion; and in favour of school boards laying down whether they would have direct compulsion, instead of Parliament deciding it. They had had great experience since then, and they had incurred an enormous expenditure of money, both by means of school boards and also by voluntary action, and the question came whether, after that great expenditure, they were not to have some means of getting the children to school. He felt that the country was not yet ripe for direct compulsion. He felt confident in that opinion, on the ground that all the school boards had not adopted it, for they were not at all unanimous on the subject. It was said the artizan and labouring classes were in favour of compulsion. If they were, they would, under the Bill, be able to obtain it. The Education Act gave school boards power to enforce direct compulsion. He believed school boards were not necessary for that purpose, and that they were distasteful to the country on many grounds. They were unnecessarily expensive, and they often caused conflicts of opinion which led to expense, and rose bitter questions, which when once invoked, were not easily got rid of. They were distasteful because of that direct compulsion which was placed in their hands. He did not say they had not used that power with discretion, but they had exercised it in many instances to raise a great deal of public animosity against them, and whether justly or unjustly, school boards were an institution not favourably regarded. But the passing of that Act witnessed that the Legislature had determined that the people should be educated, and the Government had considered that vast and most difficult question—how they could best attain that object. The school boards had not attained it. The country, indeed, would not adopt school boards with the view of attaining it. A great number of school boards had not yet made bye-laws on this subject, but were simply acting as school boards for other purposes. Well, then, finding that state of things, and having to arrive at some conclusion by which they should enforce responsibility, they had placed in the Preamble of the Bill a declaration as to the responsibility of parents to educate their children. The hon. Member told the House that it was a totally different thing placing that principle in the Preamble of the Bill and enacting it; but it would have been of no use enacting it without attempting to enforce it. head, and of those in the board schools 11s. 5½d., a fact which proved that the voluntary were as efficient, if not more so, as the board schools. In former days 200 attendances a-year were sufficient to enable a child to go up for inspection, and that number had been raised by the right hon. Gentleman opposite to 250, at which it still remained, and if a child attended 250 times a-year for five years it would be a very hard thing to stop him from going to work. The hon. Member had asked how these labour passes were to be granted, to which he (Mr. Hardy) replied that an Inspector or special Inspector should be appointed to grant them, and nothing would be easier than for the Inspector going to the school granting each child passing his examination his pass, although it was a matter of detail rather for the consideration of the Department than of the House of Commons. He did not think, in conclusion, that he had neglected to answer any point that had been brought forward in the debate, in endeavouring to give importance to points on which hon. Members had dwelt. He could not agree with the statements that had been made that there were at the present moment about 1,700,000 children in this country receiving no education whatever, because he was aware that each 50 or 60 children in the schools represented on an average some 80, or 90 children who occasionally attended. There were, however, he fully admitted, a sufficient number of truant children to induce them to proceed with this measure. He did not advocate direct compulsion. He had said on a former occasion, that if the country was prepared for it, it would be better to do it by legislative action than by indirect action, but he now said that the country was not ready for direct compulsion. Judging from the past six years' experience attendance could be enforced better by appealing to the people's feelings, by educating the parents of the country in the first instance, and resorting to terror only, to a certain extent, as a last resource. He believed the consequences of the Bill would be that the laborious and law-abiding people of this country, when the intelligible rule was made known to them that no child should be put to labour before he was 10 years old without a labour pass, which was to be earned only by attendance for five years, would approve it, and when it came before them not with the force of law, but with a gentle suasion they would obey it cheerfully. He believed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh that this measure would make a sensible and great step in the direction of real education; that it would meet the wants of all classes; and that where there were efficient schools which gave an education not only of the intellect, but of the heart, the children would be brought into them under it, and that the result would be that we should have an educated people not only in the sense of an instructed people, but an educated people in a moral and religious sense also.

THE O'CONOR DON said, he had been delighted in listening to the glowing eulogium passed on the voluntary school system, and on the advantages of religious education by the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Hardy); but he asked what was there in the Bill to justify all this enthusiasm? The right hon. Gentleman, in concluding his speech, said that he thought he had left no argument which had been urged against the Bill unanswered, but he (the O'Connor Don) thought he had left one very important point untouched, for he had not told them what the Bill really would do for the voluntary school system. He asked what advantages did this Bill give to that system of education which the Conservative Party was peculiarly supposed to watch over and to protect, and, above all, what prospect did it hold out of security or stability in the future? To his mind this latter question was the all important one. A Bill that gave a little more money here and there to certain voluntary schools, a Bill that did not set up school boards and board schools everywhere, and whose chief merit consisted in having refrained from doing something rather than in what it did, was certainly a strange Bill for the Conservative Party to be satisfied with. When they examined the Bill was not its negative character its chief recommendation? When it was said that it did not establish school boards everywhere, and did not enforce universal compulsion, was not everything said that would be said either for or against it? The additional assistance which it proposed to give under certain circumstances to poor districts was, according to the statement of the noble Lord who introduced the Bill, a mere subsidiary proposal; it could be swept away in Committee without altering the character of the Bill, and even if passed, the trifling extent to which it would benefit voluntary schools had been so clearly shown by his noble Friend the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu) that he would not dwell upon it. The Bill interfered in no way with existing school boards; it left them and secured them in possession of all their advantages; it permitted their continuing in exactly the same way as if no alteration in the law took place; and although it permitted the trial of a different sort of machinery for carrying out educational requirements, yet that was eminently only a tentative proceeding, and if the machinery broke down, as he feared it would break down, the way was opened and made easy for the school boards. There was one very objectionable clause in the Bill, which required the attendance to be at Government schools in order to qualify for the labour certificate. This was quite a new feature in educational legislation. It was not required in the Act of 1870, and it would place voluntary schools, which were not in connection with the Government, at a very great disadvantage. Moreover, it would most seriously interfere with the employment of children who came over from Ireland with their parents, and who, although they might have attended at National Schools in that country, would not be allowed to labour in England, unless they could pass a standard of examination. Then as to general compulsion. It was true the Bill did not establish it at once, but its whole tendency was in the direction of its establishment. The hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) proposed by his Amendment that the House should endorse the recommendations of a Royal Commission upon which he (the O'Connor Don) had the honour of serving, which recommendation was to the effect that general compulsory education should be at once established. From that recommendation he had differed; he entertained a strong objection to interfering with parental rights and responsibilities. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that parents ought rather to be stimulated to look after the education of their children, than to have their responsibilities in this regard supplanted by the State, but he did not dissent from his Colleagues upon this ground. In his separate Report, to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred, he had said nothing against compulsion, he merely declined to recommend its general adoption, because he thought it was outside the scope of an inquiry into the operation of the Factory Acts. In a circular which they issued immediately after their first meeting, the Commission stated the object of their inquiry, and in that circular not one word was said which would lead anyone to believe that this very wide recommendation was possible, and for himself he could say that he sat on the Commission for months before he had any idea that it was contemplated. He could not agree with his hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, that any particular weight was due to this recommendation because it came from the Commission, for their inquiries had been confined to children employed in regulated labour. They had held their investigations only in the large towns, in most of which school boards and compulsory bye-laws existed, and upon the general question of education in the rural and agricultural districts, if they excepted the evidence of some of the officials connected with the Factory and Education Departments, they had no evidence worth a straw in regard to compulsion. He also deprecated the argument arising out of the example of Scotland, and contended that the evidence given before them proved that at the present time the education given in the large towns in Scotland was very inferior to that given in similar towns in England, and in support of this view he referred to the statements made by Sir John Wauchope, the head of the Education Department in Scotland, and by Mr. Walker, the chief Factory Inspector there, and also the Report of the Commission itself. At the same time he said he felt bound to admit that the evidence given in the large towns in England where compulsion had been tried was all in its favour. But if they turned to the Bill, if it had not accomplished all that the hon. Member for Sheffield desired, it certainly went a long way in the direction which he indicated. It clearly sanctioned the principle of compulsion; it ratified it where it existed; it gave new facilities for its enforcement; it proposed to place upon the parent who did not send his child to school even a greater penalty than a small temporary fine, for it proposed to deprive him of the advantages of a child's earnings at a time when those earnings would be most useful. Moreover, the penalty was one which would not fall exclusively on the parent, but would in many cases touch also the child. The non-ability of a child to bring in any earnings when he came to the age at which other children would be earning, would result, in many instances, in his being only half fed, badly clothed, and worse treated, and the penalty would then fall upon the innocent child as well as upon the guilty parent. He quite approved of the system of indirect, as opposed to direct compulsion, if it were likely to be successful in increasing the attendance of the children at school before they came to the age of 10; but if it merely resulted in punishing them after that age, he believed that direct compulsion would be preferable. On the whole, he would have preferred seeing the Government taking a bolder course, and proposing, if they thought it necessary, direct compulsion; but coupling this with such provisions as to voluntary schools as would place them, with regard at least to annual grants, upon a footing of complete equality with board schools. Universal and direct compulsion could never be justly enforced unless the parents had free choice of the schools to which their children were to be sent, and that freedom of choice should be a real one. It was no use telling parents they might send their child to a school of their own denomination, unless facilities were afforded for the keeping up of schools in accordance with their opinions. The hardship of obliging children of Dissenters and Roman Catholics to attend Church schools had been alluded to, and no doubt that would arise under any system of general compulsion; but it could not be met merely by the establishment of purely secular schools. There were just as strong conscientious objections entertained against sending children to those schools as to schools of a different denomination. The reason for this was obvious. The parent felt an objection to sending his child to a school belonging to a different religious community, not so much because he feared the child would take up the religious belief of that community, as because he might lose his own belief, and as there was often far more reason to expect that this loss of faith would be the result of the purely secular school teaching and associations, it was no wonder that a strong conscientious objection existed against it. Until this was clearly understood and recognized in legislation, compulsory education would in many instances amount to religious persecution. The difficulty should be met by affording every facility for carrying on education in accordance with the opinions of the parents, and by giving perfectly equal assistance by way of grants to schools in proportion to the educational results they accomplished, no matter in what schools they were accomplished, the cases of very small minorities being provided for by a very stringent Conscience Clause. He regretted that the Government Bill did little or nothing in that direction; he feared that a great opportunity was being lost, and that the result of the Bill if passed without alteration would be to make the way easy hereafter for the establishment of the purely secular system.

MR. KNOWLES said, that having been a Member of the Commission he could state that the evidence taken by them was of such a character as to warrant them in recommending the adoption of the principle of direct compulsion. He believed that the Commissioners were unanimous in that recommendation, with the exception of the hon. Member who had just spoken, although they left it to the wisdom of Parliament to determine how that compulsion should be carried out. He entirely agreed with the Commission in the opinion that compulsion in some form was absolutely necessary in this country. He also agreed with the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) that all children should be educated, that employment should be no excuse, and that two miles distance from school should be no excuse for non-attendance. But there were some things in which he did not agree with the hon. Member. He could not agree with him when he introduced into the debate the name of Joseph Arch as representing the working classes, because, in his opinion, it was unnecessary to do so, for the Commissioners had not the benefit of that gentleman's experience. The hon. Member himself volunteered his evidence, and his examination elicited facts for which the Commission were much indebted to him. All the evidence showed that there were a number of children who were not attending school, and the Commissioners could not help coming to the conclusion that the children of this country must be educated. The only question was as to the best mode of effecting that object. Employers of labour, managers of large factories and workshops, clergymen, ministers, schoolmasters, Inspectors of Education, and the working men themselves came to one and the same conclusion—that all the children ought to be educated, but they did not see any way of arriving at that result without compulsion. The friends and opponents of school boards equally agreed in this conclusion. Schoolmasters wanted more regular attendance; but it did not appear that they got it, except where school boards existed, and made attendance compulsory. For himself he should prefer a permissive Bill and voluntary attendance, because a child who went to school of his own free will was always a better learner than a child who was driven there. One great obstacle to education was that ignorant, and therefore indifferent, though loving, mothers looked upon it as a hardship to the children that they should be obliged to go to school. These mothers would say—“I never went to school; I never had any education; I do not know that my children are any better than I am, but I have got on somehow, and they will get on somehow too.” There was another class of mothers who were too idle to exert themselves to clean and send their children to school, and who sent them to run about the streets or anywhere so long as they got out of their way. Although there was much less of that kind of thing now than there had been 15 years ago, there was still a great deal of it existing yet, and how were these children to be got at unless they were driven to school. In some of the agricultural districts, to which the inquiries of the Royal Commission had extended, there was objection to compulsion on the ground that it would work great hardship; but those who said that looked at the matter from a very narrow point of view. There was in the country districts a surplus population, which was increasing in consequence of the introduction of machinery in agriculture and the laying down of grass land to save labour. That surplus population naturally migrated to the towns in search of work; but before they could get employment they must be educated to the extent of their being able to compete with those labourers who were already there. A teamsman or a waggoner might get on without education, but when he came to a town and endeavoured to get employment for his children, the case was very different. All trades were being more or less interfered with by Act of Parliament imposing regulations which required not only to be read, but also to be understood, so that the capacity to read and to comprehend was more than ever necessary on railways, in mills, and in the service of companies; and porters, pointsmen, and policemen equally required some degree of education. In fact the day was not far distant when an uneducated person would be unable to get employment, except upon a farm. When children entered mills owners had a right to expect that they should be able to read and comprehend the rules that were drawn up not only for their guidance, but also for their safety and protection. Unless there was compulsion, many of the children who ought to receive this necessary instruction would be left out of the schools. He agreed with the general provisions of the Bill, but considered it was too permissive. It laid it down that Town Councils “may,” Guardians “may,” and sanitary authorities “may” do this and the other; but his experience, which had been considerable in all those bodies, taught him that they very seldom did do—“may do,” therefore, ought to be “shall do.” In the case of assessment committees, their duty was made imperative, and, generally speaking, it was done, and well done, and the bodies he referred to would do their duty when, instead of it being left to the exercise of their own discretion, it was clearly and specifically laid down for them as it was for the assessment committees. The complaints about cases of hardship imposed upon poor widows with large families, and poor men with eight or ten children earning only 7s. or 8s. a-week, in driving the children to school and preventing them from working were only the usual stock-in-trade, and a repetition of what had been heard any time the last 20 years whenever any restriction was proposed. From the long faces of the cotton spinners at certain times it might have been supposed that the working of the mills depended upon the mere infants which worked in them, but when the Acts came into operation the mills went on as usual. No doubt there might be individual cases of hardship, but there were thousands of rich people in this country who would be only too glad to relieve such cases, and the cry of hardship came only from drunken and improvident parents who desired to trade on their children, for, of course, the less the children earned the less the parent would have to spend in self-indulgence. He believed that if the Bill were passed, with Amendments, it would have the support of the country, and that difficulties would vanish when it came into operation. In this, as in other cases, where there was a will there was a way. As regarded board schools, there were very strong feelings in Lancashire against school boards and board schools. Great efforts had been made in the shape of erecting schools, but the managers were unanimous in stating that there was a great difficulty in getting the children to attend with any regularity. He therefore thought that there must be a more definite compulsion. Unless compulsion were provided that class of children which had been spoken of as "wastrels" would continue largely to exist, would be left in the streets, and would be ill-fitted for industrial occupation when the time came that they must work. He did not approve of education without some religious instruction, and if it were banished on account of the opposition of those who, because they could not control it, would not let others do so, the zeal of all religious bodies alike would induce them to supply the deficiency in some other way, for he was perfectly sure those great Bodies outside the Church would not long endure a purely secular system. He trusted that before the Bill was read a second time the noble Lord would give them some assurance that in Committee he would consent to its being made compulsory in its operation.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he desired to thank the last speaker for the excellent speech he had delivered. He must confess that, notwithstanding the very able and interesting speech of the noble Lord opposite (Viscount Sandon), he (Sir John Lubbock) felt some difficulty in understanding how the measure would work, or whether it would work at all. He regretted that the Government had not seen its way to a simpler and more direct mode of action. A good deal had been said in this debate of the unpopularity of school boards, but so far from the London School Board being unpopular, his impression was, that the metropolis highly appreciated its labours and the admirable manner in which they had carried out the arduous task entrusted to them and was grateful for its efforts; and if board schools earned rather less than schools conducted by other bodies, it was to be remembered that many of them were situated in previously neglected districts. The noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu) and other hon. Members had said that compulsion was not even the rule with school boards, but the fact that that system had been resorted to by 97 cities and boroughs out of the 99 in which school boards existed, was to his mind conclusive in its favour. The hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) had referred to education in foreign countries, upon which it was asked, "What had we to do with foreign countries?—it was we who should lead and not follow them!" But before we could lead people we must get ahead. Hon. Members opposite objected to our being influenced in education by the action of foreign countries, but it must be remembered that the House was called upon to vote year by year vast sums in order that we might be kept on the footing, in the way of armaments, of that which was doing abroad. He thought we might very well vie with foreign countries in education as well as in military expenditure. Now, had any foreign country adopted the principles contained in the Bill? He believed not, and the Factory and Workshops Commissioners had given very good reasons why. Clause 4 had been described as the keystone of the Bill. But in order that it should be effective, a parent would have to remember months, and even years beforehand, that his child would require a certificate of attendance; he would require to watch carefully that the number of attendances was made up, and have faith that the watchfulness of Government would be sufficiently all-pervading to prevent him from finally escaping its requirements.

Mr. Knowles

A parent so foreseeing, however, would send his child to school without any interference on the part of the Government. Those were not the parents with whom the Bill was intended to deal. The Commissioners truly said, that such a provision as that combined the maximum of hardships with the minimum of efficiency. They feared that the requirement would operate in practice merely to exclude from the labour market for a time the bulk of the children who attained the age fixed by the Legislature for first employment. In fact, there would be many children whom the Bill would forbid to work, and yet for whom it would provide no motive which should make them learn. But the noble Lord, no doubt, hoped to deal with these cases by means of Clause 7. Local authorities, however, would find considerable difficulty in putting it into effect. The local authority was to put the law in motion if the parent—

“Continuously and habitually and without reasonable excuse neglects to provide such elementary instruction for his child as would enable him to obtain a certificate under the Act.”

But, as 125 days' attendance was all that was necessary, the local authority would practically be unable to act till the beginning of August, because up to that period the parent might plead that more than sufficient working days still remained. In that case it was obvious that for more than seven months in the year that provision would be a dead letter. There were many of the smaller details of the Bill which required further explanation. For instance, a child might be kept at home for “necessary domestic duties,” but that might mean minding the baby or keeping the house clean, which were very necessary, but if such duties were accepted as an excuse for non-attendance the Act would become a dead letter. Then it seemed to be altogether a boys' Bill—it might affect boys, perhaps, but it did not apply to girls. In making these remarks, however, he did not wish them to be understood as hostile to the Bill. Naturally in discussing a measure people dwelt on its defects, but there were parts of this Bill which he for one could not but hope would on the whole work well, and diminish the proportion of children who would grow up altogether without education. A great part of it, indeed, was permissive, but it had one advantage over the Agricultural Children Act, which, it was said, had been a failure. Under the present Bill, however, if the authorities did not avail themselves of the Bill, it was then the duty of the Education Department to interfere. That was an important, and would be a most effective part of the measure, and if energetically administered, it might certainly do a very great deal of good, because, if the local authority neglected its duty, the Education Department might appoint persons to perform it, and charge the expense to the defaulters. One subject for congratulation, at all events, was this, that by the present Bill Her Majesty's Government and their supporters were committed to the great principle that children were not to be allowed to grow up in ignorance. To meet this they had proposed a particular remedy. Many hon. Members doubted whether it would effect the object; but if it did break down, the Government would, he supposed, try another mode of dealing with the question. The principle of the 14th clause seemed to him excellent. In all probability the expense thrown on the country would be small, but prizes were not to be measured by their mere pecuniary value. He had no doubt but that this clause would prove a powerful stimulus to many a schoolmaster and to thousands of children in the elementary schools. In conclusion, he would only express the hope that the Government would consent in Committee to consider Amendments with a view to strengthen the provisions of the Bill, and then it might effect, or at least do something towards effecting, the great object which the House and the country had so much at heart.

MR. CLARE READ said, there appeared to be an opinion prevalent in consequence of his having made adverse criticisms, after he had heard the statement of the noble Lord who introduced the Bill that, therefore, he was opposed to it. It was also said that he was very much hurt that the Agricultural Children Act was to be repealed, but the fact was he was glad that Act was to be repealed. It never was more than a stop-gap until some general measure was passed. As to this Education Bill, he found that objection was taken to the fact that it proposed to vest power in the Boards of Guardians, and he observed that the Agricultural Labourers' Union declared that the Guardians were not proper persons to deal with education, because of their association with pauperism. He thought that Boards of Guardians were really the municipalities of the rural districts. All sorts of duties were thrust on them which they had not to discharge a few years ago. They had now to look after the health of a district, and he did not see why they could not look after the education of their Union and apply compulsion, because health and education were necessary to preserve them from pauperism. He did not think that Boards of Guardians would have any difficulty in putting compulsion in force between the ages of 5 and 10, because public opinion was so entirely in favour of it. There was one point he wished to press on the attention of the noble Lord. A child might under the Bill complete his 250 attendances in six months, and for the remainder of the year he might go about an educated wastrel. He might do anything except enter regular employment. As to the non-employment of children in the North, he pointed out that the reason the farmers there did not require juvenile labour was that a great many women were employed, and this explained how it was the farmers in the North could pay their men well. If they went into a field in the North they would see two women to one man employed; but if they came to Norfolk and further into East Anglia and throughout the South, they would see 20 men and boys working, but no women. He pointed out exceptions which were made in the Bill with regard to certain seasons of the year, such as at corn and hay harvest; but, he said, these exceptions were not wanted. He, however, thought the exception in favour of hop-picking was a proper one, but it only concerned a small district. Children were useful in finicking operations of husbandry, such as weeding, picking stones, singling turnips, and so on, and a child could earn 6*d.* a-day very easily, and if children did not do it probably it would not be done at all. There was also the case of the market gardeners, who found children useful in picking fruit and planting potatoes. He thought these were points worth considering. His hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield said, in the able speech which he made the other evening, that the agricultural labourer was in favour of compulsion, and he knew their delegates contended that the Agricultural Children Act ought to be put in operation everywhere; but he had never found more than two agricultural labourers who were in favour of that being done, and one of those was a man who had never had a child; while the other had no child who was within the school age. As a general rule what they said was, that as soon as ever their children could earn a trifle they should be very glad. It was all well enough to talk of the Report of the Royal Commissioners on Factories and Workshops. But he thought the Commissioners had overstepped their Instructions when they made recommendations in respect of agriculture. He would also observe that it was a mistake to suppose that if the House should decide that there should be universal compulsion up to 13 or 14, it would be easy to enforce it. There was, for instance, that very useful measure, the Vaccination Act, which insisted that something should be done for children of which they would find the benefit throughout their lives, and yet there were scores of persons who rebelled against that law, so that there was a great deal of bother attendant on the enforcement of its provisions. There was another Act which said that all pauper children who could not pass the Fifth Standard should go to school until they were 13 years old, and the consequence was that there were remonstrances without end against it, and that the Boards of Guardians throughout the kingdom were opposed to it, and that Standard had to be reduced from the Fifth to the Third, whereupon a cry of a dreadful Conservative re-action was set up. Although it would be found that during the 12 months which first elapsed since the order was issued only 1,470 pauper children had passed the required Standard, in the first six months after the Agricultural Children Act came into force no fewer than 600 pauper children had been allowed to go to work, because they had complied with its provisions. He was glad to see that by the provisions of the Bill no difference in the future was to be made between the education of pauper and other children. His hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield had also stated that the country gentlemen, and by implication he embraced all magistrates and clergymen, were opposed to education, but against that statement he must strongly protest. There were, it was true, a few farmers who thought it hard that they should be called upon to provide the means of educating their neighbours' children, when they could hardly provide for the education of their own; but the country gentlemen generally wished children to have a sound religious education; while they, like the farmers, objected to the compulsory formation of school boards throughout the districts in which they resided, and to having certain accomplishments taught in board schools paid for by the rate-payers. The Bill before the House, he might add, had been characterized by his hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) as a wise, a comprehensive, and a well-considered measure. The more he had heard it discussed, the more was he disposed to endorse that opinion. He looked upon it as a mild, a gentle, and a persuasive measure. It did not certainly do too much or go too fast, but it was as well that country people should be made to walk before they ran. Another good thing about the Bill was, that it upset nothing, except, perhaps, his little Agricultural Children Act, and that it happily did not compel the creation of any new boards. It enlisted the sympathies of every employer in the rural districts, and it tended to encourage the intelligence and the talents of every poor child throughout the country. It held out every possible inducement to the good parent to send his child early and regularly to school, while it applied to the indifferent parent the very strong argument of the breeches pocket. It was a measure which, in his opinion, would in a very short time give us all the benefits which one could expect to derive from direct compulsion, without the harsh, the arbitrary, the irritating and reactionary tendencies which all direct compulsion must engender.

MR. RICHARD: I do not intend to make a speech on this occasion. But I wish merely to call attention to one or two facts of considerable gravity in connection with the matter now before us. The question of compulsion, direct and indirect, and the educational aspects of the Government measure generally, have been discussed with great ability on both sides on the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella). But the House must be aware that there are other elements contained in the Bill which have only been referred to cursorily and incidentally. I refer particularly to the immense additional power thrown into the hands of the denominational schools, and the bearing of that upon the rights and liberties of large classes of Her Majesty's subjects who are not members of the particular religious communion to which the overwhelming majority of these denominational schools belong. On this point I feel it my duty to inform the House that nearly all the Nonconformist Bodies in the country have pronounced against the Bill with a unanimity and earnestness which I have seldom or ever before witnessed. The United Nonconformist Committees of London, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, and other large towns, which met recently at Crewe, declared their conviction that the principles of religious liberty are seriously violated by the Bill. To the same effect are the Resolutions of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, representing upwards of 4,000 churches; of the Baptist Union, representing upwards of 3,000 churches; of the deputies of the three denominations, in and about London; of the Unitarian Association; of the Liberation Society; and last, not least, the powerful body of Wesleyan Methodists, who have condemned it as unequivocally and emphatically as any class whatever. I hope that neither the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council nor any other hon. Member of this House, will think it wise to ignore or despise the opinions of so large a body of our countrymen on a question in which they are so intimately concerned. For let me remind the House who these people are, what place they occupy, and what a work they are doing, in connection with our national life. I observe that recently an able and competent statistician, in a paper read before the Statistical Society on the "Statistics of Religious Institutions" in this country, stated, on what appear to have been carefully-prepared and authentic data, that while the Church of England provides between 18,000 and 19,000 places of worship, the non-Established or Nonconformist Bodies provide 28,000 such places, all of them built without a penny being derived from tithe, or tax, or rate, or any form of compulsory impost, but as the pure offspring of voluntary zeal and liberality. What may be the amount of money invested in these buildings I have no means of ascertaining, but it must be very large. The same authority estimates that the amount raised for the support of these places and the various institutions connected with them cannot be less than £6,000,000 a-year. Now, I say it is not wise, not true statesmanship, in considering a question so essentially a national one as popular education, to leave out of account the opinions and feelings of so large a portion of the nation. The hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter), in his speech on Thursday last, referred to these Resolutions of the Nonconformists. I confess I listened to that speech with much the same feelings as the hon. Member described himself as having experienced on seeing the Resolutions—those of great surprise and regret. Earlier in the Session that hon. Member delivered a speech on the Burials Bill, conceived in a spirit so generous and courageous in its vindication of the rights of the Nonconformists, that I felt he had earned the gratitude of all the Dissenters in the Kingdom by the good service he had rendered to them on that occasion. And when I saw him get up to take part in the education debate I said to myself, now we shall have a speech that will uphold the principles of religious liberty. But great was my astonishment to find the hon. Gentleman launching forth into a vehement Philippic against the Nonconformists, because they had dared to say that they considered this Bill, if it passed into law, would involve a serious violation of the rights of conscience, and place them at a disadvantage as respects their religious interests and liberties. For that the hon. Gentleman denounced them as impracticable and intolerant. And it was curious and edifying to observe the rapturous delight with which hon. Gentlemen on the other side received these charges of intolerance against the Nonconformists. It is always interesting to witness such spontaneous ebullitions of self-conscious and indignant virtue on the part of the righteous, who are perfectly exempt from the infirmities which they so emphatically rebuke in others. For, no doubt, it was the profound sense of their own perfect tolerance that made them so wrathful at the intolerance of the Dissenters. Whether the eagerness with which any allusion to the Nonconformists in the way of reproach or ridicule is received on the other side be a sign of tolerance or intolerance it is not for me to decide; but certainly, if I were to recommend to any young Member of the House, especially on this side, a sure means of obtaining an easy, if somewhat hollow oratorical success, I should say to him—Have a fling at the Nonconformists, and your fortune is made. And especially if you stand up with a jaunty air, and with an easy wafture of your hand exclaim—“There is no religious difficulty in education”—though the same declaration has been made before probably 20 times, you will stand a good chance of being greeted with what the reporters call “loud and long-continued cheers.” One of the oddest things I know is the way in which hon. Gentlemen in this House, and especially on the other side, seem to think that they are better acquainted with the position, the interests, and the feelings of the Nonconformists than they are themselves. The Nonconformists meet sometimes in large conferences of from 800 to 1,000 persons from all parts of the Kingdom, at other times by Representative Bodies, consisting of their most trusted and honoured men, who are chosen because they are assumed to understand the circumstances, the wishes, and feelings of those whom they represent; and they pass resolutions expressing their judgment of public measures, as they have done on this occasion, declaring that in their belief there is danger to their most cherished interests involved in its provisions. But any hon. Member in this House feels himself entitled to waive all that aside, and to say—“These good people are entirely mistaken; there is no hardship or grievance in the matter.” I hear it constantly repeated here by one and another—“There is no religious difficulty whatever in education. I have had experience in my little parish in the country, and I have met with no religious difficulty, and therefore there is no religious difficulty.” Now, I submit to hon. Gentlemen whether it is not reasonable to assume that those who live in the midst of the scenes and circumstances, and are intimately acquainted from experience with the conditions under which a law is to come into operation, will be able to forecast more accurately how likely it is to affect them than hon. Members of this House can be who move in a totally different social circle, and are surrounded by totally different circumstances? The hon. Gentleman the Member for Berkshire went so far as to say that the action of the Nonconformists in this matter was "got up for Party and political purposes." Now, with all respect to the hon. Member—and no one respects him more highly than I do—I must give to that statement a peremptory and emphatic denial. Whether these people are right or wrong, whether they are correct or otherwise in the judgment they have formed of this measure, there is not the smallest doubt that they are perfectly sincere in the apprehension they entertain as to its sinister influence on their rights and interests. I am not going to argue the matter at present—for it is a point which cannot, in my opinion, be advantageously discussed on the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield; but I hope, on a future stage of the Bill, to raise a distinct and special issue on the question. I think—if it is not presumptuous in me to say so—that I could answer the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War on the religious question. Indeed, there was very little argument in that part of his speech. The impassioned declamation on the value of religion and of religious education, which always elicits such tumultuous cheers on the other side, amounts to very little, except to afford hon. Gentlemen opposite an easy way of proving what an extremely religious party they are. Such declamation is entirely beside the mark. The question is not, whether it is desirable to give a religious training to our people. On that point there is no difference of opinion. There is none, at least, so far as I am concerned. I yield to no man in this House in my anxiety to have children religiously educated. I go further, and agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, that there ought to be distinct, clear, positive, religious teaching. I do not believe in a neutral religion that has no blood in its veins—something that will please everybody and displease nobody. But the question is, when and by whom it is to be given? Our contention is, that you cannot give distinct positive religious teaching in schools supported out of public money without violating the rights of conscience. I hold that justice is as an essential part of religion, and no amount of dogmatic theology you can pour into a child's mind can compensate for the affront you offer to the spirit of religion by violating the principles of justice and charity in your administration of the schools. But I contend further, that the religious instruction you give in day schools is practically of very little value. You will find abundant proof of this in the Reports of the official Inspectors of Church of England schools, so long as those Reports were presented. Here is one specimen from the Report of the Rev. J. R. Blakiston—

"Many a time have I had to listen, sorrowfully enough, to disquisitions on the extreme importance of 'the religious element' in the education which our day schools offer to the children of the poor; the said 'religious element' consisting in the repetition by rote of the driest formulæ, or the reading and learning of a passage of Scripture, it being a mere chance whether the teacher feels the slightest religious interest in the subject. Nothing stands more fatally in the way of a sound system of a National education than the notion that there is the faintest religious culture realized by any process of this sort. The wonder literally is, when we consider how such children are taught religion, that even the dimmest religious reverence survives. Because I believe so profoundly in the importance of the religious element in education, I deprecate this miserable parody on it so earnestly. Let us have honest secular teaching in our National schools—very religious work so far—and then if Christian parents, Sunday schools, Christian teachers, and the atmosphere of the life of a Christian nation cannot add the higher—that is, the true religious influence—perhaps the less we talk about our national Christianity the better."

But I forbear at present entering further on the argument. I intend, on going into Committee, to move a Resolution that will fairly raise this part of the question. I know hon. Gentlemen opposite dislike these semi-religious discussions in this House, and nobody can dislike them more utterly than I do; but if you thrust them into education and other Bills that are brought before this House, they must be discussed. And I am convinced that notwithstanding their repugnance to the subject, hon. Gentlemen will not refuse to listen to us, as they have never yet refused to me at least their kindly indulgence in attempting to address the House, if we state our views, as I hope we always shall, with moderation and candour, and in the spirit of Christian charity.

MR. GREENE said, they had not heard from the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down what it was that the Nonconformists objected to in the Bill, but no doubt when he raised the question in Committee they would have an opportunity of answering his objections when he told them what they were. For his part, he thanked Her Majesty's Government for having brought in so excellent a Bill. He himself some years ago advocated the principle which they had adopted--namely, that of giving parents a direct interest in the education of their children. Notwithstanding what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman opposite, to expect that parents would give a religious education to their children was to expect what never would come to pass. Whatever might be said of the agricultural districts, and whatever objections might be urged by the Nonconformists, they knew that education which the people had hitherto obtained had come from the Church of England and emanated from the agricultural districts. Gentlemen opposite talked as if those residing in the agricultural districts had no care for the education of their people. He emphatically denied that such was the case. When he farmed largely some years ago, he always employed a schoolmaster three times a week in the winter season to keep up the education of the boys, so as to enable them afterwards to become, if they liked, policemen or railway officials. There were men in this House who owed their position to the education they had received in those little schools, which hon. Gentlemen opposite treated so lightly. He did not want to make out the labouring population to be all good or all bad; but he maintained that they were as anxious about the education of their children as hon. Gentlemen themselves, or any other class of the community, and even if they were not, when they knew that their children could not go to work unless they received a certain amount of education, they would insist on their attendance at school. It had been stated that the labouring classes fell back upon the industrial schools for the education of their children; that was a libel upon them. He felt very strongly that the education should not be a merely secular education, and he deprecated the introduction into the schools of those kinds of dogmas which some people taught; but if this was to be a Christian nation they should not exclude from the schools the only book which would be of any value, and he was sorry to see the proposal supported by the Nonconformists. There ought to be a clause in the Bill that no school board should have the power to exclude the Bible from the schools, and if no one else would move a clause to that effect, he would do so, and divide the House upon it. Although strongly opposed to Roman Catholicism he would rather send his child to a Roman Catholic school than to one where he would never hear the name of God or of Christ.

MR. MACDONALD said, he disapproved of the Bill because it gave a certain portion of the community a strong power over other portions which they ought never to possess. If skilfully worked, it could be made a powerful auxiliary in spreading the doctrines of the Established Church and giving it a superiority over other sects. It would also do that which should be done alone by Protestant Missionary Societies, and for that reason it was not worthy of support. He also considered the Bill to be unsatisfactory and incomplete, because it was merely of a permissive character. It would be altogether inoperative among the mining population. By the 5th clause the Mine Inspectors were the persons upon whom the duty would devolve of seeing that the children in the mining districts were educated; but, considering the many duties which they already had to discharge, the Bill in that respect was a deliberate farce. They would not be able to do what was expected of them even if their number was doubled or trebled. They should therefore relegate the duty to a proper authority, such as the school boards, or if they did not do that, they should adopt compulsory legislation altogether. The Bill, they were told, was one of progress, but unless its provisions were carefully revised, the progress would be one of retrogression. The Scotch Act, of which he had had some experience, had been alluded to, and the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) had said that it had been put into force without effect. That that was not the case he would show by quoting the individual case of the district with which he himself was connected. Four hundred and fifty persons had been brought before the board of which he was a member for not educating their children, and at least 90 per cent of these persons had one reason only to assign—namely, that their children were engaged in necessary domestic employment, and therefore they could not afford to send them to school. If the clause which made that a valid excuse were retained, it would open a door for evasion, and no progress would be made. When the Act came into operation in the year 1872, in his parish they had accommodation for 2,722 children. The first act of the newly-appointed school board was to have a proper census taken, and they found by this means that of children between the ages of 5 and 13 there were 4,934. It was impossible to carry out the Act at once, as they had 1,500 children to provide for, but they set about doing the best they could, and built wooden booths and borrowed chapels, and still they were unable for a year or more to compel the attendance of children as the law directed. They commenced building three large schools, and they were completed in 1875 at a cost of £15,000. The House had been told of the large burden which the school boards imposed on the rates, but in the parish to which he referred, the assessable rental was £74,000, and upon this the tax levied was only 2½d. in the pound on landlords, and 2½d. on tenants, making 5d. in the pound in 1875, whilst this year it was only 3d. in the pound between the two. There were now in the parish school board schools of the value of £24,000, and in 23 years' time they would have every one of those schools free from debt, with a rate not exceeding 3d. in the pound per annum. They had now accommodation for 4,647 children, or for nearly 2,000 more than they had accommodation for in 1872. The average attendance of children was 3,729. So much for the cost of building by school boards about which so much had been said. He denied that school board elections were necessarily expensive. In the district with which he was connected an election took place in April last, and its cost was only £64, or one farthing per pound on the assessable property. It had been said by the hon. Member for Wigtonshire (Mr. Vans Agnew) that school boards did not give satisfaction in Scotland. He (Mr. Macdonald) had as much experience on the subject as any hon. Member in that House, and he ventured to say he had never heard a single expression against them from any honest, intelligent working man. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War had told them school boards were distasteful. No doubt they were in some cases. Where one man in a parish had been accustomed to mould opinion and regulate all educational matters, school boards which disturbed the old routine might to a certain extent be distasteful, just as light was to the owls; but with a compulsory system of education, he believed they would be found the best means of overcoming the difficulties of the present question. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War he considered was more declamatory than argumentative, and contained more impassioned eloquence than solid thought. In it, the right hon. Gentleman had boasted of having answered all the arguments which had been brought forward by the other side; but there was one argument he had not addressed himself to, and that was the one built by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) on the 7th clause of the Bill. It was to be hoped that the Government would give some consideration to that argument. He must repeat that if the Bill was not amended with reference to the mining population, it would be little less than a farce, if the Mining Inspectors were to be left to carry the measure into execution.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he could not admit that the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken (Mr. Macdonald) had made out any case against the Bill before the House. He ventured to think it was—using the language of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair)—a distinct advance, an honest and a very considerable advance, in making provision for the education of our children. What did the Bill provide? That every school board, town council, and local authority throughout the country should have the power, if they thought fit, to apply direct compulsion. It put the 74th section of the Act of 1870 into the hands of authorities now existing—not to be created at a considerable cost, but now existing—and who, from their known capacity for administration and habit of government, might be expected to undertake and discharge strictly the duties imposed on them. The Bill enforced indirect compulsion, for it imposed penalties on the employers of children who were not instructed. It required that children, if they desired to earn wages, should either have obtained a certificate that they had passed a certain Standard, or that they had completed 250 attendances at school during the previous year. It also applied direct compulsion to all children not at work, all children under 10 years of age desirous to work, and all children above 10 years of age found idle or wandering. He therefore claimed for the Bill that the powers which it put into the hands of local authorities were large steps in advance. He had taken a considerable share in the cause of education, and, with all the interest he took in the subject, he should hesitate to take broader, larger, or wider steps at the present moment. In prosecuting the work of education they could only take sure steps by making it quite certain and clear that they were supported by the public opinion of the country. He had heard many hon. Gentlemen and right hon. Gentlemen complain that this was a poor attempt to enforce attendance at school, and that it would not be so effective as direct compulsion. Well, he had ascertained the progress that had been made by a school board in which he took a deep interest some time ago, and which he thought must be admitted to have endeavoured most loyally to carry out the principle of direct compulsion. He had enjoyed the honour of being a member of that Board until he was called to other duties, and there was no part of his official life which was more satisfactory to him than that in which he was engaged in promoting the education of the children of this great metropolis. He claimed that the Board charged with these duties had done its work thoroughly and heartily. Indeed, he ventured to think that some harm had been done to the cause of education by the firmness with which that Board did its work, for it had caused some amount of reaction.

Mr. W. H. Smith

It had a right, therefore, to claim the confidence of those who believed in the principle of direct compulsion. Well, what was the result of the efforts of the London School Board to enforce the principle of direct compulsion? In answer to a letter asking for information which he wrote to the Clerk of the Board he received this statement—

“ At the last Census the number of children of school age for whom elementary provision should be made in London was 574,693. Allowing for growth of population, we estimate that at Midsummer of this year the number will be 614,670. At Christmas last the total number of school places was 412,259—viz. 288,702 in voluntary schools and 123,557 in new Board schools, or in schools transferred to the Board. The above number (412,259) will be increased to 469,048. In brief, at the present moment for 614,670 children the Board think it necessary to provide 469,048 school places. The average attendance last Midsummer was 287,033, and last Christmas, after a very bad half-year, 288,497. As far as I hear, a very considerable improvement is taking place during the present half-year. The total cost of school visitors for the half-year ending Michaelmas last is £11,260—i.e., about £23,000 per annum. There are ten superintendents and 206 visitors.”

What he wished to point out was that it was admitted that no greater zeal could be shown than had been displayed by the School Board of London and its officers. Taking the years from 1870 to 1875 the attendance had been progressively and rapidly increasing, until it had reached the figures he had just named. What that represented, however, was not an increase in the number of children attending school, but an increase in the attendance at efficient schools, many of the children having previously attended schools which were not looked upon as efficient. It was a singular fact these figures showed that the London School Board, with all its zeal and activity, could not get more than half of the children who ought to be at school in regular attendance. He asked, therefore, if direct compulsion was satisfactory. Had it been absolutely successful, and could they do without that indirect compulsion which the Bill endeavoured to introduce? Last year the London School Board had taken out 4,000 summonses, and there had been 3,700 convictions, and the number of children brought to school by this means was 1,400. The cost of this operation was £11,250, two and a-half summonses having, on the average, to be taken out in each case, so that the expense of bringing each child to school was about seven guineas. He thought that a case had been made out for some other kind of compulsion than that which was called direct. They might press this instrument as much as they pleased, but if they had an unwilling, a careless, and an indifferent parent, they could only operate upon his sense of personal interest. After a certain point any attempt at direct compulsion became comparatively ineffective. Zealous as he was in favour of compulsion, he was not sanguine that direct compulsion could ever be made sufficiently effective to bring all the children to school. He claimed as one of the great merits of the Bill that it associated early labour with school teaching. He ventured to think that there was considerable value in affording facilities for education concurrently with labour. The Report of the Factory Commission stated that under the Education Act employment was regarded as the enjoyment of a privilege, and that was exactly the principle upon which the Bill was based. It said to a child—"If your parents qualify you to pass a certain Standard, and will insist upon your attending 250 times at school for so many years, then you may be permitted to earn money." Such a provision was of considerable value, because we could not ignore the fact that in this country a very considerable portion of the work which had to be done in life required a previous early training. The child of 13 or 14 years of age who was turned out of school to follow the plough, or to go into the farmyard, or even to undertake any of the ordinary commercial duties, found himself unfitted to compete with those who had commenced their work at an earlier age, and he would be unable to earn his livelihood in a manner that would conduce as much to the prosperity of the country at large as to his own. It was believed in America that the population did not reproduce its own labour; but he could hardly conceive a greater calamity that could happen to any country than that its necessary labour should not be reproduced within its own limits. The object that should be kept in view should be not so much to raise the people out of the position which must be occupied by a very large proportion of the labouring population of the country as to qualify them to live more happily and more usefully in their various stations in life. He believed that a true education would proceed first of all by developing the intelligence of the working man for his own benefit and that of the State, and then by casting a light into the gloom and the darkness of our cottage homes. He must express a very strong hope that the House would accept the Bill as a firm and large advance in the cause of education—an advance, indeed, quite as great as prudence would admit of our making at the present moment, and as a measure which deserved the recognition and support of the country because it recognized voluntary efforts and made the best possible use of the material ready to hand, and because it refused to listen to the voice of those who said that as they could not agree with the very large number of persons who had made great sacrifices for the cause of education, and who had spent their time, money, and energies in endeavouring to promote education, they would endeavour to exclude them from the work which they had taken up, and would condemn them to a barren and cheerless secular system, which would afford them, perhaps, some instruction and some improvement in the faculties which they possessed for this life, but nothing beyond that.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the hon. Member the Secretary of the Treasury had made a very interesting and practical speech, such as might have been expected from one who had taken so deep an interest in education as he had done. He (Mr. Forster) confessed, however, that he did not think that the hon. Member had answered the arguments of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) or of those who supported him. His hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield had not stated that there should not be any indirect compulsion. He was as anxious as his hon. Friend the Secretary of the Treasury that it should be used to supplement what was called direct compulsion, and he (Mr. Forster) had understood the hon. Gentleman to say not so much that the Bill was in favour of direct compulsion as that some of its provisions would be of assistance to direct compulsion. He fully believed they would have such an effect. There were before the House really two Motions—one for the second reading of the Bill, which the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) intended to oppose by a Motion which it was possible the Rules of the House might prevent him from making, although its principle could be debated on the question of the second reading, and also the Motion of the hon. Member for Sheffield. For his own part, he intended to vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Sheffield, if the hon. Member thought it right to press it to a division, which he thought he would do unless he received some satisfactory assurance from the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council which would render it unnecessary for him to adopt that course. At the same time, however, he should not feel himself justified in voting against the second reading of the Bill, because he trusted that they would be able so to amend it in Committee as to make it effectual as a real progress in education. With the permission of the House, he would state concisely in what respects he desired to see the Bill amended. He was aware that this was a very unusual course to take in discussing the second reading of a Bill; but, at the same time, the noble Lord would feel that as this measure was an Amendment of a previous Act, it was difficult to discuss its principles without dealing with the different proposals embodied in it. He was reluctant to vote against the second reading of the Bill for the reason that he concurred most heartily in the object which the noble Lord had in view — namely, that of securing an increased attendance in schools. When the question of an amendment of the law relating to primary education was mooted in Her Majesty's gracious Speech, those interested in the subject of education were most anxious to know what form the Government proposals would take. No doubt considerable pressure from different quarters had been brought to bear upon the Government in relation to this question. There was an evident desire on the part of many hon. Gentlemen who gave them their political support that the Government should give increased and special help to denominational schools, and also a desire that religious instruction should be given. There was also a more general desire that an attempt should be made to meet the attendance difficulty. He was glad that the Government had not greatly yielded to the pressure brought to bear upon them on behalf of the first two views, though he was aware that much dissatisfaction had been expressed by hon. Gentlemen sitting opposite with the action of the Government. He did not know whether those hon. Gentlemen had derived much consolation from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, but certainly he had objected most warmly to views which nobody had stated, at all events, inside the House, and he was not aware that it was customary for Ministers, on the second night of a debate on the second reading of a Bill, to answer arguments which had been used outside of the House, but which had not been expressed within it. He, however, intended to confine his observations almost entirely to the question of attendance. He was aware that before the discussions of the Bill were concluded the House would have to consider whether in the way in which the noble Lord proposed to amend the difficulty that had been pointed out, with reference to the Nonconformist portion of the population, he had, or had not, acted unfairly towards the school board system which was called into existence by the Act of 1870. The question immediately before them really was, how were the children to be got into the schools, and in dealing with this branch of the question he should—to quote the phrase of his noble Friend the Vice President of the Council—speak primarily in the interest of the children. In doing so, he was much obliged to his noble Friend for having brought the question before them, though he hoped he would allow him (Mr. Forster) to say that he should have put it before the House in a different way. His noble Friend in introducing the Bill affirmed that the schools and the teachers having been provided, all that was required was the children to occupy the one and find employment for the other. The noble Lord followed that by saying that while there was an average attendance in the school of 1,800,000, accommodation for 3,150,000 had been provided, which left it to be inferred that about 1,300,000 children, who ought to be, were not at school. He (Mr. Forster) had no wish to overstate the number, but he thought there could be no mistake in saying that the average attendance, instead of being 1,800,000, was about 2,000,000, or would be up to that number in August next, and he was therefore not clear that 1,150,000 children who ought to be at school were absent therefrom. It must always be necessary to provide for a larger number than could be expected to attend school, and therefore the average number in attendance ought to be between the number of children for whom accommodation had been made and the smallest number in actual attendance. He (Mr. Forster) did not believe that they had all the schools that it was necessary to provide, but they had the machinery at work which was providing all the schools, so that they could apply compulsion. The average attendance being 2,000,000, the number of children upon the register was 2,750,000, at the end of last year. That showed that the great fault was not the absence of the children altogether so much as the insufficient and fitful attendance. The deficiency of average attendance could very fairly be represented by that statement in the Education Report for 1872, that we ought to have an average attendance of 3,000,000, whereas we had only one of 2,000,000. He believed it would turn out that this deficiency of 1,000,000 was mainly in those parts of the country which had not school boards with compulsory bye-laws. That was shown by the returns from Birmingham, Leeds, Sheffield, and Stockport. He would take the Census of 1871. The population was 22,700,000. Of that number 12,500,000 had school boards with compulsory attendance, and there were 10,500,000 with bye-laws. Of that number the metropolis had 3,250,000, and must be considered by itself. They must not suppose that the Act of 1870 had done nothing to increase the average attendance. Since that year it had increased by 684,000, but in the five years before it it was only 304,000. It might be partly owing to new schools, but it was mainly owing to the better attendance brought about by a greater interest in education. He would take Birmingham; the increase there since 1871 in the average attendance was from 16,000 to 40,000; in Leeds from 14,000 to 30,000; in Sheffield from 12,000 to 28,000; and in Stockport they accounted for all the children in the place, although they did not attend regularly enough. If they had for England and Wales the same average of attendance as there was for Birmingham, Leeds, and Sheffield, instead of having increased the school attendance by 684,000, the increase would have been more than double that. No doubt these towns started from a very bad position; but he would take London. The difficulties in London were enormous. The great population, the great distance of the poor from the rich part of the town, and the want of public opinion working through the City, all made the difficulty of dealing with London vast. But, thanks to the compulsory bye-laws, the increase of attendance was in four years from 174,000 to 288,000; therefore, he thought the London School Board might take heart, though there was a large number of children not in average attendance. If all England and Wales had increased at the same rate the increase of attendance, instead of being 684,000, would have been more than 1,000,000, a more satisfactory result than was found at present to be the case. The hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Mills), who was also a member of the London School Board, had stated that in London there was a large number of children on the books of schools who were not in regular attendance. Throughout England and Wales the proportion of children in average attendance to those upon the roll for five years was 67 per cent. The proportion for the five years before the passing of the Act was 68 per cent. The proportion in London was 74 per cent. Consequently, London, with all its difficulties, had met these difficulties better than had the country generally, and they might thank the School Board for that fact. To confirm that fact as far as he could, he might mention that taking the increase of the population since the last Census the average attendance at school throughout England and Wales was about, but rather under, 8 per cent of the whole population—in Birmingham and Leeds it was 11 per cent, and if they had all the country over an average of 11 per cent, the proportion now in attendance would be 600,000 more than it now was, and the noble Lord would have had to ask for money not for 2,000,000, but for 2,600,000. If, therefore, the influence of school boards and bye-laws had been generally extended, the half of the present deficit would have been swept away. Now, how had that success been obtained? By direct compulsion—he was obliged to use that ugly word. And what had been the effect upon the population? He distinctly challenged any of the opponents of that mode of increasing the attendance to bring forward any proof that could reasonably satisfy the House that the public opinion of those places in which compulsion had been at work was not in favour of it. He did not know that any of those who supported the Bill of 1870, himself included, would have been sanguine enough to expect that result. They were sanguine enough to hope that good would be done, but compulsion was one of those interferences with Englishmen, who did not like interference at all, which they could scarcely hope would become popular. Cases of grievance had, no doubt, been cited and relied on, but he really did not think that when they came to be examined into they were cases of real grievance. He would put the matter to this test—Did those who were opposed to the principle of compulsory attendance think there was the slightest chance at any future school board election of a majority being returned which would do away with its application? He was therefore glad that the noble Lord did not meddle with those districts where the bye-laws were in operation. He willingly admitted, however, that to some extent the noble Lord gave some of those districts assistance by prohibiting work up to 10 years of age, and that feature alone in the Bill would make him most reluctant to do anything which would endanger its getting into Committee. But as to the districts in which the bye-laws did not exist the noble Lord created two, or rather three, new educational authorities—the Town Council, the Guardians, and also the committees which might be appointed by them. It was with great regret he heard that the noble Lord only proposed to give those local authorities permissive and not compulsory power to make bye-laws. The hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Knowles), who knew thoroughly the position of the working classes, was thoroughly opposed to this merely permissive power being given to Town Councils and Boards of Guardians. After the strong argument of the noble Lord at the beginning of his speech, he expected that the “may” would have been “shall,” and that the Bill would have given the local authority, not only the power to make bye-laws, but would have compelled them to do so. As he had said, he very much regretted it, but he knew he should be told that the great success of the school boards was attributable to their being the representatives of the ratepayers, who had themselves asked for these compulsory powers, and to their being a willing body to put these powers in force, and that it would be a different thing for the noble Lord to impose on the representatives of the ratepayers, for other purposes, a power which they were not called on by their constituents to exercise. There was, he could not deny, some force in that argument, but they had really got so strong in their progress in this matter that they could afford to be bold and to say that, the experiment having succeeded so well, the rest of the country should be called on to follow the example. They must remember that if they did not make bye-laws compulsory, it would be exceedingly difficult for school boards, Town Councils, and Boards of Guardians in small places to establish such bye-laws. Under the Sanitary Acts, it must be remembered, local boards in a voluntary form were established for some time, and when it was shown that it was necessary to have them the Government stepped forward and made them universal throughout the country. He had, he confessed, hoped that they would have had a general provision by Act of Parliament, not only stopping work up to 10 years of age, as the Bill stopped it, but also taking care that there should be only half-time work up to 13, or better still, 14 years of age, with security that sufficient schooling should be obtained by the children. As no general rule could be made to fit all cases, he would have given power to the local authorities to make bye-laws, adapting this general provision to the conditions of employment and the circumstances of the children, which bye-laws might have the sanction of the Education Department. He took it for granted that that was really the meaning of the recommendations of the Factory Commissioners, and it was with that view he should vote for the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella). He was not very sanguine that it would be carried, but he should not give up the Bill because that Motion might be defeated. He trusted that the noble Lord would not allow the Bill to go out of Committee without securing that if there was no work to be done before the age of 10 there should also be schooling up to that age. With regard to the clause requiring the local authorities to see that no child worked between the ages of 10 and 14 without a certificate of efficiency or attendance, he believed that the noble Lord overrated its efficiency and underrated its severity. Much had been said upon the question of compulsion, both direct and indirect, and several hon. Members on the other side of the House appeared to think that indirect compulsion was a less stringent and a more English proceeding than direct compulsion. The more this subject was considered, however, the more it would be found that this was a mistaken view. It was just as great an interference with the liberty of the subject to prevent a child from earning money as to require him to go to school. The noble Lord, moreover, would not avoid domiciliary visits under his labour-pass system, and an Englishman would rather have a visitor coming to his house to tell him—"You had better send your child to school," than to have the agent of the local authority coming and saying—"Your child shall not work." The temptation to use indirect compulsion was, that the employers could be made to a certain extent the police of the State; but by such a system more might be obtained than was wanted. It was not desired that a child should not learn his employment as well as have his schooling. What was really wanted was, not so much that the child should not be able to earn money, as that he should go to school at the same time as he was working until he had had enough schooling. The noble Lord relied upon his certificate of attendance system; but he feared that the certificate relied too much on the foresight of the parent, and there was not much foresight in the parents with whom they had to deal. They were not the élite, or even the average, of the working classes, but were persons rather below the average, and they could not be expected to show foresight and resist temptation for four or five years before their children would be of an age to go to work. The penalty for the absence of the certificate was so severe that he did not believe it could be enforced. It reminded him of one of many suggestions, all equally impracticable, made to him when he was trying to pass the Act of 1870. A gentleman wrote to recommend that as so many persons married who were unable to sign their names, it was desirable, in order to promote education, to enact that no person should be allowed to marry who could not sign his or her name. He did not attempt to pass such a clause, because he thought that compulsory celibacy would have its disadvantages. In the same way compulsory idleness might have its disadvantages. Take the case of a child of 10 or 12 years of age, whose education had been neglected. This child would not be able to produce the certificate of proficiency, and might not have complied with the rule of five years' attendance. By the terms of this Bill that child would not be allowed to work, and to the calamity of ignorance there would be added in his case the further calamity of idleness. He doubted whether public opinion would go with the Legislature in enforcing such a law, and any amount of direct compulsion and domiciliary visits to warn parents that they were transgressing the law would be better than such a state of things. He believed, indeed, that the proposals in the Bill could not be carried out, and that the Education Department would be driven back to supplement indirect by direct compulsion. When the noble Lord came to his clause for direct compulsion a curious difference between that and the labour-pass was observable. The latter was severe and stringent enough for anything, but the former was a half-hearted law, which was entirely open to the objection of the hon. Member for Wigan. It said that the Town Councils and the Boards of Guardians "may," and not "shall." When they had to deal with the children they were to do exactly as they pleased. It was not their duty to find out the facts, but they were bound to hear the representations made to them, and if they thought it expedient to act they might do so. This meant that, unless these bodies chose to carry the Act in force, they need not do so. He was aware there was another provision which some had described as a very powerful one, to the effect that if the local authorities chose to make it appear that these children were idle and likely to be "wastrels," they might be taken before the magistrates, and the magistrates, having the fullest discretion given them, if they thought fit, might send them to an Industrial School. Now, if that were to be the general result of what was to happen, it would be far too strong a measure. He did not think the State had a right to take hold of these children and say that they should associate with the general run of the children that got into the Industrial Schools. The punishment was too great in that way; while, on the other hand, he was alarmed in another way, because it would be a great temptation to parents to allow their children to go to an Industrial School, where they would not only be educated, but fed and clothed, at the expense of the State. No doubt, power was taken to recover the cost from the parent; but it would be difficult to compel the payment, and he feared that a great number of these parents would yield to the temptation of allowing their children to be maintained at these schools. The provisions of the Act, moreover, would destroy the discipline of these schools, which were now doing a good work. With regard to the enforcing authority, the noble Lord gave power for certain purposes to new authorities—the Town Councils and the Boards of Guardians, or to committees appointed by them. He was aware he was treading on tender ground, because this subject would have to be discussed on the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard). He feared they could not establish school boards throughout the country at present; but he, for one, looked forward to the time when that could be done. He believed it would be better for the cause of education that there should be an elective body especially empowered to look after the education of the children. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) had stated in his remarkable and interesting speech that the great fault he found with the Bill was, that it did not give power to the Town Councils and Guardians to supply schools. He could not refer to that speech, as it was, perhaps, the last they would hear from his hon. Friend for some time, without bearing testimony to the earnestness with which he had dealt with this question, showing how much he had the cause of education at heart; and whatever his own views were, how anxious he had always been to make every allowance for those who differed with him. Still he must say he did not think it would be advisable to give the new authorities the power of supplying schools. He strongly suspected that, if this power was given to the new authorities, it would give rise to bodies antagonistic to school boards, and strike a serious blow at the school board system. At that point they were met with the greatest administrative deficiency in this country—the want of rural municipalities. If we had such rural municipalities as they had in the United States, in our own Colonies, and in some parts of the Continent, we should have a body to which we could at once entrust this power. It was a remarkable fact, however, that although there were such municipalities in the United States and Canada, they found it more convenient in those countries to have a special body elected for educational purposes. No doubt there were objections to the Boards of Guardians. It was not well to associate them with education more than we could help, connected as they were with the administration of the Poor Law. The mode of their election, too, by voting papers was about the worst we could have. However, the power of the ratepayers would still continue of electing a school board, if they wished to have it. Though magistrates were very fit men to be put upon school boards, he would rather that they were placed there by the choice of their neighbours. If, however, the Guardians or Town Councils were to have these duties imposed upon them, they ought not to be allowed to shirk or transfer them; and, therefore, he hoped that the clause which enabled them to delegate their duties to irresponsible committees would be omitted. Of course, if the powers were delegated, it would be to the managers of the National School in the parish, who, however fit, ought not to be thus appointed, for their selection by the Board of Guardians would be practically self-election. It must be remembered that ever since 1870 it had been generally considered to be quite clear that the managers of voluntary schools could not be invested with the power of compelling attendance at their own schools. There was great difficulty in enforcing compul-

sion where there was not a choice of schools, and with regard to the choice on the part of the parent, he had always maintained that the parent, especially the Nonconformist, ought to be allowed to select the school to which he wished to send his children, wherever it was possible to do so. But there were cases in which he could not make that choice, because there was only one school, and then the only question to determine was, whether the child should be taught or remain untaught. When, therefore, he was driven to that alternative, he would say, let the child go to the school, and let the parent rely upon the Conscience Clause. The feelings of the parent ought not to be considered so far as to let a child grow up in utter ignorance, but the matter ought to be made as easy for him as possible; and we ought to remove not only injustice, but the fear of injustice and the expectation of it. Therefore, he hoped the noble Lord would not persist, when the child of the Nonconformist could earn a labour pass only at a Church school, in giving compulsory powers to these committees, but would entrust them to the elected bodies, to whom in the first instance the Bill gave those powers. He admitted that many managers of voluntary schools were doing their work well, and on Saturday last he conversed with one whose attendance was $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent out of a population of 650; though he was a clergyman he did not teach the Church Catechism except on Sunday, and such a man, no doubt, was one of the best to have to do with education; but under the operation of this Bill he would probably join the Board of Guardians for the purpose of carrying out its provisions. With regard to the clause for giving greater help to denominational schools in "poor districts," it was true that by its wording this clause did not apply merely to denominational schools, but to all the schools in those districts, but he had no doubt that the aid would be larger in the case of the denominational schools than in that of other schools. As to the amount of this, he thought the noble Lord went too far in saying that where a school had not £20, it would get £30 or something like that. The fact was, that in this respect the Bill merely removed a possible deduction from the grant, and did not add to the grant. The late Government, in framing the Act of 1870, put in a clause providing that grants from the taxes were never to exceed the income from the localities. If the grants earned by schools did so exceed the contributions by the localities, then there was a deduction made, and that amounted last year to less than £30,000. The present clause said that, in some districts, the deduction was not to be made; but although he thought that the immediate effect of the clause had been exaggerated, yet he sincerely trusted that the Government would not persist in it and that the House would not accept it. He considered that a great principle was involved in the rule that the grants from the taxes should not exceed the income from the localities, and he believed that it would be impossible to carry out the clause without breaking down that rule altogether. The Government probably were not aware how far their proposition would extend. He had a Return moved for by the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) for another purpose. It gave the population and the rateable value of 49 of the largest boroughs. Thirty-five of these would come distinctly under the clause as poor districts, and parts probably of the other 14. Nottingham, Sheffield, Birmingham, and Leeds would be under the clause poor boroughs, and Warwick, Shrewsbury, and Bradford rich ones. If an average were taken of all these 49 boroughs, they would all be poor districts under the clause. The rule would, therefore, have to go if the clause was adopted, and it was important that it should not go. Their Education Estimates increased very fast. The annual grant for day schools had grown in a short period from £500,000 to about £1,500,000. They did not grudge that increase, but they ought to be quite sure that they got efficiency with it, and kept proper checks upon it, and no check was more valuable than requiring that for every shilling given from the taxes an equal sum should be given by the locality. If that were not done, he believed it would injure the schools themselves, because they would rely on the Government grants and care little about results, provided they were enough to secure those grants; and eventually large sums of money would be granted by the House, which would not be met equally by the locality, and the latter would be spending the State money with the usual result of great extravagance and recklessness. The result would be, that in order to prevent such a contingency they would require a system of centralized control and management. There were several Amendments of great importance which would come before the Committee. The first was that of which he had given Notice—namely, that there should be inserted in the Bill a similar declaration to that in the Scotch Act, that it “is the duty of every parent to provide education for his child.” He had two reasons why that ought to be done. In the first place it was what both the country and the parents themselves expected; and then it would not be acting fairly to the school boards to omit this declaration. Those school boards had a difficult task—it was even surprising they were not more unpopular—and the House ought not to weaken their hands as the omission of this declaration would weaken them. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War asked what was the use of putting this declaration in the Bill if nothing would follow from it; but he (Mr. Forster) would insert it before the 7th clause, and let something follow from it, so as to make it a reality. The second Amendment he wished to see adopted was one providing that if they so interfered with the employer and parent as not to allow a child to work up to 10 years of age, they would at least see that the child went to school under 10 years of age. The third Amendment he hoped to see adopted was, that they would not absolutely rely on the certificate or the labour pass, but that after the child was 10 years old they should aim at half-school and half-work for him up to 14. In the next place, they would have to consider the restrictions in regard to bye-laws, by which Guardians were allowed to act only on the requisition of the ratepayers. That provision must have got into the Bill by mistake. He could not conceive why Guardians should not have the same power as Town Councils. In his opinion it would be better that they should have liberty to act without a requisition. There were several other details which would properly come under consideration in Committee, such, for instance, as the one relating to poor districts. He also had much doubt with regard to the provision for free passes, which might practically result in free schools, and demands upon the public purse which would make the hair of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to stand on end if he knew what it rendered possible. He must confess that if the Bill were to pass exactly as it stood, he should hesitate to vote for its second reading—he should feel some doubt as to whether it would not be better to wait for a less objectionable measure, or have no legislation at all. But the House was not driven to that alternative. The noble Lord had very frankly expressed his willingness to accept or consider Amendments, and it would, therefore, be prejudicial to the cause they all had at heart not to allow the Bill to go into Committee. Meanwhile, they had the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sheffield before them. It was not in opposition to the Bill, but was only a good preparation for Committee, and, therefore, he should vote for it.

VISCOUNT SANDON observed that he had no cause to complain of the reception the Bill had met with from the House during the two evenings the debate had occupied. He had invited free discussion of its provisions and had promised that all Amendments that were proposed should receive the fullest consideration. When he introduced the measure he was well aware of the complex character of the work he had in hand, but he was comforted by the reflection that it would not be discussed in a Party spirit. Of course it could not be expected at the present moment that the Government should state what Amendments they proposed to accept. He might say at once, however, that the broad features, the general principles of the Bill would necessarily remain unaltered. With the details it was different. Any Amendments which were calculated to make the measure more effective or to remove any sense of wrong or animosity which might have been created would be willingly accepted by the Government, or at least considered in the most favourable way. It would be highly inconvenient to enter into a discussion as to the details of the Bill, and he would therefore merely refer to the leading suggestions that had been made, and state why the Government could not accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella). The hon. Member objected to Boards of Guardians being the authority to carry out the Act; but he (Viscount Sandon) would ask what other local authority could be found in the country districts? Supposing a second Board had to be formed, the same materials as those forming the Boards of Guardians would have to be taken. All the criticisms on that point came to this—Why should not school boards be substituted for Boards of Guardians? He hoped, however, the House would agree not to discuss the question of universal school boards. In connection with that subject, he might say he was very sorry to hear the remarks made by the hon. Member with regard to the members of the Boards of Guardians, the ex officio members especially the magistrates and the clergy. He thought it was a bad omen for their debates on this question, that the first hon. Member opposite who rose to discuss the Bill should have made observations which he knew would touch to the quick hon. Members on that (the Conservative) side of the House. He should like to ask the hon. Member who it was that had contributed the money already expended on the education of the people? £13,000,000 had been spent on voluntary efforts, a great portion of which, no doubt, was spent in the towns, but a great deal also in the country. Who supplied those funds, if the country gentlemen, and farmers, and members of Boards of Guardians abstained from contributing? He trusted to hear no more attacks of that kind on the Boards of Guardians. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) whose remarks he had listened to with great respect, said that the proposals of the Government with reference to bye-laws were as weak as water. Well he (Viscount Sandon) did not quite understand that criticism, because the Government had put the local authorities in the same position as that occupied by the school boards under the Act of 1870. Exactly the same people as got bye-laws passed under the Act of 1870 were to have power to pass bye-laws under the Bill. They thought it right to follow the lines of the Act of 1870, and to give the rate-payers the power to assemble and pass a resolution calling on the local authority to adopt direct compulsion. The hon. Members for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) and Poole (Mr. Ashley), the noble Lord the Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire (Lord Frederick Cavendish) and the right hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh had contended that there was no security in the Bill for enforcing instruction in certain cases before or after 10 years of age. That was a serious charge, and if it really were so he confessed it would be a great blot on the Bill, for if they forbade all labour up to 10, and then at 10 said to the child—"If you have not reached a certain stage of intellectual instruction you shall not go to labour," they should be doing a very bad turn for the children of the country. If a child spent the years up to 10 in idleness and began his intellectual instruction at 10, he would be thrown upon the world at 14 with little education and a bad labourer, because he did not begin to toil early enough. He must, however, call attention to the 7th clause, which was intended to be a stringent one, whether it succeeded or not. The intention of the clause was that no child from 7 to 10 should be able to be continuously and without reasonable excuse kept away from instruction of some kind or other. It was intended, if he was not sent to school continuously—if he were habitually neglected by his parents, that then the strong compulsory powers should come into operation, and the local authority was empowered to force the parent to send him to school; and afterwards, supposing at 10 years the child did not get his certificate, the same clause would apply. The clause gave the power of direct compulsion in a way which he believed would be satisfactory to the country, and he trusted that all the employers of labour in the country—the merchant and the manufacturer, as well as the country gentleman and the farmer, would join heart in hand with them in seeing that there was no continuous, habitual, and unreasonable neglect, and would also join heart in hand in seeing that no child after it got its intellectual pass should be allowed to run wild in the streets, instead of being at labour. Some hon. Members thought the Act would not be carried out; but they forgot that there was a stringent clause which gave the Education Department the right to supersede any local authority which did not discharge its duty. The Department had the power to send down two agents of its own to any locality, to pay them out of the rates, and to keep them there two years, in order to see that indirect compulsion was strictly carried out in that locality. He should have thought, if there had been any fear about the matter, it would have been that their Bill was too strong. If, however, the words of the clause were found too feeble, they might be strengthened with advantage; but he should have thought there was scarcely a loop-hole through which a child could escape. He had been told compulsion had failed in the Mines Act and in the Agricultural Children Act. The answer to that was, that there they had no enforcing authority, but here they had a stringent enforcing authority. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) was opposed to several of the leading provisions of the Bill, among others, he said he was against the payments proposed to be made to "poor district" schools. Whether they would succeed in that respect he (Viscount Sandon) could not at present say. Now there was extreme difficulty in hitting off what was a "poor district" school, but he adhered to the view that it was unjust, because a district was poor and and could get but little local help, it should therefore be deprived of the Government grant. He thought the principle on which he had gone was a sound one. The hon. Gentleman went on to say that he would gladly accept the local authority proposed, if they gave them all the powers of school boards. That was a very serious matter, and he should entirely demur to the proposition that Boards of Guardians were fit to be the managers of schools and to carry out all the work of education. Then there was the solemn threat of the hon. Member—which was a serious matter coming from him—that if the Bill were carried they must be prepared to have a great agitation throughout the country which would result in the establishment of unsectarian schools in every school district. Surely that opened up quite a new view of the case, and different from that taken by the hon. Member in his Bill for universal school boards and universal compulsion. The hon. Gentleman said, in speaking on the 9th of June last year—

school accommodation, my Bill will have no operation except to enforce compulsion. I only ask that, in addition to what is at present insisted upon by the Act of 1870, school boards shall be formed in those districts where there is already a sufficiency of school accommodation—that is, where voluntary schools, which are mainly Church schools, cover the ground, and where, therefore, a board school will not be required."—[3 Hansard, ccxxiv. 1572.]

The fact was that the Bill of the hon. Member for Birmingham was supported by the whole of the Nonconformists; it proposed direct compulsion—that you should not build another additional school, but force the children into the existing Church schools; and yet the Government were now told by the hon. Gentleman that the present measure did exactly the same thing, though through the agency of the Boards of Guardians, and that there was to be an agitation throughout the land against its provisions, and that they would be obliged to build unsectarian new schools in every town. He could not understand the position taken up by the hon. Gentleman or the Nonconformists. He could not, however, help hoping that wiser councils would prevail, for the hon. Gentleman and his Friends must feel that the measure of the Government was framed in no sectarian spirit. He, at all events, in the speech which he made in introducing it, avoided saying anything which could excite the slightest feeling on their part, and he contended that the position which they appeared to be about to take up was totally untenable. There was another important point which had been touched upon in the course of the debate—he referred to that which related to the Industrial Schools. So far as they were concerned, the question involved was one which would of course require a great deal of discussion in Committee. He adopted the Industrial Schools, but hon. Gentleman must be aware that when a certain point in compulsion was reached, their action was liable to be absolutely foiled. It was impossible to fine and fine ad infinitum, and it was equally out of the question to imprison. The Government were therefore of opinion that some handling of Industrial Schools in the matter might be found to be very useful. It might, however, be matter for consideration, though the Government had formed no opinion on the point, whether some modifications with respect to those schools might not be introduced into the Bill. The truth was that the subject was one in which every alternative treatment possible must be adopted. One mode of treatment would not suffice, and it was necessary that they should have many strings to their bow, because they had to deal with a multitude of evils. Hon. Gentlemen, he might add, on both sides of the House, including the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter), the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Birley), and some others, had made speeches which were highly favourable to the Bill. The hon. Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) too, though he criticized some of its provisions, showed he entertained a warm feeling for it, as well as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh. The hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) had raised a point about which there was considerable difficulty, but that difficulty could be met by insisting that schools which were not public elementary schools should submit to a rigid inspection, while he could assure him that there was no intention of inflicting a wrong on any denomination. It would, however, be impossible to allow attendances at non-efficient schools to pass. The objection of the hon. Gentleman was, at the same time, one which he quite admitted was well deserving of consideration. As to the objection raised by the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone, with respect to the attendance, that also he admitted would be a great blot on the Bill, if it could not be met; but he must confess he saw no danger of girls slipping out of its meshes. The conditions as to labour would, he thought, meet their case as well as that of the boys, as the clause dealing with the matter was intended to be very stringent. He regretted, he might add, that the House was not fuller when his hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) made his long and able speech. He could not sufficiently admire the generosity with which the hon. Gentleman said that he would even rejoice that his own Bill should be repealed, and as there was nobody more conversant with the wants of the country, and nobody more anxious that its children should have education, his testimony in favour of the measure of the Government was most valuable. He would not, however, on the present occasion enter into the details raised by his hon. Friend, nor could he give any pledge on the part of the Government with respect to them. A great number of important matters had also been raised by his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), which it would, he thought, be on the whole wiser not to deal with at present. There were figures, which he hoped to give when proposing the Estimates, but which did not affect the Bill. His right hon. Friend went on to say that he thought he (Viscount Sandon) overrated the labour part. He would remind the House that under the right hon. Gentleman's own Act a child could not go to school without a certificate; but, at present, the parent alone could be prosecuted, and not the employer who employed an uncertificated child. He hoped the present Bill would prove still more efficacious. Then with regard to the enforcing authority, he saw that the right hon. Gentleman still had a weakness for universal school boards. Well, the Government could not go with him to that extent. That subject must, as far as the present Government was concerned, be considered closed. The Government believed that the proposed enforcing authority represented the people thoroughly, and it became a matter of over-sensitiveness to say that that authority must in no way be connected with the management of schools. If we were to ostracize the managers of all the existing schools in country places we should be shutting out the best people who cared for education, and who were the most likely to get the children into the schools. He would now rapidly run over his objections to the proposal of the hon. Member for Sheffield. The point which the hon. Member raised was, as to whether it was wise that we should put the whole of our working population into bondage as to the daily attendance of their children, because some of their number were indifferent and negligent. The hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth) had asked why Parliament should not do the forethought for the parents? That was exactly the thing which the Government objected to, for they did not think it right or healthy that Parliament should do the forethought for the parents of the country. They held that to be one the false principles of legislation, which was doing a great deal of harm in the present day, when Parliament was asked to do the forethought of the people in regard to food, drink, and morals. The House must not be led by the hon. Member for Sheffield into this most dangerous course. The issue was a broad and a clear one. It was not a question of a little more of direct or a little less direct compulsion. The question was, whether we should put the honest, laborious, and duty-doing parents into bondage for the sake of the negligent ones. Direct compulsion meant that so many attendances at school should be necessary, and that the not keeping them was a crime. The Factory Acts Commissioners, of whom he wished to speak with the greatest respect, made a recommendation of a system of direct compulsion such as existed nowhere else. They said that the attendance at school of all children ought to be compulsory up to the age of 13, and they recommended a full-time attendance of five hours daily, or of 25 hours a-week and half-time besides. If, however, this recommendation were compared with the English Act of 1870 and the Scotch Act, it would be found to be much more stringent than anything already enacted. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford stated that there were very few children absent from school in places where school boards existed. But the fact was that in London there were something like 180,000 children not in attendance at school, 25,000 at Liverpool, something like 16,000 at Birmingham, and a large deficiency in all other school board places. He believed, however, that under the proposed system of indirect compulsion the number of attendances would be greatly increased. The Ragged School Union had ascertained that there were a very large number of children in the streets during school hours. When they saw the agents of the society taking notes, the children imagined they were school board people, and rapidly disappeared; but when, soon afterwards, a Punch and Judy was sent into the district, the streets swarmed with them again. He thought that all these stories about the completeness of the work done by the school boards must be received cum grano, and it was at least open to doubt whether the school boards were doing their work so thoroughly and efficiently as had been stated. Some interesting remarks upon the subject would be found in the Reports of the Inspectors, which would be in the hands of hon. Members in a few days. He himself only saw them a few days ago, after the present measure had been prepared. One of the ablest of the Inspectors, speaking of Gloucestershire and Somersetshire, Mr. Moncreiff, said the action of the school boards had done little or nothing to prevent irregular attendance; and, comparing the country districts without school boards with the towns, he stated that the percentage of the attendances in Gloucestershire was to the city of Bristol as 15·6 to 10. Yet the same gentleman admitted that the Bristol School Board was by no means a bad one. Next came the evidence of Mr. Wilkinson, another Inspector, who was familiar with Staffordshire. This gentleman said that the action of the school boards had in some respects tended to increase the difficulties of education, because parents now sought to send their children only just often enough to avoid being summoned. Direct compulsion, therefore, was not as easy as it was represented to be. Every means should be used for procuring the attendance of the children, instead of confining ourselves to one means, and we should not use a pressure which in the long run might retard instead of promoting the end they all had in view. If labourers and artisans were so greatly in favour of compulsion why did they not vote for it in their several districts, and why was it necessary in every school board district to have such armies of visitors to force their children to school? The greatest caution was necessary when you interfered with the poorest of the population, lest by suddenly cutting off the earnings of their children, upon which they in part depended, you should produce a dangerous reaction against the education you sought to give. He was not alone in this view, which was sometimes supposed to be confined to benighted Tories, country gentlemen, or clergymen, who knew nothing of these matters. Canon Norris, who for 15 years was one of the best Inspectors of the Education Department, was earnest in pressing forward indirect compulsion, but in his book, The Education of the People, he said—

“When I hear politicians invoking a system of compulsory education as the panacea for all our social evils, I often wish I could take them into one of our poor village homes and let them there try to work out their plan for a single week. Go into any one of those cottages where there are two or three children between the ages of 9 and 12. They are returned in my political friend's statistics as 'idle,' being 'neither at school nor at work.' But what is the fact? They are as indispensable to the home life of that cottage as if they were earning 3s. or 4s. a-week. One is going errands, most necessary errands, with the father's meals, to the apothecary three miles off, to the village shop. Another collects half the fuel they use, or acorns for the pig, or manure for the garden, and all in their turn 'mind the house,' 'mind the fire,' 'mind the baby while the mother is out.' We must think twice or thrice before we roughly try to apply compulsory school attendance to such a home as that. To require those parents to give up their children's services would be simply tantamount to requiring them to keep a servant girl, at a cost of 2s. 6d. a-week, out of an income of 12s. a-week."

The late Prince Consort, in 1857, thus treated the same topic—

"What measures can be brought to bear upon this evil (of non-attendance at school) is a most delicate question, and will require the nicest handling, for there you cut into the very quick of the working man's condition. His children are not only his offspring to be reared for a future independent position, but they constitute part of his productive power, and work for him for the staff of life. The daughters especially are the handmaids of the house, the assistants of the mother, the nurses of the younger children, the aged, and the sick. To deprive the labouring family of their help would be almost to paralyze its domestic existence."

Such an opinion, coming from one intimately acquainted with the domestic life of Germany, and with its school regulations, was well deserving of consideration. As to the Amendment, the Government must once for all decline to adopt it, and thereby to put the labouring population in leading-strings as to the daily life of their children. The Bill might be amended in various ways. It might be desirable to put in some declaration of the parent's duty, though general declarations of this kind appeared almost useless in the face of the Preamble. Considered as a whole, the Bill would alter the position of all the parties concerned towards education. The negligent parent, who now kept his child at work, would hereafter find the greatest difficulty in getting work for him without education. The employer who now tried to get the child to work for him, would thus find it his interest to educate the child with this view. This important change would be secured by the Bill. To sum up, school boards would be kept exactly as they were, with the same functions, but with the enormous assistance of indirect compulsion. Local authorities everywhere would be armed with the power of protecting children from the negligence of parents or the pressure of employers. Then a strong pressure would be kept on the local authorities themselves, through the power of the Education Department to declare them in default if they did not do their duty, a power which might be set in motion by the Inspectors or by other complainants. Then there was direct compulsion if the locality desired it, just as in the case of school boards at present, and, again, there was the labour pass. He believed the parent would not like to risk the loss of the child's labour when the time for it would come, because the child did not make all the attendances. And next we had the very strong clause which dealt with negligent parents and wastrel children. Well, then, we had got simplicity of working in the Bill. All the parent had to do when he wanted to send his child to labour was to present a pass, and all the employer had to do was to ask whether the child had got one, for as the age would appear upon it there would be no further difficulty. Then we had the dunce pass, the standard pass, and the honour pass; and in that way emulation among the children was provided for. Very little persuasion would be necessary to induce the child to attend regularly and do its work well. Another advantage was the concentration of duties upon existing authorities, the object being to throw as much work upon them as they would be able to perform efficiently, and as would add to their dignity without multiplying local bodies. In that way were combined economy with efficiency. Another point of great importance was that private adventure schools, which were the curse of the country, would be very quietly, and almost insensibly got rid of. The parent would not send his child to a school where he might not get sufficient education to pass the Standard, and besides, where attendance would not count. Lastly, the great reaction against our educational system would be avoided. ["No, no!"] Yes, direct compulsion had been pressed as far as it could; people were beginning to rebel against it, and unless by this measure we anticipated the growing dissatisfaction, that dissatisfaction might prove dangerous. Theorists might consider the measure illogical, half-hearted, insufficient. These were some of the epithets hon. Gentlemen opposite thought fit to apply. It was quite time the Government had been asked by some of the members of the Birmingham League to take courage and do their bidding. Some of the extreme friends of voluntary schools had also told them to take courage, do their bidding, and repeal the Act of 1870. As to taking courage to do the bidding of the League, all the electors throughout the country had told the League that the country was not with them. As for some of the entreaties of his hon. Friends who took an opposite view, there was no sufficient sign that the country was with them to justify any Government in taking up the conclusions they advocated. The Government, in his opinion, might rest with confidence upon their measure while they had the good opinion of such men as the hon. Member for Berkshire, the right hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh, and the hon. Members for Manchester, Exeter, and Norfolk, who had all acknowledged the vigour of this Bill; and it had been acknowledged in other quarters too. Because if that Bill was that weak and inefficient measure which some people pretended, why did the hon. Member for Merthyr say it was going to occasion a revolution? He quite admitted that the measure was cautious and moderate. He, for one, charged with the responsibility of the Department to which he belonged, would be sorry if he brought forward a measure which was not cautious, and which did not err, if anything, on the side of moderation, when he knew the enormous interests at stake. The Government offered, then, to the sober sense of Englishmen, not to the theorists, the members of the League, or to the extreme partizans on either side, a measure which was consistent with the freedom of Englishmen, and with the freedom of individuals, but which, while consulting that freedom, would show no mercy to the wrong-doer who injured his child by depriving him of the education to which he was entitled, and he believed that respect of such premises. Such application shall be accompanied with a certificate as to the applicant's character and qualification, signed by a justice of the peace for the county or a magistrate of the burgh, as the case may be. And the justices or magistrates, and the county licensing committee or joint committee for the burgh, as the case may be, if satisfied with the plans submitted to them of such premises, and that if such premises had been actually constructed in accordance with such plans they would, on application, have granted and confirmed such a certificate in respect thereof, and that it is meet and convenient that such certificate should be granted, may grant and confirm a provisional certificate in respect thereof in, or as nearly as may be, in the terms of Schedule B annexed to this Act."

The effect of this enactment would, it appeared to him, be this—on the tenant applying for a certificate, the owner of the House would say that he had presented plans to the licensing justices, and that it was on the face of the certificate that the money was laid out; and that, therefore, he had the right subsequently to obtain the licence, because he could contend that he had laid out the money on the faith of its being granted. It would be thought a great hardship upon a man who had expended some £5,000 or £10,000 upon the premises to refuse him the licence, and the consequence would be that they would have to give it to every subsequent tenant. The effect all over Scotland would be to impair the power of the magistrates to refuse licences to succeeding tenants. When the Bill was passing through the House of Commons it attracted so little notice that he believed hardly anything had been heard of it in Scotland: but since public attention had been roused, he had had Petitions sent to him from a great many public bodies against this clause, and amongst others a Petition from no less important a body than the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, representing a very large constituency, and also from the justices of the county of Lanarkshire, praying that it might not be allowed to pass. Under these circumstances, and having found few Members either in that House or the House of Commons who really approved of it, he trusted his noble Friend who had charge of the Bill would consent to omit it.

Moved "To omit the said clause."—(The Duke of Argyll.)

terests and so to impede the action of the magistrates, because as he understood the practice already existed in Scotland, and that at present persons who were about to construct public-houses in the town of Edinburgh were allowed to lay before the magistrates the plans of the proposed buildings or alterations. He thought the magistrates were much more likely to refuse the licence when the application and plans were first submitted to them, as then no expense had been incurred, than they were to refuse subsequent applications, when they had once sanctioned them. He trusted the noble Duke would not persist in his opposition to the clause.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN said, that a few days ago he had presented a numerous signed Petition against this clause.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH thought the effect of the clause would be to licence the House instead of the occupier, and this he thought was very undesirable. He quite agreed with the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) that the working of the clause would be to make it difficult for the magistrates to refuse the licence to the subsequent applicants. He hoped his noble Friend (Earl Stanhope) would give way.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that after what had fallen from his noble Friend and the noble Duke opposite, he trusted the noble Earl (Earl Stanhope) would withdraw the clause. It seemed to have no reference to the main part of the Bill, which he thought a useful measure. His noble Friend had proved too much, because he said that the plan embodied in the clause was already adopted in Scotland, and if so the clause was unnecessary. Whether that were so or not, he believed that the Bill would be more useful without the clause than with it.

Motion agreed to, Clause struck out accordingly.

(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

(No. 85.) COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do now go into Committee."—(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, he hoped he might be allowed before the House went into Committee, to say a few words which were applicable to the general principle of the Bill rather than to any particular clause of it. He would first remind their Lordships that immediately before the Whitsuntide Recess, the noble Duke the President of the Council stated to their Lordships that he had received a number of important communications on the subject of this Bill, but that he had not been able to arrive at any conclusion with reference to the suggestions contained in those communications, and that consequently the Committee would be postponed till after the holidays. A statement such as that was naturally regarded as one with some significance, and the meaning he attached to it was that the Government were about to make important modifications in the Bill. Three weeks had since elapsed, and he found that the Bill remained in its original shape, and that in the Amendments of which the noble Earl who had charge of the Bill (the Earl of Carnarvon) had given Notice no attempt was made to meet adequately the objections urged against the measure. In the meanwhile public opinion had been growing day by day, and he thought he was not misdescribing the case when he said that so far as the great Profession which would be affected by the Bill was concerned, public opinion was very unfavourable to the details of the measure. He did not propose to refer to the various complaints and suggestions made in the general Petitions, but would say that various memorials which had been presented on the subject of the Bill by medical Bodies were unanimous in asking for an alteration of that provision which would restrict vivisection to experiments performed "with a view only to the advancement by new discovery of knowledge which will be useful for saving or prolonging human life or alleviating human suffering." It must be remembered that all great discoveries were of gradual growth, and that it was impossible to affirm positively of any one experiment of a tentative kind that it would result in a discovery by which life might be prolonged or suffering diminished. Nor did the Report of the Royal Commission at all justify such a limitation. The Report showed, indeed, that the attitude of the Profession was not one of factious opposition to legislation on vivisection; that the abuses arising from vivisection in the country were very small and very much exaggerated, and that the medical Profession very generally leant towards humanity and forbearance. Bearing that in mind he ventured to suggest that the representations to which he referred were deserving of the very highest and most delicate consideration, not only because the persons who made them were men able to appreciate the effect of such legislation, but also because unless we had the concurrence and confidence of the medical Profession it was too much a matter of certainty than any legislation which Parliament might attempt in the matter would be evaded and ineffectual. They could not do away with vivisection; all they could do was to regulate it, and he concurred in the opinion of Professor Rolleston, that a declaration of the sentiment of the Legislature against the infliction of needless pain on animals would in itself have a very beneficial effect. It was proposed by the Bill to have a system of licences—licences to the person by whom, and licences to the places in which the experiments might be conducted. He thought that licensing persons in this case might be desirable, as it would impose personal responsibility; but when the Bill went further and made the licences extend to places he believed that to be a mistake. Again, there was no occasion to subject distinguished men to the domiciliary visits of Inspectors, and he should be glad to see these officials, whose duties would be very inquisitorial and invidious, removed from the Bill. Their interference was uncalled for where a licence to try experiments had been obtained, and as for the unlicensed or contraband experiments they would not come under inspection, but would be dealt with by the police constable and the magistrate. Their appointment further involved the selection of a class of officers very difficult to obtain, for it would be necessary that they should have professional knowledge sufficient to enable them to judge accurately of the value of these researches, and it would not be easy to find persons in whose judgment the public and the Profession would have confidence. It was only by acting in unison with the highest professional authorities that Parliament could hope to effectually regulate the practice of vivisection, and he feared that in his zeal to prevent abuse the noble Earl who had introduced this Bill would alienate the support upon which he ought to rely, and discredit the good cause of humanity in which every Member of the House was interested.

Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 1 (Short Title).

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that at the proper time he intended to propose that the title of the Bill be changed from "An Act to prevent cruel experiments on Animals" to "An Act to amend the law relating to Cruelty to Animals." This change he proposed in deference to the opinion expressed by a deputation of the medical Profession.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (General restriction as to performance of painful experiments on animals).

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET called attention to the opening words of the clause. "The following restrictions are imposed by this Act with respect to the performance on any living animal of an experiment," &c. Was a jellyfish a living animal? A great number of experiments were perpetually performed by farmers; and there were continual experiments on small animals and insects for their benefit. What was to be done in these cases? Had they not better define what a "living animal" was? He feared they were about to pass a Bill which would be absurd in its application, and which no one would clearly understand.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON thought their Lordships would do well not to enter on the work of definition proposed by the noble Duke. The General Medical Council had spent half a day in endeavouring to define "any living animal," and ultimately giving up in despair, recommended that there should be no such definition.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY suggested that, in the case their Lordships had to deal with, the use of the word "living" was unnecessary. Vivisection was not performed on dead animals.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON thought the matter was not so clear as his noble Friend supposed. With some animals the head might be cut off and signs of sensation might still appear.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET hoped his noble Friend who had presided over the Royal Commission, and other noble Lords who had served upon it, would come to their aid and help them in a definition of "living animal;" and that they would also explain what they meant by "inflicting unnecessary pain upon animals," because it was sometimes necessary to destroy animals wholesale.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL said, the Royal Commission had the advantage of hearing the most eminent physiological and medical authorities; and, further, it had the great advantage of having as one of its Members a most eminent physiologist. He trusted that, after that, the House would not feel overtroubled by the difficulties with respect to definitions which presented themselves to his noble Friend. The Commissioners had not felt themselves at all perplexed in their inquiries, and had come to a unanimous conclusion as to what they should recommend. Since the Commission closed its labours, he had received from many of the most distinguished professional men in this country the expressal of the entire approval of the result of those labours; and only on the previous day he had the honour of seeing a letter from the President of the Royal Society, in which similar approval was expressed. They had now to deal with a practical measure, and he trusted that their Lordships would deal with the subject practically, and not be thrown off the scent by the red herring which was now being drawn across the path of the Bill.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET only hoped the magistrates would be able to do that which it appeared neither the General

The Marquess of Lansdowne

Medical Council nor the Legislature were able to do—to define that which might or might not be done—otherwise it might go hard with a farmer who destroyed a wasp's nest.

LORD WINMARLEIGH pointed out that destroying a wasp's nest was a positive act of destruction, and not an experiment on a living animal; and the destruction of animals wholesale would not be done as an experiment.

LORD RAYLEIGH moved, as an Amendment in sub-section 1, to leave out from ("advancement") to ("suffering") and insert ("of medical or physiological knowledge.")

LORD COLERIDGE: My Lords, I do not desire to stop for a moment the progress of a Bill, in the success of which I feel so deep an interest, by any unnecessary speaking. But I wish in the fewest possible words to tender my thanks to the noble Earl for a measure, humane indeed, yet wise and temperate, and practical in its humanity, and to entreat him, if he will allow me, to stand firm to the main outlines of the Bill, and to resist all attempts to change its essential character. Some of the Amendments which have been suggested would, if carried, make the Bill valueless in my eyes; indeed, I would rather see it lost than see it carried with some of those Amendments. Better a thousand times the present state of things, with the aroused and increasing indignation of a people, sometimes coarse and brutal, no doubt, as some portions of all great multitudes will be, but never deliberately cruel, never turning away from the appeal, even if it be the mute appeal, of suffering and oppressed creatures;—better this, than a recognition by the Legislature of the moral lawfulness of inflicting torture for any but the very highest objects, and in the fewest instances, and a law which would be rather an encouragement to the vivisector than a protection to his victims. It is of vital consequence that this Bill should be a real effective measure—a real step in the direction in which its advocates mean to go. For a Bill of this kind, and the feeling which generates a Bill of this kind, cannot be produced every year. Whatever passes will be treated by many men as a present settlement of the question. The inert force of that large mass of men who wish to leave things alone, or do not take the trouble to understand or to care about a question, a force the weight of which can hardly be over-rated by any practical man who has to run counter to it; this force will be strengthened by the passing of any Bill whatever, and will greatly aid the opposition of those comparatively few men of ability and intelligence who now actively oppose the regulation even, as well as the abolition, of cutting up animals alive. So much by way of general entreaty to the noble Earl. Next, as to this particular Amendment, I may say that, individually, I have that true respect for the noble Earl, and so much confidence in his intentions and his judgment, that if he thinks it, on the whole, wise to accept it, I shall certainly not trouble the House by dividing against him. But what is the main and great object of the present Bill—its characteristic, its essence? I apprehend, speaking for the moment without the qualifications (which, nevertheless, I do not forget), it is to prevent by law the infliction of torments upon living creatures. Experiments themselves are only to be allowed for certain definite objects. As a rule, in all experiments, insensibility is to exist in the subject during their performance, and as a rule they are to be performed only for the prolongation of human life, or the alleviation of human suffering. This limitation, as I understand the Amendment of the noble Lord (Lord Rayleigh), it is proposed to relax. Now, for my own part, I must confess, that, the more I think about it, the less I am satisfied that we have the moral right, which is assumed, to torture animals for the benefit of mankind. At least it seems to me more and more certain that the exercise of this right, if it exists, should be restrained within the narrowest practicable limits; and that it should never be done, except in what is, perhaps, a legal phrase, but none the worse for that, whenever it is reasonably necessary. I have heard it indeed denied, and denied on very high authority, that there is any justice to be observed by us towards animals, on the ground that there is nothing correlative on their parts towards us, and that they have been given over absolutely into our dominion. I will not embark your Lordships or myself in a discussion on the metaphysic of morality, but, granting that they have been given to us, or, what comes to the same thing as far as they are concerned, that we have taken them absolutely into our power; and granting that we cannot be unjust towards them in the strict sense of the word, all this does not absolve us from our moral duties towards them, of which the plainest and simplest of all is, that we should never needlessly torture them. What do we know about them? We do not know their life; we cannot describe their interests; we cannot foretell their destiny. Whether they have reason, or responsibility, we do not know. Some men doubt whether they have feeling in the sense that we have, as they seem to have no reflection and no foresight. Whether they perish altogether, appeared to so great a man as Butler to be at least far from certain. I presume, therefore, to doubt extremely whether we know enough of them to conclude that we have the absolute right of torturing them, even for our own direct benefit. I doubt whether, if it were certain that by putting 1,000 horses to death in slow and hideous torments, we could prolong the life of a man or of men for a few hours or a few days—I doubt much if it would be justifiable so to torture 1,000 horses. I believe, if I spoke my whole mind, I should say, that I do not doubt that it would be clearly and abominably wrong. This rule of what we may do with creatures in our power for our own benefit, we ourselves being the judges, may be very convenient, but is undoubtedly capable of dangerous extension. Dogs and cats were described as carnivorous animals of great value for purposes of research. Well, dogs and cats cannot be heard against the scientific accuracy of the definition. But what as to slaves? More than 2,000 years ago Aristotle called them “living tools.” And in the lifetime of the youngest Peer in your Lordships’ House, in a great, allied, and Christian country, at least in a great part of it, it was hardly an exaggeration to say they were as completely chattels, and had as few legal rights as chairs or tables. They were held in absolute dominion. Could they have been lawfully (I mean in morality) put to cruel torture for the purpose of prolonging the life or alleviating the suffering of the superior race? Most certainly not. The whole voice of civilized mankind would have returned a fierce and angry negative to any such insulting question. This theory of the rights resulting from absolute dominion must, it seems, have some stern limitation put upon it. But further still. In the lofty and spiritual philosophy of the great Bishop to whom I have already alluded, our bodies are called masses of matter in which we are nearly interested. I suppose that other bodies would have been described by him as masses of matter in which we are not so nearly interested. And, if the prevailing views of the opponents of this Bill be correct, and are to be acted on, there is no limit, except that of power, by which we should be restrained from operating for our own benefit, and for the advancement of science, on the bodies of others—these masses of matter in which we have not so near an interest as our own. If the principles on which these limitations are resisted become widespread and effective, if science is the great object, if advance in knowledge—genuine if you will, and honestly pursued if you please—is to justify all cruelty in ourselves and all suffering in others which advance, or tend to advance, real knowledge, depend on it you will find that not only in reason, but in fact, men and women will not long be respected as subjects for scientific experiments, and, if the end justifies the means, I do not know why they should be. There is a frightful letter in The Examiner of this week, signed by Mr. Maitland, the statements of which, as regards our hospitals, if well founded, would go to show that poor men and women are not now respected by scientific men, but are regarded, like cats and dogs, as animals of great value for purposes of research. I hope and pray that these statements may prove to be exaggerated or unfounded. But, unless you tell scientific men that, as a rule, it is unlawful to inflict tortures for the sake of research, the statements of that letter will soon be neither unfounded nor exaggerated. I need not say, therefore, that the Amendment of the noble Lord, as far as my own judgment goes, is one that I would strenuously oppose. But I repeat that I shall not dispute the judgment at which the noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies may finally arrive. I have detained your Lordships too long; but there is another matter which seems to me of consequence to say, and I should be glad to be allowed to say it. I hope and pray that your Lordships will not be either alarmed or misled by the argument which, in Parliament and out of it, has been used against the Bill, drawn from the alleged cruelty of certain field-sports; and from the pain inflicted upon numbers of the males of many agricultural animals by practices familiar to us all. I must frankly say, that some field-sports do appear to be to me detestably cruel; and that, perhaps, in a perfect state of the word we should all learn—

With sorrow of the meanest thing that feels.”

I do not, however, think that all sport is cruel; and I know well enough that, if it were, what Mr. Windham said 70 years ago is true to day—namely, that cruel sports do not make cruel men. Admit, however, all that is said on this subject, and I cannot see the sense or follow the logic of it. Where is the sense, where is the logic, of saying to a practical man—“You must not try to put down this, not because it is not cruel, but because you are not at the same time trying to put down that, which is cruel too?” My answer is, that I do what I can; and that, if ever the time arrives when the great majority of mankind think the practices I have spoken of as cruel as they think the practices which it is the object of this Bill to prevent, they will then put down those practices without the smallest hesitation. Oh, but says an opponent, this is “fancy” legislation; sometimes the expression is “partial” legislation. As to fancy legislation, I must observe, that calling bad names does not advance the argument a single step; and, as to partial legislation, my answer is, that all legislation is in a sense necessarily partial; you cannot do everything, any more than you can say everything, at once. The one question for a man of sense to answer is this—Is the thing right in itself to do? I cannot conceive any one who has read the Report of the Royal Commission, or the evidence for instance of Dr. Klein, answering that question except in the affirmative. If so, we reply that we mean to do it, and do it now. My Lords, I know how very easily a clever cynic may turn all this into fun. Nothing is easier to do. Nothing in its proper place and at its proper time is more amusing or more delightful than to hear such a man humourously laughing at anything tinged with imagination and enthusiasm. It is true that you may, as it has been said, so speak of earth, that it grows more earthy, so speak of Heaven that it recedes from view. But surely my Lords, keen pain and long-drawn agony, even in the meanest of God’s creatures, are not convenient matters for a jest; and I am very sure that in your Lordships’ House, whatever conclusions are arrived at, will be the issue of grave and serious argument, and that, as the cause is worthy of your Lordships, so your Lordships will be worthy of the cause.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL said, that as he had himself given Notice of an Amendment almost identical with that which had been moved by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Rayleigh), he wished to say a few words in its support. He hoped to be able to convince the noble Earl who had introduced this Bill that if he intended to make it a practical and effective measure he must accept some such Amendment as that now before the Committee. In drawing up a measure of this kind it was above all things necessary that it should be plain and intelligible—such that those who had to administer the law would be able to apply, and which need not remain a dead letter on the Statute Book; and he trusted that the noble Earl would act upon the practical principle of doing all the good which he could, even although it might not be all that he wished to do. This was exactly the position in which the Royal Commission found themselves. Their object was to do what they could to do away with the torture of animals in experiments, entirely where it was possible to do so, and to reduce it to the smallest amount in cases where it could not be altogether abolished. In arriving at the conclusion they had done on the subject they had not been governed by medical opinion or by mere scientific opinion. The noble and learned Lord who had last spoken (Lord Coleridge) appeared altogether to have omitted from his consideration the recommendation of the Commission that anæsthetics should be employed in all cases where they could possibly be had recourse to. That was the key to the whole question. If in the Royal Commission they had occupied their time in discussing the metaphysics of morality—in examining the relations of man to the lower animals as regarded by Aristotle—or in considering with Bishop Butler the possible existence of the lower animals in a future state—they would have made little progress in the practical duty confided to them by the Crown. That duty was to assist the Legislature in framing enactments which without retarding the progress of discovery for the benefit of man, might put the closest attainable limit upon the suffering inflicted upon the lower animals. The real question for their Lordships would be whether or not the Bill would be improved and rendered more welcome by the adoption of the Amendment, which would render its construction more easy to those who would have to work under it and who would have to carry it into execution. It was most desired by those who were anxious on the side of humanity that the measure should be above all things practicable. It would be very hard for a Court or a magistrate to distinguish between the motives of persons who made these experiments, but very easy to determine whether due recourse had been had to anæsthetics. The Report of the Commissioners showed that great discoveries had been made where the experiments had not been conducted for medical purposes; but should the experiments be restricted on that account? The discoveries of Harvey did not appear to have been arrived at by experiments which would be within the Bill as it stood. His were mere scientific experiments; but would they on that account have prevented the discovery of the circulation of the blood? The Commissioners had before them the great experiments performed by Dr. Ferriar and Dr. Crichton Brown. But for the use of anæsthetics these experiments would have inflicted the most horrible tortures, but by their use they were performed apparently without pain; but no one could say whether, under the wording of this Bill, they were physiological or medical experiments. One of the operators spoke of them in one sense in his evidence and one in the other. But, as he had pointed out, the greatest discoveries of science had not been made under the conditions of this Bill, and therefore he hoped their Lordships would adopt the Amendment.

The EARL OF CARNARVON said, that there were three Amendments proposed to this clause, which were substantially the same; and in reference to them he would say at once that the Government would agree to the clause being so far altered as to admit of physiological inquiries being carried on. He admitted that the Bill was a penal measure, and that therefore it was essential to make perfectly clear all processes of law that might be required to carry out its provisions; but the Government would accept no Amendment which they thought would render the essential clauses of the measure one whit less effective than they now were; but after careful and repeated consideration he believed that it was possible to admit physiological inquiries into the same category as medical inquiries. What they had to look to was this—whether the Bill was stringent and effective for its purpose, and if so, whether they might not with comparative safety discard the question of the intention of the party in conducting the experiment. In certain cases it would be extremely difficult to say whether the inquiries were physiological or medical; and if the existing words were left in the clause they might perhaps create doubt and uncertainty. On the whole, he might say that of the three Amendments he preferred that of the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Cardwell). There were some Amendments which attacked the principle of the Bill, and there were others which concerned the particular interests of professional gentlemen. As to those which went to the vitality of the Bill, nothing would induce the Government to make any alteration; whilst as to the others, the Government would be anxious to meet the views which were put forward.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that the position of the noble and learned Lord (Lord Coleridge) would alter the principle of the Bill, because he said that we had no right to inflict pain upon any animal whatever. The noble and learned Lord referred to horses; but if we had no right to inflict pain upon horses, what was to become of the Cavalry? No one would deny that the firing of horses was a most painful operation. When any of their Lordships got ill they sent for Sir James Paget or Sir William Gull, and paid them to get the benefit of knowledge which had been acquired from experiments upon living animals. Now, it savoured of hypocrisy to pay for this knowledge, and then to legislate to prevent it being acquired. The very men who were now legislating against scientific men were the men who had profited by their science, and he thought that instead of visiting them with censure and reproach, they ought rather to propose to them a vote of thanks.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH agreed that they had no right to inflict unnecessary pain upon animals; but it was very difficult to decide what was unnecessary pain. The destruction of wasps and other animals had been referred to; but, on the other hand, there was the case of the wretched man who was convicted of skinning cats alive, because the skins were more valuable when taken from the live than the dead animal. The extra money got the man a dinner. The solution of all these questions must be left to the practical common sense of an English jury. He preferred the Amendment of the noble Viscount to that proposed by the noble Lord (Lord Rayleigh), because the form would limit the experiments, so that whenever a discovery had been fully ascertained it could not be repeated. This would prevent the repetition of it for the mere purposes of instruction of experiments on living animals in reference to physical facts and phenomena which had already been settled. Such practices could not but have a demoralizing effect.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL observed, that the sub-section restricted nothing and prevented nothing—the element of intention would remain precisely where it was. Its value was that it was a declaration on the part of Parliament as to the intention with which certain experiments ought to be performed, and the only intention which could possibly justify them. He was glad that the noble Lord opposite had accepted the Amendment of his noble Friend the Chairman of the Commission; it should be remembered that there were not only humane but conscientious men engaged occasionally in the work of vivisection, and it would be a serious grievance to them, as a matter of conscience, if the clause were allowed to remain unaltered. He rejoiced greatly that the arguments of his noble Friend had led to the acceptance of the words he proposed, for they placed the clause on a satisfactory basis.

THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH suggested that the case of veterinary surgeons ought not to be overlooked. These gentlemen were not less interested in the progress of physiological science than those in other branches, and he thought experiments ought to be permitted with a view to the advancement by new discovery of knowledge, which would be useful for prolonging or alleviating animal as well as human life or suffering.

EARL FORTESCUE said, that curative processes as regarded animals ought to be considered and provided for as well as curative processes as regarded human life, and the same words ought therefore to be used in the case of veterinary, as of other, surgeons.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said that the word “physiological” would cover and include experiments on animals having for their object the saving of the lives of animals.

Amendment, by leave of the Committee, withdrawn.

Then it was moved, in line 25, after (“of”) to insert (“physiological or medical,”) and after (“knowledge”) to insert (“or of knowledge.”)—(The Viscount Cardwell.)

Then the 1st sub-section agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE drew attention to the 2nd sub-section, which provided that experiments must be performed in a registered place. The effect of the provision would be to limit and obstruct useful and beneficial discoveries. He suggested that the Government should modify the requirements of the Bill in this respect.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY regarded the limitation as an outrage on the learned Professions affected by it. It treated them with great mistrust to say that they should not only be licensed themselves, but that they should perform their experiments in registered places only.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL observed that the highest authorities before the Commissioners recommended inspection, and inspection could not be made unless the places were known and recognized. The medical witnesses before the Commission did not object to this provision.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, the Bill made no distinction between two very different classes of painful experiments—vivisection proper, which was the subject of all the Petitions which had been presented to the House, and the exhibition, as medical men called it, or administration of drugs to animals for the purpose of ascertaining their effects. Now, where drugs were so administered it might be desirable that the animal should be allowed to pursue its ordinary course of life, and not be shut up in one place: but the restriction to a registered place seemed to refer exclusively to the case of vivisection proper. Some of the greatest men who had ever lived had been cut off by diseases of which nothing was known either as to their causes or as to the agents by which they might be prevented or cured. Their Lordships would be rendering an essential service to humanity by recognizing the title of the profession to ascertain the effect of drugs upon animals, and that without any unnecessary restriction. When drugs were administered, it was not necessarily for the purpose of destroying life; in many cases it was most desirable that the animal should recover, and be restored to its natural life.

LORD WINMARLEIGH said, the members of the medical Profession who gave evidence before the Commission did not object to inspection. His own opinion was, that there ought to be as much liberty as possible given for the carrying out of such experiments consistently with a due regard for the object of the Bill, and the prevention of its misuse.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY pointed out that the General Medical Council of the United Kingdom in their memorial to the Government objected in the strongest possible way to this limitation of experiments to registered places.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the point for the consideration of the particular question under discussion had not been reached. In another part of the Bill words might be proposed to the effect that any person holding a licence under the Act, might, in any place, licensed or not, administer drugs to animals for the purpose spoken of by the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll). But if the restriction in this sub-section were rejected, they really might as well give up the Bill altogether. If they did not know the place in which the act of vivisection was to be done, how could the inspection recommended be made? But they would be doing the worst possible thing for the medical profession if their Lordships struck out the restriction in question. The result would be that the Secretary of State would only have the character and trustworthiness of the person seeking the licence to rely on, and he would be placed in the invidious position of giving to those who were known to be men of honour, and withholding from those of whom nothing was known, whereas under the clause as it stood, the Secretary of State would, besides that of character, have the further protection which would be afforded by the licence of the place. In the interest of the medical Profession, therefore, it was desirable that the place where vivisection was to be performed should be registered.

LORD RAYLEIGH feared that very valuable medical and surgical work would be lost if the restriction in question were insisted on. He suggested that in certain cases only a second certificate should be given.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON asked whether anything could be more invidious than that the Secretary of State should be compelled to say "Sir William Gull" or "Sir James Paget, I know you and can trust you to carry out experiments anywhere," and to other gentlemen, "I do not know you, and cannot trust you unless with a limited certificate." The honour and status of the Medical Profession would not be upheld by such a provision.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH earnestly trusted that the provision would not be given up by which a knowledge of the place in which the experiments were to be performed was secured.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON reminded their Lordships that there was no Amendment before the House. He was aware that a large proportion of the Medical Profession objected to the provision in question. At the same time it was the keystone of the Bill, and if it were given up the measure would virtually be at an end. The noble Earl opposite said that the Medical Profession regarded the restriction as an outrage.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that that was his own opinion; but the opposition to registered places emanated from the Medical Council.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON could not see how the provision could possibly be so regarded. As had been pointed out, if the Secretary of State had not the security of registered places he should have that of known character, and a great responsibility and most invidious duty would thus be thrown upon him. The Secretary of State had accepted in this matter a great responsibility, and it ought not to be increased, as it would be by the adoption of this Amendment. So long as these places were registered, so long, by means of inspection and the other guarantees provided, we should have an effective control; but the moment these places were unregistered control vanished. No matter how conscientious the Secretary of State might be, it was impossible he could exercise the control which the Bill contemplated, and without which it would be nothing at all. The worst cases of abuse had occurred, not in public institutions, but in private lodgings, and these cases could be met only by maintaining carefully and effectively this particular clause. He should be sorry to see it weakened in the slightest degree.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that if this sub-section were to be omitted, the Bill might as well be abandoned at once. The evidence went to show that the practices in question were carried on in garrets, bedrooms, cellars, and other places difficult of access. With all respect for the Medical Profession, there was another party to this question. Some regard ought to be paid to the strong feelings of many persons who contended that on moral and religious principles vivisection ought to be prohibited absolutely, and who had consented for a time to a Bill of restrictions because they believed the Government would take every security that the Bill should be effectively enforced. If this condition were struck out, the Bill would give no satisfaction to the country.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET urged that the sub-section would interfere with the experimental treatment of diseased or injured animals for their own relief or cure, and that, by retarding or preventing such treatment, it would prolong or increase their sufferings.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, it never could be imagined that the sub-section would prevent the application of a particular remedy to an animal for its own sake in any place where it might be.

Second sub-section agreed to.

Then the other sub-sections and provisions agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Use of urari as an anæsthetic prohibited).

LORD HENNIKER moved an Amendment to leave out the words ("for the purposes of this Act be deemed to be anæsthetic"), and to insert ("be used upon any wounded animal.") He said, the Amendment was due to a certain extent to the physiologists themselves, for the discussions by the Medical Council, the Medical Association, and in The Medical Journal had caused an inquiry into this clause. It was argued that what science left unsettled—namely, the anæsthetic qualities of curare, should not be settled by law. If it were sought to settle such a question by law, he would admit there was something in the objection, but the clause only said curare was not to be considered an anæsthetic "for the purposes of this Act," and so in no way could it be said that it did so. The Medical Council wished to insert the words, "until proved to be so." If these words were put in, who was to be the person to decide the question? He thought the opinion of the Royal Commissioners ought to be sufficient to show the necessity for this clause. They said in their Report—

"It has, however, been positively stated by perhaps the highest authority on such a subject, Claude Bernard, to have no effect in producing insensibility to pain."

The Amendment which he wished to propose conceded the point, however, but added to the clause. He hoped the noble Earl and the House would accept it, for it would be a popular one out-of-doors. The 4th clause did not absolutely prohibit the use of curare, for it might be used under the clauses allowing experiments to be performed without anæsthetics, and this substance, probably, would, when it came to carrying out the Act, be often used. The Amendment did not absolutely prohibit the use of curare. It would not do so where stillness was required and where no pain was inflicted—as, for instance, the placing of the frog's foot, or the fish's tail under the microscope, nor in some experiments on large vertebrate animals. He could not help saying that if there were a doubt as to curare being an anæsthetic, he thought the benefit of the doubt ought to be given to the animals. He could show, however, that curare was anything but an anæsthetic. It was true some physiologists had referred vaguely to its effect, but they could not refer to any authority on the subject. Drs. Klein, Brunton, and Sibson had, for instance, in Questions 3,755, 4,759, and 5,793 referred to Professor Schiff in support of their theory. It was true Schiff had used curare on a frog in the spring; when it was in a half-dormant state, he had been able to give it an extreme dose of curare at such a time, a dose which would have killed any other animal, and it had become an anæsthetic; besides, it must be remembered that a frog respired through its skin, and what might be an anæsthetic in such a case could not be so with other animals. To show exactly what Schiff thought on this subject, he must quote a passage from his last published work—Sopra il metodo seguito negli esperimenti sugli Animali Viventi, and he thought his Amendment could have no better support. At page 34, he said—translated into English—

“In experiments such as we have described we use curare as a means of preventing the disturbance which the movements of the animal might cause us, but we have read with extreme regret that in some modern articles on the subject curare has been recommended as an anæsthetic in experiments upon animals. We have read the description of certain experiments requiring great mutilation of the animal, which were performed under the influence of slight curarization. I can here only entreat my colleagues, as I have already done before, to consider well the above reasoning. Not to allow themselves to be imposed upon by the apparent impassibility, and never to use curare as an anæsthetic except in cases where the wound is slight, and the irritation of a nature to provoke only moderate sensation. In experiments on the blood pressure, curare acts solely as a tranquillizer, which, impeding movement, hides the pain from the observer. And it is nothing but hypocrisy to wish to impose on oneself, and others, the belief that the curarized animal never feels pain.”

He need not quote any further opinions on this subject. He would have been glad to have quoted a passage from a Paper on Curare, by Claude Bernard, not in the Blue Book of the Royal Commission; but he had already, perhaps, taken up too much of their Lordships' time, and he thought he had made his case for an amendment of the clause good.

Amendment moved, lines 4 and 5 (“for the purposes of this Act be deemed to be an anæsthetic”) and insert (“be used upon any wounded animal.”)—(The Lord Henniker.)

THE EARL OF CARNARVON thought it best to keep the clause in its present form. If there were any experiments in which its use might be beneficial, a separate clause would be the best way of providing for it.

Amendment, by leave of the Committee, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 (Absolute prohibition of painful experiments on dogs and cats).

THE EARL OF HARROWBY moved to include in the prohibition, “or horse, or ass, or mule.”

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL moved, in page 3, line 8, to add—

“But nothing in this section shall prevent a person holding a license under this Act from administering to a dog or a cat drugs or medicines with a view to ascertain their effect in the cure or treatment of disease, or with a view to the detection of crime.”

THE EARL OF AIRLIE objected to the clause altogether. He thought no one could read the Report of this Commission without seeing that medical science had been advanced by experiments made upon living animals. Only one witness before the Commission supported the prohibition of experiments on cats and dogs—Dr. Hutton—and with regard to what Dr. Hutton laid down—namely, that you were not justified in inflicting pain on lower animals whatever benefit accrued, he (the Earl of Airlie) confessed that—without underrating the sufferings of these poor creatures—he could not put dogs and cats in the scale when there was a chance of saving the lives of men, women, and children. Dr. Taylor told them that the effect of poison on a dog was very similar to that on a human being. Those persons who spoke of the infliction of pain on dogs and cats as demoralizing to the person who inflicted it looked only at the pain and not at the results of the experiment. He should have been glad to have been able to have supported the Amendment of the noble Duke, but in his opinion it was not sufficient to meet the case.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON thought the Amendment moved by the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) was somewhat unnecessary. The Bill was not rigidly confined to experiments with the knife, for the whole scope of it included drugs and medicines. He did not, therefore, feel disposed to accept the Amendment as it stood. In legislating on such a subject as that now before them, the Committee must look more to public sentiment than to strict logic. The dog especially had always been regarded as something more than a mere animal—he had been looked upon as the companion and the friend of man, into whose affections he had wormed himself. The cat also was regarded as a household pet. It was a fact that these two animals were most susceptible to pain, and that experiments performed upon them frequently inflicted most exquisite torture. He knew of an eminent physiologist and an eminent doctor, who, at different periods of their lives, had performed vivisectional operations upon the dog or cat, and he would state to their Lordships what were their experiences. In the one instance the impression made upon the operator's mind was such as to haunt him for months afterwards, and he declared that no circumstances would induce him again to perform an experiment of that kind. In the other case, the gentleman who had witnessed a similar operation determined that nothing would tempt him to witness such an experiment again. Physiologists, however, stated that there were certain valuable experiments which could only be performed upon the dog and the cat, and he had felt bound to take that fact into consideration. Under all the circumstances of the case his proposal was that whenever it was absolutely necessary that such an experiment should be made upon dogs and cats, it should be made not only under all the guarantees and provisions of the Bill relating to other animals, but that it should only be made in special cases, for which special reasons should be assigned, and for which the consent of the Home Secretary should be specially required. He proposed to amend the clause by inserting after the word "cat" the following words:—

"Except on such certificate being given as in this Act mentioned, and that for reasons specified in such certificate and where the object of the experiment would be necessarily frustrated unless it is made on an animal similar in constitution to a dog or a cat, and no other animal is available for the experiment."

He had no objection to include horses, asses, and mules in the same category with dogs and cats. On the whole he thought it would be best to defer this branch of the question for the present, and he would, therefore, bring it forward again on the Report.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL expressed his willingness to accept the proposal of the noble Earl, which he thought would meet the views that had been stated in the discussion.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that if they would pass the clause in its present form he would endeavour to bring up an Amendment on the Report which would meet the views of their Lordships.

Then Amendment (The Duke of Argyll) by leave, withdrawn; Amendment (The Earl of Carnarvon) agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 11 (Certificates of scientific bodies for exceptions to general regulations.)

THE EARL OF CARNARVON moved to add the President of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, the President of the Royal Irish Academy, the President of the General Medical Council, Dublin, and the President of the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons of Glasgow.

THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH moved that the President of the Royal Veterinary College be also added.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, it must be recollected that there was a College of Veterinary Surgeons as well as a Royal Veterinary College, and if the name of the President of one were inserted, he did not see how the latter could be left out. The President of the Royal Veterinary College was the Commander-in-Chief, and it would be rather curious if His Royal Highness should have to give a certificate to Sir James Paget authorizing him to make an experiment. If the noble Earl, however, would allow the matter to stand over it should be considered by his noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) before the Report.

LORD HENNIKER supported the Amendment. He was quite convinced of the importance of giving a better training to veterinary surgeons, and it seemed to him that it might do some good and could do no harm to give the powers proposed by this clause to the Presidents of Veterinary Colleges.

THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH said, he would leave the matter in the hands of the noble Earl.

Amendment agreed to.

On the Motion of the Earl of CARNARVON, in page 4, line 22, after "anatomy" the words "medical jurisprudence materia medica" were inserted.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET moved, in page 4, line 27, after "charter," to add "or a duly recognized Medical School."

THE EARL OF CARNARVON objected to the Amendment as being rather too vague.

Amendment, by leave of the Committee, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Monday next; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 131.)

(NO. 90.) SECOND READING.

LORD HENNIKER, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, he would not trouble their Lordships with a lengthened statement on the Bill at that hour in the evening. It had passed the House of Commons without opposition, he believed, and it was more a question for discussion in Committee than on the second reading, when he should, probably, move Amendments, and would explain any point which any noble Lord might wish gone into. The objects of the Bill were to consolidate and amend the present law, to give certain advantages to Industrial and Provident Societies which Friendly Societies enjoyed under the Friendly Societies Act of last year, and which the Industrial and Provident Societies would have enjoyed now if the original Friendly Societies Bill of 1874 had become law. So far it gave effect to the intentions of Her Majesty's Government.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

House adjourned at Nine o'clock, to Thursday next, half-past Ten o'clock.

THE SLAVE TRADE—MOZAMBIQUE. QUESTION.

MR. W. HOLMS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any Report has been received from Captain Elton, Her Majesty's Consul for Mozambique, of seven dhows, containing two hundred and fifty slaves a-piece, having sailed from under an armed fort at Mozambique, while a Portuguese man of war lay at anchor at the entrance of the harbour, as reported in "The Times" newspaper for February 19th, 1876?

MR. BOURKE: No report of the nature alluded to has been received from Captain Elton. I have looked into The Times of the 19th of February and find no such statement as that contained in the Question. Nothing about a fort is mentioned in The Times, and so far from the Portuguese man-of-war taking no notice of the dhows, as the Question would imply and impute to the Portuguese Government, the statement in The Times distinctly says the Portuguese man-of-war gave chase. The fact is, no report has been received of the kind mentioned in the Question. Several captures have been made of dhows sailing from Portuguese waters. There is no doubt, also, that dhows do escape from Portuguese waters. No doubt, the Portuguese Force is inadequate to deal with the slave trade, but we have been actively co-operating with the Portuguese to suppress the slave trade, and have acted in conjunction with the Portuguese in Portuguese waters on several occasions lately. We are doing what we can to suppress the slave trade in the Mozambique Channel.

DEFECTIVE RETURNS.

QUESTION.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA asked the Secretary to the Treasury. Whether his attention has been called to the defective nature of the Return lately issued, purporting amongst other things to set forth the number of Banks in England which have become bankrupt or stopped payment, for every year from 1st January 1844 to the 1st July 1875, being a Return to an Address of this House of 19th of July 1875; and, whether hon. Members may expect to receive an amended Return, and when?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes, Sir; my attention has been called by the Question of the hon. Gentleman to the defective character of the Return; but the Treasury is not in any way responsible for the Return. The Order of the House was addressed to another Department, and the Return laid on the Table by another Department. I will communicate with the officials of that Department, and endeavour to give him more information.

OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked what would be the Business on Thursday? The right hon. Gentleman stated that the Prisons Bill would be taken, but he left the matter in some doubt.

MR. DISRAELI: I stated, in indicating the course of Business this week, that on Thursday we proposed moving the second reading of the Prisons Bill; whereupon the hon. Baronet (Sir Walter Barttelot) suggested that that should be postponed in consequence of the impending meeting of the courts of quarter sessions, and I stated I would consider the point. I have considered it, and I must say I see no cause to change the original plan of the Government. Had it been a Motion to go into Committee on the Prisons Bill I should have recognized at once the validity of the objection, for no doubt the courts of quarter sessions are very competent to make, and may make, very valuable suggestions on matters of detail; but as the Motion on Thursday is for the second reading of the Bill, involving the principle on which it is founded, it appears to me the discussion would rather facilitate the discussion of details by the quarter sessions, because they will then become acquainted with the real scope of the measure. Under the circumstances, I shall adhere to the plan which I announced yesterday, and on Thursday we propose to move the second reading of the Prisons Bill.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Is there to be a Morning Sitting on Friday?

MR. DISRAELI: Yes, there will be a Morning Sitting on that day.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE wished to know whether a day was fixed for the second reading of the Cambridge University Bill?

MR. DISRAELI: I assumed that it was the general feeling that we should not advance in our plans of business beyond a week. It is held that that is the best course to pursue, and, generally speaking, that towards the end of the Session it would be advisable for those who are responsible for the conduct of Business to mention at the beginning of the week the course of Business for that period.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE asked whether the second reading of the Cambridge Bill would be taken before going into Committee on the Oxford Bill?

MR. DISRAELI believed that arrangement was acceded to by all parties—it was a general understanding.

COMMONS BILL—[BILL 184.]

(Mr. Assheton Cross, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson)

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE asked what the Government intended to do in reference to the inclosure schemes which had been sanctioned by the Inclosure Commissioners, and which were at present under the consideration of the House?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, it was his intention that these schemes, having passed the Inclosure Commissioners, should be referred to Mr. Caird to report on them to the House whether any of them ought to go on or not. After further consideration, he thought all those schemes had better come under the operation of the present Bill and begin de novo. He was bound to say it was a question fairly to be considered whether the Treasury might not be asked to refund the money deposited by those who promoted these schemes.

MR. FAWCETT said, the statement just made by the right hon. Gentleman would be received with much satisfaction both within and out of the House.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE moved, after Clause 14, to insert the following Clause:—

“In any application to grant an injunction against the inclosure of land when it is upon the hearing of the case proved that the same is common or commonable, it shall not be necessary that the applicant should have rights of common in the same.”

The object of the clause was merely to render security against illegal inclosures more easily obtainable.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the said Clause be now read a second time.”

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he did not think the clause necessary, and considered it would, if accepted, practically interfere with private property. He did not think there would be any difficulty in getting a person who had a real interest in the common to set the law in motion.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he thought the clause desirable, and was prepared to support the Motion of the hon. Baronet.

MR. GREGORY, in opposing the clause, said, it would, if accepted, operate as a violation of the principle that whoever set the law in motion should have an interest in the matter. As the Bill now stood, sufficient security against any such course as the hon. Baronet apprehended was provided.

MR. BRISTOWE said, he had a somewhat kindred Motion on the Paper, and he was apprehensive, from the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had expressed himself, he would not receive it favourably. He should, however, submit it to the consideration of the House. He regretted that the Government could not accept the Amendment of the hon. Baronet.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, it did not strike him they would gain any advantage by adding the clause to the Bill.

MR. LEEMAN said, there was a distinction to be drawn between land that was commonable and other land. This clause proposed to deal not only with commons, but commonable land. If they passed this clause, they would give a perfect stranger a right to apply for an injunction against an inclosure.

MR. WHITWELL said, the sole object of this clause was to give persons who had certain privileges in connection with commons, without possessing an actual legal interest, an opportunity of opposing illegal inclosures, and he therefore supported it.

MR. FAWCETT said, that whatever technical objections might be made to the clause, it was intended to meet in a direct and practical way a great evil. It was said that the clause would produce no good, or little good, now that the Home Secretary had consented to refer such cases to the County Courts. But the difficulty in the case of such illegal inclosures was to find some one who, being a commoner, would undertake the responsibilities and bear the brunt and expense of an action to prevent such inclosures at the time they could be most successfully resisted. In the case of Epping Forest, the inhabitants of the metropolis would have lost the whole of that open space but for the mere accident of finding a commoner who had a legal interest in the forest willing to undertake the duty. The Bill of the Home Secretary gave no new security against illegal inclosures. What the hon. Member for Chelsea wanted was that the public should have the power to prevent such inclosures; and how could that clause be objected to by the Home Secretary, who admitted that the public had an interest in the preservation of these commons? The right hon. Gentleman himself admitted the principle in the case of village greens. Why not apply it also to commons?

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, the question was one of machinery to prevent illegal inclosures, and the proposals before the House went too far. Instead of giving a Roving Commission to anybody, whether he had an interest in the matter or not, it would be better to empower some constituted regular body—such, for instance, as the parish officers. If the clause was more restricted it would be more workable, and he hoped the hon. Member would not press it to a division.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he would not press his clause to a division if the Home Secretary held out any hope that a clause, however limited, aiming at the object of that now under discussion would be introduced. He had no objection to accept a limitation to freeholders residing in the parish. As the Home Secretary did not make any concession he should divide the House.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 91; Noes 178: Majority 87.

MR. BRISTOWE moved, after Clause 14, to insert the following Clause:—

“From and after the passing of this Act any person making, or procuring to be made, any illegal inclosure of a Common shall forfeit the sum of one hundred pounds to such person as will sue for the same: Provided, That no action for the recovery of such sum shall be brought after the expiration of one year from the date of the said inclosure.”

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the said Clause be now read a second time.”

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he hoped the hon. Member would not press the clause to a division, as the same objection would apply to it as to the clause which had just been rejected. Besides, it would make a man who believed he was exercising a legal right liable to a criminal prosecution for doing so.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE supported the clause, on the ground that if a man did an illegal act it was right he should be punished, and that the inclosures of the last 10 years were a public scandal.

MR. GREGORY said, the simple effect of the clause would be to make a man who might be mistaken in the assertion of a civil right liable to a criminal prosecution.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE also opposed the clause, which he considered was intended for the propagation of that most hateful class of vermin—common informers.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE said, a man in the exercise of what he thought a civil right might do a great injury to many persons, and ought to be punished if he acted illegally.

MR. GOLDNEY opposed the clause as vicious in principle, expressing his belief that if it were adopted, they would soon have to pass an amending Act to repeal it.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 95; Noes 188: Majority 93.

MR. SANDFORD moved, after Clause 18, to insert the following clause:—

(Notice of improvements or inclosures.)

“Where any person intends to approve or inclose, otherwise than under the provisions of this Act, the whole or any part of a Common or of the waste land of a manor, he shall, six months at least before commencing the improvement or inclosure, give notice of his intention to the Inclosure Commissioners, and furnish them with all such information and particulars as they may require; and if it should appear to such Inclosure Commissioners that there is good reason for resisting such improvement or inclosure, it shall be lawful for them to take all such legal proceedings and other steps as may be necessary for compelling the discontinuance of or for preventing such improvement or inclosure, in the same manner as if they were interested in such Common or waste as commoners, and any expenses incurred by them for this purpose shall be defrayed by them out of any moneys in their hands applicable to their general expenses.”

He justified the clause upon the ground that it was the practice of the lords of the manors to encroach upon the commons when they knew that the commoners were too poor to incur the expenses of a Chancery suit in resisting an encroachment of the kind. The clause would put the Commissioners in exactly the same position as the commoners, and they would thus have a legal right to resist those illegal inclosures.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was sorry to have to oppose those clauses one after the other, as there was not anyone more anxious than himself to provide against illegal inclosures; but there were great practical difficulties in the way, as it was impossible at the outset to distinguish between legal and illegal inclosures. Under those circumstances, all he could do was to give a summary jurisdiction in the matter to the County Courts; and he believed that would have the effect of putting an end to illegal inclosures without interfering with private rights. Again, he thought the House ought to hesitate before it sanctioned any payment out of the public purse for such litigation as that contemplated by this clause.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE believed that the charge upon public funds would be very slight, and he added that he thought that the clause, with some alterations, would meet the circumstances of the case.

MR. GOLDNEY thought it unwise to entrust to the Inclosure Commissioners such vague and indefinite powers, and to give them the command of the public purse in carrying them out. He reminded hon. Members that the clause was practically the same as one which had been rejected by a large majority when the Bill was in Committee.

MR. HERSCHELL thought that with a little alteration the proposed clause might be made a very useful and practical provision. When public rights were interfered with they should be protected by some public body, and such protection would be a perfectly legitimate object to which to apply public money.

MR. ASSHETON objected to the clause because it would either be useless or mischievous, and should therefore vote against it. A man who knew that his inclosure would be illegal would not give notice of it; whilst those who were doubtful about the matter would give notice in order to see whether or not any objection would be taken.

MR. FAWCETT believed that the Government had made up their minds to resist all improvement in the Bill. They had opposed this clause, which was the last of the many clauses on the Paper, designed to resist illegal inclosure. He wished to point out a very important consideration that had been omitted in the debate. The Bill professedly would greatly increase the difficulty of inclosure through Parliament, and therefore lords of the manor would have a strong inducement to resort to illegal means to carry out their object.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY considered the hon. Member for Hackney was not justified in saying there was an intention on the part of the Government to resist any proposal which would improve the Bill, because the Amendments proposed by himself and his Friends had been negatived. As regarded this particular clause, he did not see any objection to it, and thought the Commissioners would be a very good body to carry out the duties proposed to be imposed upon them. He did not think that it would be a bad appropriation of public money to devote it to the purpose of preventing illegal inclosures.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE suggested, on behalf of the hon. and learned Member for Durham (Mr. Herschell) that the clause should be amended by the alteration of the term of notice from six to three months, and the insertion of the words "in the interests of the public."

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, although the clause did not go so far as he should wish, and was not exactly in the form which he should desire, would nevertheless give it his hearty support.

MR. SANDFORD said, he would adopt the suggestions that had been made if the clause was accepted by the House.

Mr. Sandford

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 155; Noes 189: Majority 34.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE moved, after Clause 18, to insert the following clause:—

(Allotments for recreation and gardens.)

“The provisions of the Inclosure Acts 1845 to 1868 which authorize the Inclosure Commissioners to require allotments for exercise and recreation, and allotments for field gardens for the labouring poor to be made upon any inclosure of a Common which is waste of a manor, or subject to unrestricted rights of Common, shall extend to authorize them to require such allotments to be made upon any inclosure of Common which is not waste of a manor or subject to unrestricted rights of Common.”

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. WHEELHOUSE (for Sir HENRY PERK) moved, in page 16, after Clause 18, to insert the following clause:—

(Gravel digging.)

“After the passing of this Act, where any Common is regulated pursuant to this Act by a Provisional Order of the Inclosure Commissioners confirmed by Parliament, or is the subject of a scheme confirmed by Parliament under the provisions of ‘The Metropolitan Commons Act, 1866,’ or ‘The Metropolitan Commons Amendment Act, 1869,’ or (being situate within the Metropolitan police district) is the subject of any private or local Act of Parliament having for its object the preservation of such Common as an open space, no surveyor of highways or highway board constituted in pursuance of the Highway Acts, or trustees of any turnpike road, shall search for, dig, get, or carry away gravel, sand, stone, or other materials in or from such Common without the consent of the person or persons having the regulation or management of the same, or in default of such consent, without an order of two or more justices in petty sessions assembled, and acting in and for the petty sessional division in which such Common is situate, who may in their order prescribe such conditions as to mode of working and restitution of the surface as to them shall seem expedient.”

Clause brought up, and read the first and second time, amended, and added to the Bill.

(Field gardens to be free of rent-charge.)

“There shall be repealed so much of the Inclosure Acts 1845 to 1868 as relates to the charging of an allotment made for the purpose of a field garden with a rent-charge, and every such allotment made after the passing of this Act shall be made free of all charge.”

(Allotments for recreation grounds to be vested in churchwardens and overseers.)

“There shall be repealed so much of the Inclosure Acts 1845 to 1868 as provides that an allotment made for the purpose of a recreation ground may be allotted to any person entitled to an allotment under the inclosure, and every such allotment made after the passing of this Act shall be vested in the churchwardens and overseers for the time being of the parish in which the same shall be situate, and shall be held by them as provided by the Inclosure Acts 1845 to 1868.”

Clauses agreed to, and added to the Bill.

LORD HENRY SCOTT moved the following clause:—

(Six months' notice of claim to inclose to be given in the “London Gazette” and local papers.)

“Any person intending to inclose or approve a Common or part of a Common otherwise than under the provisions of this Act shall publish, at least six months beforehand, a notice of his intention to make such inclosure, for three successive times, in the “London Gazette” and in two or more of the principal local newspapers in the county, town, or district in which the Common or part of a Common proposed to be inclosed is situate.”

Clause brought up, and read the first and second time.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS accepted the principle of the clause, but suggested that three months' notice should be substituted for six months, and that The London Gazette should be struck out. It would also be desirable to add a Proviso that a copy of the newspaper should be evidence of the notice having been published.

Clause amended, and added to the Bill.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE moved in Clause 8, page 7, line 4, at end, to add—

“Provided, That the Inclosure Commissioners shall not entertain an application for the inclosure of a Common or a part of a Common which is situate in or within one mile of any town comprising a population which exceeds 5,000; or in or within two miles of any town comprising a population which exceeds 10,000; or in or within three miles of any town comprising a population which exceeds 20,000; or in or within four miles of any town comprising a population which exceeds 50,000; or in or within five miles of any town comprising a population which exceeds 100,000; or in or within six miles of any town comprising a population which exceeds 200,000. When part only of any Common subject to be inclosed is situate within the aforesaid distance from the town, such part shall be deemed for the purposes of this Act to be a distinct Common from the part which is not situate within the aforesaid distance from the town."

The right hon. Gentleman explained that he proposed the Proviso in substitution for the Amendment he had moved in Committee. The objection to that Amendment had been that it interfered with the general scope of the Bill. This Proviso possessed the advantage of harmonizing with the purposes of the Bill. It applied to principal towns the same regulations that existed in the metropolis under the Metropolitan Commons Act. Ten years' experience of this Act showed its application to be advantageous to the public, without infringing the rights of property.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the question had been practically discussed in the Committee, though not actually in the same form. The Government could not accept the Proviso, which was against the scheme of the Bill. He did not want to inclose those commons any more than the right hon. Gentleman did, but he must adhere to the scheme of the Bill, which allowed every common to stand upon its own merits. There was a clause empowering the authorities of any town interested in a common to appear before the Commissioners, and therefore unless there was a strong ground in favour of the inclosure it was not likely to be allowed.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE contended that the Amendment was in no way opposed to the spirit of the Bill. It simply secured to towns any vacant spaces to which they might be entitled, and was for the purpose of facilitating the establishment of town parks. He hoped that the words would be accepted by the Government.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 131; Noes 223: Majority 92.

MR. FAWCETT moved in Clause 12, page 13, after sub-section (7) to insert—

"(7a.) On a request in writing signed by 12 inhabitant ratepayers of the parish in which the Common is situate to which a draft Provisional Order relates (whether such ratepayers are persons legally interested in the Common or not), the Inclosure Commissioners shall cause a public meeting to be held by an Assistant Commissioner at a suitable time and place for securing the attendance of the neighbouring inhabitants to consider such draft Provisional Order; and the provisions in this Act contained relating to the notice to be given of public meetings held by the Assistant Commissioner, the conduct of such meetings, and the report to be made to the Inclosure Commissioners respecting such meetings, shall apply to meetings held to consider a draft Provisional Order: Provided, That, if it be so requested in the aforesaid written request, the said meeting shall be held in the evening between the hours of seven and ten of the clock."

His object was to enable the public to express its opinion upon any contemplated inclosure, not only before the conditions of the inclosure were known, but also after the Provisional Order had been issued.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS was unable to accept the Amendment, which he thought unreasonable. Under the Bill there was in the first instance to be had an inquiry before a Commissioner, when everybody would have an opportunity of stating his case, and then it was for the Commissioner in his quasi judicial capacity to form his conclusion. Then the Provisional Order would be sent down, and anybody might raise objections to it, the Inclosure Commissioners having power to modify the scheme.

MR. GREGORY moved, in Clause 12, page 14, line 20, to insert as sub-section 11—

(Supplemental power to modify Provisional Order after expediency certified.)

"If after the presentation to Parliament of a Report made by the Inclosure Commissioners certifying the expediency of any Provisional Order for the regulation or inclosure of a Common, and before a Bill has been brought in for the confirmation of such Order, such Report is referred to a Committee of either House of Parliament for consideration, and such Committee recommend that such Provisional Order should not be confirmed by Parliament except subject to certain modifications, the Inclosure Commissioners may modify the Provisional Order accordingly, but such modifications shall not be of any validity unless they are consented to in the same manner as if they had formed part of the draft Provisional Order originally deposited by the Commissioners;

"And it shall be the duty of the Commissioners to take the necessary steps for ascertaining whether such consent as aforesaid can be obtained or not, and if such consent be obtained, the Commissioners shall make a special report to the effect that the order has been modified as aforesaid and such consent duly obtained, and such report shall be presented to Parliament; and thereupon the order so modified shall be deemed to be in the same position in all respects as if it were an order in respect of which a report had been made by the Commissioners certifying the expediency thereof, and such report had been presented to Parliament."

Amendment agreed to.

Bill to be read the third time upon Thursday.

JURORS QUALIFICATION (IRELAND)

BILL—[BILL 127.]

(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland)

COMMITTEE.

Clause 1 agreed to.

MR. BUTT had put the following Amendment on the Paper, in page 3, line 13, at end, to add:—

"Provided also, That in any county of a city or county of a town, every person residing within such distance of twelve miles, computed as aforesaid, and who shall be a director or manager of any Banking, Railway, Insurance, Steamship, or Shipping Company incorporated by any Charter or Act of Parliament, and having an office or place of business within such county of a city or county of a town; or who shall be a director or manager of any other Company carrying on any trade or business for profit within such county of a city or county of a town; or who shall be a member of any Board or Harbour Commissioners or other body entrusted under the provisions of any Act of Parliament with the management of the port, harbour, or docks of such city or town; and in every such case the name and the residence of such juror shall be stated in the proper column, so as to describe both the office or place of business of the company or board to which he belongs, and also the place where he actually resides; and any summons for the attendance of such juror sent by post to the place so stated as his actual place of residence shall be deemed to be duly served."

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he proposed an Amendment similar to that of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, who was absent. It was to insert in the clause words—

"Providing that any person who should be a director or manager of any Banking, Railway, Insurance, Steamship, or Shipping Company, or any other Company incorporated by charter or under any Act of Parliament, or a Harbour or Dock Commissioner, should be liable to service as a juror."

Amendment agreed to.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reference to a complaint made by the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen) as to persons being liable for service in both county and borough, said, that his feeling was that those who were qualified in two places should be called upon to serve in both, but he would look into the particulars of the complaints of the hon. Member.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH proposed to leave out the words "Juries Procedure (Ireland) Act."

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN hoped the right hon. Baronet did not intend to drop the Juries Procedure Bill, and he sincerely hoped it would be passed this year.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, it was not his intention to drop it; but he did not want to refer in this Bill to another which was not yet law.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Schedule 1.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING moved, in page 5, line 6, to leave out "50," and insert "40." The former was too high, and in his own county alone—one of the best counties in Ireland—it would take off the list no less than 2,000 liable to serve as jurymen. He had looked carefully into Returns affecting this point, and he found that in five Unions in Cork there were on a rating of £30—which amounted in Ireland to a rental of £45—1,892 persons. If the increased rating of the Bill were adopted, those 1,892 persons would be reduced to 657—that was to say, two-thirds of those at present qualified to serve in the county of Cork would be struck off absolutely. Upon the evidence of the sheriff of the county of Cork 1,000 jurors would be required for the two Assizes and the different quarter sessions; but with the increased qualification it would be utterly impossible to get those jurors unless by having those qualified summoned a second time, which was not the object of the Bill. In the Committee on this very Bill there was no particular evidence in favour of the qualification being raised. The evidence was only of a general character, and he hoped that the Government would consent to the alteration from £50 to £40.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH thought the feeling of the Committee would be almost unanimous that there were very strong reasons for a considerable increase in the rating qualification of Irish jurors. The question really was, whether under the figures chosen in the Bill they would get a sufficient number of jurors? Returns on the Table showed that in Cork County there would be an ample number. In the county 2,220 jurors would be required, and according to the qualification fixed in the Bill for the occupation of lands, tenements, and hereditaments, there would be 3,695 persons available. Then under the household qualification there would be 1,785 more persons, making nearly double the number that was required. Under these circumstances he thought the Committee would be of opinion that, so far at all events as the county of Cork was concerned, the qualification was sufficiently low. He regretted that he could not accept the Amendment. If any reduction were made it would be better to make it in the value of the houses than the value of the lands, tenements, and hereditaments. The test of a man's capacity and intelligence was much more the house he lived in than the land he might occupy. ["No, no!"] In saying that he was only expressing the opinion which he had expressed with regard to jurors in England.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he could not agree with his hon. Friend the Member for Cork. He was one of those who thought that the qualification ought to be much higher than it was; but, at the same time, he was against any selection of the sheriff or things of that kind, by which an improper jury was obtained. From his own experience of the county of Cork he thought ample jurors could be got at £50 a-year.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, neither the right hon. Baronet nor his right hon. and learned Friend who had just spoken had answered him. He had stated that in five Unions the number of jurors would be reduced by the increased qualification from 1,892 to 657. In the Returns quoted by the Chief Secretary it must be borne in mind that a number of persons were included who by the Act of Parliament were exempted and disqualified. Instead, therefore, of there being 3,600 available, it might, he fancied, be more nearer the mark to say the number was only 1,600.

MR. BRUEN said, they started on a wrong basis. They began by making the qualification altogether too low, and hence they had been obliged gradually to go upwards. They should have provided as high a qualification as they possibly could, and then gradually reduced it. It was desirable to enlist in the administration of justice a larger number of persons; but he altogether denied that they were to educate jurors at the expense of suitors.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, the counties in Ireland were divided into three different sets, and the rating in them was different. In one a man was liable to serve on a jury if his qualification was £12; in another if his qualification was £10; and in the third if his qualification was £6. That was an objectionable proceeding. In Galway and Mayo, where there was not the slightest difference in the condition of the people, the rating was £12 in the one county, and £6 in the other. He thought in the Schedule there should be a change to £8 altogether.

MR. LAW said, that the figures given by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Downing) tended to different conclusions from those at which the right hon. Baronet opposite had arrived. In a matter of this kind, however, he did not feel himself in a position to differ from the Government. With them, on the one hand, rested the responsibility, whilst, on the other hand, they had every means of obtaining the requisite information. Possibly, some reduction might be made in the house qualification, which he agreed with the right hon. Baronet was a more satisfactory test of a man's competency to act as juror than the acreage he might happen to hold. Such a reduction might meet the views of his hon. Friend behind him.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he was very anxious to conclude the

Mr. M'Carthy Downing

Bill that day. The hon. Member for Cork had kindly furnished him privately with figures with regard to his own county; but he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had had no opportunity of going fully into the matter. If the hon. Member would consent to postpone the question, he would undertake on the Report to discuss the matter more fully with him.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA reminded the right hon. Baronet that the hon. Member for Cork, although one of the most trusted Representatives, was not the Member for all Ireland, and as other hon. Members with their constituencies were interested in the subject, they should have an assurance from the right hon. Baronet that he would so modify the qualification as to reduce it to £40 in all counties.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, his Amendment dealt with the whole of Ireland. He must say that he was afraid if the question had depended upon his hon. Friend who had just sat down, they would not have had a discussion at all.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, the Amendment did apply to the whole of Ireland, but what he meant was, that the undertaking of the right hon. Baronet to discuss the matter applied only to the county of Cork.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the question amounted to the oscillation of the pendulum to the other extreme. He thought the House was entitled to a full explanation of the Chief Secretary and the Law Officer of the Crown as to the arrangement of rating, for the statement of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway was an extraordinary one. The Schedule ought to be postponed altogether. The Chief Secretary had told them that in Cork there would be a certain number of jurors. An hon. Member, who knew that county well, declared that the Chief Secretary was entirely mistaken, and that the increased qualification would cut off 2,000 of the existing jurors. Was that to be done at half-past 6 o'clock, when hon. Members from Ireland connected with the law were not present? He moved that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Mitchell Henry.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH hoped the Motion would not be pressed. The Bill did not propose for the first time a difference in the qualification for jurors in different counties. On the contrary, that difference had existed since 1871, if not before. He had no wish to shut out any discussion, but he hoped they might be allowed to conclude the Committee that day, and then the question could be again discussed on the Report.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, that they were quite willing to consent to the postponement of the Schedule, but they were not willing to pass it then.

THE O'CONOR DON said, it was wrongly assumed that the poor people were anxious to serve on juries. It was an advantage to a poor man if they could get jurors to serve without coming down to him, as serving on juries was really a penalty on such a man, as he had often to leave his farm and neglect his work at critical seasons in order to serve. He appealed to his hon. Friend not to press the Motion, but to accept the proposition of the Chief Secretary.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY remarked that if there was no other reason why the debate should be adjourned, the speech they had just heard was sufficient. He would recommend his hon. Friend to read some constitutional history. The sole object of empanelling a jury was not that the trials should go on, but the qualification of jurors concerned the doctrine that every man should be tried by his peers. To say that Irish farmers did not wish to be placed on juries was a thing which he did not believe. If it was so, that House should teach them better. They should be taught to appreciate the value of trial by jury. If they did not, the reason was, that in former days the jury system — ["Question!"] He thought, however, they were now getting into a proper condition; but whether the farmers liked it or not, he claimed for them the privilege of being placed on the jury list.

MR. BIGGAR complained that the Bill was being pushed on without discussion.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, as there were only six minutes left, he would postpone the Schedule.

Motion and Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule 3.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, the question of exemption had better be dealt with under the Procedure Bill.

Schedule agreed to.

Schedule 4 agreed to.

It being now ten minutes to Seven of the clock, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he had hoped that they would have got through Committee that day. As it was important the Bill should become law in a very short period of time, he was authorized to state that it would be taken as the First Order on Thursday,

CAPTAIN NOLAN: This Bill?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Yes, this Bill.

The House suspended its sitting at Seven of the clock.

RESOLUTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR: I rise, Sir, to ask the House to affirm that our great naval service, our Navy, England's traditional pride, shall no longer be the only service which, under the guise of the maintenance of discipline, maintains the punishment of the cat,—that cruel and brutalizing punishment. There are, I am aware, many Members of the House—for they have said so to me during the last few days—and I am sure there must be a great many persons out of the House who are surprised at the Motion of which I have given Notice, because they were under the impression that flogging in our military and naval Services was altogether done away with. I confess I was almost entirely of that opinion myself. I was aware that in regard to the Army a certain nominal reserve had been made, that flogging might still be resorted to in time of war; but I was quite sure that that punishment was obsolete as regards the Army, for I was sure that no general would flog a soldier in presence of the enemy. I thought in regard to the Navy—

Notice taken that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said: I was observing, Sir, that there was a widespread impression in the country and among Members of this House also that practically the punishment of flogging had been abolished both in the Army and the Navy, although in the Army the reservation was still maintained, but still that was only in time of war, and it was perfectly understood that it could never be had recourse to in the Army. In regard to the Navy we were told, if I recollect aright, that practically flogging was abolished also, and that the system which had obtained in the Army for some time before was now established in the Navy—that the whole force was divided into two classes, the upper and the lower, and that the upper could not be subjected to flogging at all; that in case of any serious crime being committed by a man he would first be punished by being degraded to the lower, and if he offended after that he would probably be dismissed the Service, but that he certainly could not be flogged while in the first class. That has turned out to be a delusion. I, of course, charge no one with an attempt to deliberately deceive the House; but I must say that the House and the country were deceived when it was discovered that this division into the upper and lower classes does really make no difference whatever in respect to flogging, or in regard to the summary power of punishment by the commanding officer in respect to flogging, and that in great measure the flogging went on as before, and was equally applicable to both classes. I shall be probably asked how this is. Members will say we succeeded in a long series of years in abolishing it in the Army, and we thought we had succeeded in stopping it in the Navy. I should say that this was the main cause, that the friends of this degrading and cruel mode of discipline could not stand the annual discussion in the House of Commons of the Mutiny Bill, which, of course, is the Bill under which this discipline is maintained, and which has to be passed every year. The Naval Discipline Act under which the affairs of the Navy are managed, as the House knows, may go on for a series of years until the Bill needs alteration. I cannot help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty is really with me in the Motion I am making now, and if he does not feel at liberty to grant it, as I hope he may, but thinks I can assist him in that humane wish by making this an annual Motion in the House of Commons, I can promise him that I shall be happy to comply with his desire. It has been said that there is a decided difference in regard to the necessity of this measure in the Navy as compared with the Army. I venture to differ from that altogether, and to think that if there is any distinction to be drawn flogging should be less prominent in the Navy than in the Army. The sense of responsibility in a commander of a ship at sea is incomparably less than that of a general commanding an Army. Many things may be done at sea, where there is no public opinion to fear, and where there are no reports in the public newspapers. If, therefore, there should be a difference made between the two, flogging should certainly be abolished in the Navy before it was abolished in the Army. The history of flogging in the Navy may be thus briefly stated. Up to about the year 1820 the sentences were of the most frightfully cruel character; I find sentences from 300 to 400, and even 500 lashes, repeatedly ordered. From 1820 for about 20 or 25 years there was some moderation in this excessive brutality, and the lashes diminished to about 100. About the year 1844, when that distinguished commander, Sir George Cockburn, was the First Lord, the first great blow was struck at this infinity of brutality. He first limited the number of lashes to be given to 48, and then decided that they could only be enforced by court martial, or be given upon summary order only by warrant of the captain, and it required that 12 hours should elapse after the signing of the warrant before the punishment should be inflicted. Sir George Cockburn was known to be a great disciplinarian; but I need not say that the upholders of that discipline looked upon his conduct as destructive of the Service, and as altogether ruinous. In the year 1860, I think it was, the change of which I have already spoken—the dividing the Service into two classes—was passed. I have already shown that this was a mere farce, that it had not affected the decision of court martials at all, and whether it was the result, I do not know, but I observe that the number of court martials ever since that time has been very much greater. The number of convictions by court martial in 1862 was 141; in 1863, 140; in 1864 it was 97, and in 1875 there were 235 convictions by court martial. But the real evil is not in this question, not in the amount of lashes inflicted, or the number of persons who are subjected to it. While flogging is permitted at all at sea there must always be irregularity, always causes of discontentment going on, which are beyond the limits of the law. I need not give the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord chapter and verse for these statements—he does not need it from me, because he knows the facts himself. A man was illegally flogged on the Pacific Station for assaulting a Consul in a row on shore, another man was illegally flogged by the lieutenant of a training brig for disobedience, and I can even tell him of cases in the West Indies where two boys were flogged with the cat. These two lads were too young to enjoy the advantage of being flogged, the cat was too dignified a weapon, they should only have been birched, and so the commander raised them to the rank of seamen, in order to entitle them to be flogged with the cat. Now, I know the right hon. Gentleman is not inexorable in his decisions when reason is brought to bear upon him. When I asked him last year to resume the Returns which used to be made some years ago of crimes and punishments in the Navy, he was inexorable at the time. He said they were useless and expensive; but I am glad to see this year that to some extent he has granted these Returns, which used to be issued under the presidency of the Duke of Somerset and Lord Clarence Paget. If the right hon. Gentleman will not be persuaded to get more full Returns issued, we shall have to trouble him with a Motion asking him to do so. If flogging is to be maintained, it is doubly and trebly essential that there should be responsible Returns from those who have power to inflict such punishment. Now, in the Returns he has given us there is no sub-division at all; it is divided into the squadrons at home and the squadrons abroad, and without mentioning the name of any individual ship. There is in fact, therefore, no means of testing the value of these Returns, and of ascertaining if mistakes take place—and they do take place sometimes, for it has been known that punishments have been given and not been returned. Under these Returns there is no test, no means of ascertaining if they are correct. If they were given in full there would be plenty of witnesses from every vessel to say there are no Returns from such a vessel, or there are no particulars of a punishment which we remember was given at such a place. I entreat the right hon. Gentleman not to think the noblest symbol of our civilization is the cat. We have all heard the story of the man who was wrecked on a desolate and apparently uninhabited island, casting his eyes up to a height and seeing a gallows there, exclaimed—"Thank God, I am in a civilized land!" I venture to think that the cat is not the noblest emblem of civilization the great British people should cherish. There is a chaplet of laurel yet to be given to the man who will do away with this wretched punishment: will the right hon. Gentleman permit me to place it on his brow? If he will assure the House that he will bring in the long-promised amendment of the Naval Discipline Act, and say that it will exclude this cruel and brutalizing punishment, I need not say how gladly I will withdraw this Motion to-night. Of course I shall be told that the lash is very infrequently inflicted, that the number who suffer from it is less than it was; but I maintain that this is altogether an argument on my side of the question. I find the floggings last year under court martial were 7; they were all from 36 to 48 lashes; and they were all accompanied with severe sentences besides—18 months or two years' hard labour. Now, Sir, if I were not convinced that no modification of this system were of any use, and the only thing to look to were its entire abolition, I would stop to point out the needless cruelty of this amount of lash. It is well recognized that the punishment by flogging in the Navy is very much more severe than that practised in the Army. It has been held that 50 lashes on ship-board are equivalent to 200 in the barrack-yard, and it is, I believe, a well-recognized fact that the sufferer himself ceases almost entirely to feel after the first two dozen lashes—that at that time his back is so smashed and his nerves so destroyed, that he feels nothing more then. Every lash after that deducts something from the vitality and constitutional vigour of that man. I will say nothing about the boys who are flogged; they are numbered by the hundred. I venture to say that there is no excuse whatever for the retention of this punishment in the Navy. In the year 1860, when naval discipline was re-modelled and re-formed, Lord Clarence Paget, than whom it will be admitted on both sides of the House I could not name a higher authority, said in this House—

"If any should think how Draconic they still appear, I pray them to bear in mind that we have to deal with a great body of men of all classes, often drawn from the very dregs of society, who too frequently enter the Navy without religious or moral principles, and with tainted morals, and who are rarely improved by being boxed up together, as it were, in a ship."—[3 Hansard, clx. 1651.]

But the noble Lord distinctly looked forward to the time, and not a distant one, when flogging in the Navy should be altogether abolished, and said—

"I cannot resist the pleasure of reading to the House certain statistics with regard to corporal punishment which I have been at some trouble to procure, as they show that year by year this degrading punishment is decreasing in a steady ratio, and is gradually dying out of the Service. I am positive that the necessity for its continuance will even more rapidly diminish if the House will continue, as it has hitherto done, to support the Government in its efforts for the maintenance of discipline, and for the improvement of the Service by the training of a large number of boys, who, having entered at an early age, become attached to the Service, and in the great majority of instances turn out skilful and valuable seamen."—[Ibid. 1655.]

And now what have we done in that respect? I will venture to quote a few lines from a naval article in Fraser's Magazine, on "Training Schools and Training Ships," describing the present system—

"We will take a boy at the earliest age that he can join, 15. He can only be accepted by certain officers, in certain places named in the regulations; he must bring with him a certificate of birth, and a declaration made by his parents, or nearest relation if an orphan, giving consent to his joining Her Majesty's Navy and serving for 10 years, from the age of 18. No apprentices are accepted, or boys from prisons or reformatories. . . . The boy must be able to read and write, and is then subject to a very exact medical examination. One fancies that no boy could ever be so sound as seems necessary. Joints, skin, chest, teeth, eyes, &c., have to be examined minutely, and the examination invariably detects and rejects those poor lads who have wanted care or nourishment in childhood. The waifs and strays of society are seldom able to pass the medical tests of the Royal Navy; and the Service is recruited chiefly from the sons of small farmers, shopkeepers, and artizans, who have been fed fairly, and have therefore some constitution on which to work."

That is the raw material of which our Navy is now composed, the sons of small farmers, shopkeepers, and artizans, and does the right hon. Gentleman think that these are the classes which will long submit to be kept under the discipline of the lash. Since that time I am informed—and so far as my own small information goes it confirms it—that the character of our seamen has changed and undergone a perfect revolution. The old characteristic Jack Tar, rollicking, reckless, and as soon as liberated on shore rough and dissipated, has passed away. Our men now in the Navy were boys brought up in these training schools as I have described. They are a well-regulated, orderly, and I believe as a class of men superior on the whole to the class from which they are taken on shore. At the time when Lord Clarence Paget was looking forward to flogging being abolished, not one man in 100 could read and write. Now it is a very small proportion that cannot do both, and are these the men do you think that will now submit to the rough discipline thought necessary in the old times? These men have improved in information, in intelligence, and in thought, and consider that they are no longer to be governed as mere brutes or machines. I can tell the right hon. Gentleman, if he does not know it, that these men and their petty officers in various parts now meet, combine, discuss their grievances, and communicate with Members of Parliament with regard to them. This system of flogging, I will venture to assert, is as really absolutely doomed as if the right hon. Gentleman decreed its dissolution to-day. The only question is this, shall it be done by the Government and the House of their own free will and graciously, or shall it be wrested from them by the power of public opinion, a thing neither the House nor the Government can withstand. We have seen the trades unions of this country combine altogether to assist my hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) in his patriotic attempts to ameliorate and render more safe the lives of merchant seamen. Does the right hon. Gentleman want to see the trades unions joining the seamen of the Navy, and declaring, in tones that cannot be misunderstood, that the lash shall be no longer employed as a punishment? I do not speak entirely without book, for I have various communications from different parts of the country on this matter. One especially I will read from the town which is honoured by the representation of the right hon. Gentleman whom I now see sitting on the front bench (Mr. John Bright). The Birmingham Trades' Council, representing some 10,000 unionists, has asked its borough Members to support my Motion, and has based that request upon the very soundest and broadest grounds, for they moved—

"That this council desires the borough Members to support Mr. P. A. Taylor's Motion for the abolition of flogging in the Navy, believing that its continuance is degrading to the nation, and calculated to lower the service in the estimation of the people."

Of course, I shall be told that discipline cannot be maintained without this punishment. That has been the cry every time any alleviation of this punishment has been attempted. When the lashes were 500, "discipline required it;" when they were 100, "discipline required it;" and "discipline" requires it now, when the experience of every Navy in the world negatives it, for England is the only country which still maintains the cat. The experience of our great Merchant Service negatives the necessity for it. The great vessels of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, with their vast wealth and the large numbers of passengers they carry, are they nothing? They have no prestige of naval discipline to fall back upon, but not a lash is ever given upon one of those vessels. Sir, I maintain that not one, but all the best authorities on the Navy, are against the continuance of this punishment. I will quote one or two illustrations. Before venturing to bring on this Motion, I wrote to a naval officer of long standing and high authority on all matters connected with the discipline of the Navy, and I believe his name is at the service of the First Lord. I will venture to read two or three passages from his very interesting letter. He says—

“It raises a barrier between officers and men destructive of all good feeling and sympathy, and far from assisting to maintain, it is really destructive of all good discipline, converting the criminal into a martyr. I tell you that you cannot rely on your reserves so long as the men are subject to the torture prescribed in this Act. Try it. Embark your naval reserves in London and Liverpool this summer, take them for a month's cruise, and flog one of them from each port; call them out again in 1877 and see how many will respond to your call.”

There are two papers which I am told represent between the two the best characteristics of both Services. They are certainly not Radical in their politics, but they have felt compelled within the last year or two to consider Motions which I have made, and they have generally thought it necessary to commence by saying “unusual as it is for us to agree with the hon. Member for Leicester.” Listen to what The Army and Navy Gazette says, on June 3, 1876—

“If we did not believe that the flogging of men is a doomed thing in the Navy, to take its place with the long defunct barbarous practices of keel-hauling, running the gauntlet, tarring and feathering and so forth, we should urge its reduction to 24 lashes in any case, and that Commanders-in-Chief abroad should, like the Admiralty at home, have full powers (which they have not now) of remitting it when awarded by courts martial. But, in truth, we recognize the fact that our seamen have altogether grown beyond the lash. It is a punishment inconsistent with their superior education, habits and training, entirely opposed to the spirit of the age, and not even practised in foreign navies, where its retention was more excusable, if possible, than in ours. We cannot see what good can arise from subjecting the sailor to a degrading punishment from which we shelter the soldiers; it is enabling the soldier to point the finger of scorn and derision at his comrade the sailor. We will not pursue the subject further. We leave it with confidence in the hands of the authorities, feeling assured that a right conclusion will be arrived at.”

The United Service Gazette, for last Saturday, thus writes—

“It has been said that the good men in the Navy do not object to flogging, and that they would rather it should not be abolished. We have had the strongest and most conclusive proof offered us to the contrary. Surely, then, there can be no two opinions that the time, however long it has been deferred, has now fully come when such a demoralizing, degrading, and infamous punishment as flogging shall be abolished in the Royal Navy.”

I was much struck the other day by

reading the life of Lord Collingwood, a man whom I believe professional historians reckon one of the very greatest commanders this country ever saw, as he was certainly one of her truest-hearted men, and noblest gentlemen. He was a man of whom Thackeray said—“Since heaven made gentlemen there is, I think, no record of a better one than that.” Lord Collingwood, when flogging by the hundred lashes at a time was the fashion, loathed it, and never had recourse to it when he could avoid it. In the record of his punishments for the year 1793, from May to September, he had 12 men flogged from 6 to 12 lashes each, and that was at the time when from 400 to 500 was a common thing. He would say to midshipmen, who came to him with complaints—“You don't want to see an older man than yourself flogged, I am sure. Come and ask me to let him off, and I will do so.” I would recommend this to the consideration of the House and especially to the hon. Member for the Montgomery districts (Mr. Hanbury Tracy). Lord Collingwood was told that there was a mutiny on board his ship, whereupon he said—“Mutiny, sir, mutiny on my ship; if it can have arrived at that it must be my fault and the fault of every one of my officers.” And this character of his, this ability to subdue by mingled firmness and gentleness the rough spirits he had to deal with was recognized by very different men. Lord St. Vincent, himself a most severe disciplinarian, used to say if he had any refractory men—“Oh, send them to Collingwood; he will bring them to order.” But we have an entirely different system now to the one which obtained in those days. We flog only seven or eight men in the year, and what does that mean? It means that we flourish the cat in terrorem over the whole Navy for the sake of a few insubordinates, or for the sake rather of a very few bad or inefficient officers. Upon that point let me read two or three words to show how much is due to the conduct of an officer as regards the discipline of a ship, from a speech by Lord Hardwicke in the same debate of 1860. He said—

“He was of opinion that the discipline of the Navy was equally, if not more, dependent on the character and conduct of the officers in command than upon the code of laws under which they acted.”—[3 Hansard, clix. 1614.]

The same view was taken by the Commodore commanding the African squadron, who said—

“I have remarked to the commander on the increase of minor punishments, and suggested a greater amount of supervision amongst officers and others appointed to superintend and control the men. I am quite certain that one-half of the minor punishments need never have been inflicted if a proper vigilance had been exercised by the officers.”

We are often recommended a rough-and-ready discipline and punishment for the Navy; but I really think it would be not a less proper system than we practise now if whenever there are offences on board a vessel which seemed to demand the punishment of the cat, if the officers were cashiered rather than the men flogged. One of the most marked and disgraceful characteristics of our law at present on this matter, and marking how disgraceful the mere threat of the possibility of the cat is regarded, is that officers are especially exempt from the possibility of being flogged. In other cases it is the crime which determines the punishment, not the individual. In this case it is the rank of the man. Of what avail is it to say that an officer will never commit mutiny. If that is so they need never fear being flogged. There is no other punishment in the Naval Discipline Act from death to reprimand except this one of flogging to which officers are not liable in case they should commit the same crime. It is a remarkable thing, Sir, that there has been no trial for mutiny since the year 1835, and then it was two officers who were put upon their trial. It is a remarkable instance of the miserable red tapeism which is eating into our two Services, that these two officers to save the ship mutinied against a drunken commander, and by gentle pressure kept him in his cabin. Yet for saving the ship they were sentenced to some degree of punishment. But it is not merely as a sentimentalist, if I must submit to that charge which is so constantly brought against me, it is not merely because of my sympathy with the men, but as a question of economy that I bring forward this question. We cannot afford to make our Navy as unpopular as it is now, and to continue to hang the cat in terrorem over the men. We cannot stand as a pecuniary question the frightful amount of desertions that are going on now at this time, and our inability to fill up the vacancies with the youths coming from our training ships. Do not let the House suppose that I am inventing the fact that flogging has something to do with the dislike men have to enter our Navy. The Duke of Somerset, speaking on August 7, 1860, as to the clause requiring inquiry before flogging, said—

“An additional inducement would be held out to the seamen of the Merchant to enter the Naval Service; from entering into which they were at present deterred by the existence of corporal punishment.”—[3 Hansard, clx. 821.]

And what wonder is there that it should? What a sight it is, described by one who has seen it, to see a man hung up by his arms and knees, and surrounded by a corps of Marines with fixed bayonets, and there lashed—I will not say like a brute, because with our present condition of humanity we do not lash even our brutes. I have been told that when a man is to be flogged at Portsmouth harbour they dare not flog him alongside the dockyard, because the workmen there would not stand it, and so the vessel has to be taken out to sea. There is a certain refinement and delicacy in the fact also that when flogging is going on a look-out is kept to see that some French or Italian officer is not coming to visit the commander, and if one should appear he is warned off. We are very proud of our flogging, but there is a little touch of shame about it when a foreigner comes to see it. On this question I quote again from The United Service Gazette, which says—

“The question as to the causes that lead to the desertion of seamen from the Navy has become imminent. We cannot possibly go on losing 1,000 men a year on that account alone, without asking the reason why. To fill the vacancies caused by the desertion of these 1,000 seamen we require to be constantly training 3,000 boys, and these at the lowest computation cost us £135,000 a-year. To this must be added what has been spent on the training of the 1,000 deserters, say another £135,000, and we have a total of £270,000 a-year absolutely thrown away. These estimates we know are below the mark.”

The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty is reported as saying in his speech on the Estimates that—

“looking over the whole stations it would be found that there was no increase in the numbers.”

I am quite unable to make out the correctness of the right hon. Gentleman's statement. Not to go further, I have gone to the year 1863, when we had those admirable Returns set on foot by his Predecessors, and I find that although according to his statement on April 10, 1875, the desertions at the Home Station were $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, in 1863 the Returns were only 2·88 per cent. The percentage on the Channel Station was 7 per cent, in 1863 it was only 5 per cent, while on foreign stations, as compared with 1863, it would appear from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the percentage was nearly double, and we have a like difficulty on the other side in persuading—and what wonder that it is so—in persuading boys to enter our training ships. From April 1875 to January 1876, inclusive, the number of boys less borne than voted averaged 625. In January, 1876, it had increased to nearly 800. I wish my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) would inquire what become of the sum voted for this larger number of boys, when the boys are not forthcoming. I now come to the Amendment which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Montgomery district (Mr. Hanbury Tracy) has put down upon the Paper. I must say I feel a certain amount of regret that opposition to my Motion should come from this side of the House. Not that this is in any sense a Party question; but still we are apt to think, and perhaps to arrogate to ourselves the right on this side of the House, to do away with bad, obsolete, and useless legislation. But I confess I regard the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman with entire satisfaction, because if there could be to my mind anything wanting to affirm the wisdom of my Motion, I should find it in his Amendment. He divides it into two portions, and he says, in the first place, that since 1871 all corporal punishment in the Navy has been abolished for all offences which do not require prompt and immediate punishment, and is now only retained for the case of mutiny, and for offences which may imperil the safety of the ship upon the high seas. Now, I am quite sure the hon. Gentleman had no desire whatever to mislead the House in any respect; but I must say that the terms he has used are, in my opinion, well calculated to do so. It is somewhat remarkable, too, that the duty should fall to a civilian to set him right. In his Motion the hon. Gentleman informs the House that since 1871 corporal punishment has not, and cannot, be inflicted for any crime except those two which he specifies. Will not the House be surprised to learn that there is no foundation whatever for the statement, and that the reservation in this Minute applies simply and only to the summary jurisdiction of the commanding officer, and does not touch in the slightest degree the powers of punishment by court martial. At this very moment there is not a single punishment in the Naval Discipline Act which is punishable by imprisonment to which a court martial has not power to add flogging. Why, the hon. Gentleman would have seen, had he read a little more carefully, that in the debate, or rather the conversation which took place in 1871, and upon which his Motion is founded, that the First Lord of the Admiralty, who was then my right hon. Friend (Mr. Goschen), expressly admitted that as regarded courts martial this had no effect. This might be a very good reason for amending the Act; but it was no justification for putting down such an Amendment as this. But then the hon. Gentleman goes on to say that this punishment is only retained for the cases of mutiny and of offences which may imperil the safety of the ship on the high seas. But what is this mutiny of which we hear so much, and of which the hon. Gentleman now speaks? It is simply a bugbear set up in order to persuade timid Members of Parliament of the necessity of retaining brutal punishments. Mutiny in the sense of endangering the possession of Her Majesty's ships is an absolutely unknown thing. Mutiny is a sort of parallel to high treason, an attempt to take a ship away from the natural control and power of Her Majesty's Government. It does not mean being rude to a midshipman, or striking the policeman of the vessel. But, supposing there were such a thing, what does this mean? That we only flog when the safety of the vessel at the moment is imperilled? The hon. Gentleman might remember the axiom of Mrs. Glasse—"First catch your hare." You cannot flog a man when he is in open mutiny, and actually threatening to take away from the officers the command of the ship; when you have mutiny

it is not the cat, but the revolver or grape shot that will be needed. The whole thing is an absurd delusion. There has been no such thing as a mutiny in this century. In the case of the Bounty, in 1789, it was not quelled by the cat; while in the case of the Hermione, in 1797, the cat was the direct and obvious cause of it. What a picture does this suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman give of the officers quelling a mutiny and ensuring their possession of a ship by flogging the men, the men fighting the officers with marlingspikes, and the officers pursuing them round the deck with cats. The hon. Gentleman says we cannot flog men except for mutiny. Why, there were seven men flogged last year, by order of a court martial, and not one of them was charged with mutiny. Now, I have no doubt in regard to this matter, especially of desertions, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hunt) will say he has done all in his power to prevent them. I remember a story of a certain patient who was afflicted with a multitude of diseases, and his physician had some reason to think they originated from a result which springs from insufficient lavation. He told his doctor that he had tried every means in his power to effect a cure. "Why don't you try soap and water," said his doctor. I venture to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will not apply a moral detergent to the misfortune which at present afflicts our Navy? If he will condescend to take the advice of a civilian and an outsider on the matter, I will venture to recommend to him such a course as that he should abolish flogging, and do away at the same time with the whole system of which flogging is a type. Let him amend all the red-tape regulations of the present Naval Discipline Act, by which the natural enjoyment, liberty, freedom, and improvement of the sailor are diminished. They are now become reasonable beings, let him give them reasonable means of relaxation and improvement; let him, in fact, make the Service as popular as it deserves to be, and as at present it is unpopular; let him do this, and he will gratify, I believe, the natural kindness of his own heart, satisfy the highest opinion of the best authorities in the Navy, and make himself the most popular First Lord with the sailors that there has been in our time. I beg to move, Sir,—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived when the punishment of Flogging in the Navy should be abolished."

MR. HOPWOOD, in seconding the Motion, said, he was desirous of asking that the Navy of England should be taken out of the category of garroters. They had decided to reserve the most disgraceful punishment for the most infamous scoundrels. But the clients for whom he spoke now were not the infamous men of the British Navy, but the true men enrolled in its ranks, who at the bidding of a wrong-headed, rash, presumptuous, perhaps cruel or vindictive man, might be put on their trial before three or four young officers and subjected to physical punishment. The garrotter, on the other hand, was secured a calm trial in a Court of Justice before a Judge and 12 of his countrymen, and the evidence against him was sifted by men of the greatest skill and experience in such matters. The sailor who was tried by court martial had no such means afforded him of proving his innocence. He thought they could not better consider the system of flogging than by asking each Member of the House to imagine his own feelings under it. It would be well that the regulation cat should be placed alongside the mace; but perhaps the First Lord would state how many knots it had, and what was the effect of a blow. He believed there was no country in the world in which flogging was cherished as an unnatural plant as it was in England. In this respect he believed she was sole, at all events among the nations of Europe. Professional men who had been brought up in the old system naturally thought flogging necessary to the government of the country and the existence of the Service; but it had been abolished in the Army with very beneficial results, and he called upon them to assist in placing that chaplet which his hon. Friend had humorously spoken of on the brow of the right hon. Gentleman for abolishing the "cat" in the Navy. Even in the profession to which he was proud to belong, that of the Law, there had been men who thought that society could not be held together without cruel, barbarous, and Draconic punishments. The Judges thought so, and so did the Bishops; but, happily, there had sprung up men of warmer hearts, men who were more disposed to trust their fellow-men, and who advocated the abolition of such punishments. Professional men were not to be trusted, they were brought up under a system and did not see the mischief of it. If anything had made him a warm supporter of liberty, it was the brutal punishment of flogging. He could remember in his early days reading, or hearing, not unfrequently of 900 lashes being given in the Army and of more than one inquest upon some unfortunate man who had died under his punishment, and he was proud to say that eventually the public opinion of the country had obtained the abolition of such punishments; and he thought he was justified in adding one more appeal to those which had often been heard in that House—contending that the “lash” was useless to maintain discipline; that it was flourished in the face of a superior class of men; that it could not be measured in its baleful effects simply by the terror which it inspired in those who might commit breaches of discipline, but by the wider feeling of disgust and terror created in those who were not likely to need punishment to correct them, and who therefore would scorn a Service which alone among the Services of the world was disgraced by the maintenance of this infamous punishment.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived when the punishment of Flogging in the Navy should be abolished.”—(Mr. P. A. Taylor.)

MR. HANBURY TRACY, in rising to move, as an Amendment, to leave out all the words after the word “House,” and insert—

“corporal punishment in the Navy having been abolished in 1871 for all offences which do not require prompt and immediate punishment, and being only now retained for the case of mutiny and for offences which may imperil the safety of the ship on the high seas, it is inexpedient to take further steps for the total abolition of the punishment,” said, he extremely regretted, in the interests of humanity, that the hon. Member for Leicester had brought forward his Motion. The hon. Member had criticized his Amendment and endeavoured to make out that he was endeavouring to mislead the House; but he wished to say that in drawing up the Amendment he had followed the terms of the speech made in that House in 1871 by the right hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen), when the hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway) then moved for the abolition of flogging in the Navy. The right hon. Gentleman went into the subject very fully, and came to the conclusion that, in the interests of humanity, it was advisable that in certain cases they should have a deterrent punishment. Corporal punishment was to be abolished for all offences with the exception of mutiny, using or offering violence to a superior officer, and desertion under aggravated circumstances. The hon. Member for Leicester said that by the Naval Discipline Act a court martial was still able to award flogging for other cases; but if he had referred to the Memorandum which had been issued to the Navy he would have seen that for all practical purposes he was mistaken. The hon. Member for Leicester talked of mutiny as a thing unheard of. He (Mr. Hanbury Tracy) ventured to say that mutiny, or conspiracy of a mutinous character, was by no means so very rare. What would the hon. Member for Leicester do if a spirit of mutiny prevailed in a ship that was on the high sea, far from prison and from any country? Unless some strong punishment could be at once inflicted in such a case, the lives of all the officers would be endangered, and the ship would be irretrievably lost. If this power were not retained they must resort to the punishment of death. If they were prepared to do that he would withdraw his Amendment; but did they care so little for life in this 19th century that they thought that in every case of insubordination officers ought to be allowed to take out revolvers and shoot the mutinous men? It was true that flogging was abolished in the American Navy, and that legally only irons, cells, imprisonment, and the usual minor punishments could be enforced. But he believed it was undisputed that occasionally their officers were obliged to have resort to illegal punishments of a most brutal and degrading nature. Had the hon. Member for Leicester never heard of sweating boxes, that diabolical invention for packing a man in a sort of coffin near the boiler, forming a hot closet, until the perspiration ran off him, and he was reduced by a process of stewing to a state of submission? Had he never heard of knuckle-dusters being used for knocking men down? Had he never heard of that vile and brutal punishment of tying men up by their thumbs to the rigging, with their toes dangling on the ground for hours at a time? He did not wish the House to imagine that these horrible cruelties were often inflicted; but he feared that there was little doubt that in extreme cases it had often been a case of using one of these deterrent punishments, or of shooting men down with a revolver. It was only a few years ago the captain of an American man-of-war on the Brazilian station was tried for perpetrating some of these cruelties. He had spoken to American officers on the subject, and their reply was always to the effect—"Oh, these punishments are sometimes inflicted, but they are illegal, and the men have their remedy." That might be the case; but to a sailor on a foreign station there was an almost insuperable difficulty of obtaining redress, owing to the length of time which generally elapsed before the ship returned home. Certain he was that whether often carried out or not, the stigma of inflicting illegal punishments did rest on that Navy, and he should be very glad to hear it was unjustly placed. It was an admitted fact that in extreme cases life was frequently taken. Two curious cases occurred not very long ago, as illustrating the system pursued in the two navies. A ship's company of 170 men of the American Navy were sent in a passenger ship in charge of a captain and midshipman down to Aspinwall, in order that they might cross over to Panama and relieve the crew of a vessel on the Pacific station. A spirit of insubordination sprang up amongst the men, and an attempt was made to get to the spirit room. The captain fortunately heard of the intention; but having no power to apply a strong deterring punishment waited until the men actually came aft to get to the spirits, he then took his revolver and shot three of the men, and thus quelled the attempt to broach the spirit room, which would probably have ended, as all similar cases generally ended, in the loss of the ship and the whole crew. In the same month, and not far from the scene of this tragedy, an English man-of-war was wrecked—

Her Majesty's ship Conqueror, with a crew of 800 men. In an evil hour some of the crew thought they would obtain possession of the spirits. Fortunately the conspiracy was discovered, and three of the ringleaders were flogged. All signs of insubordination were at once checked, and the whole crew of 800 men were saved. There were, unfortunately, at sea cases constantly occurring where men, crowded together in a small space, suddenly became maddened for drink, or from excitement and privation—were guilty of acts they would afterwards bitterly repent. These were instances where an iron hand was indispensable, and it was simply a question of inflicting instantly some summary deterrent, or of shooting. The punishment of flogging was infinitely more merciful than that of shooting a man. In the French Navy good discipline prevailed, but capital punishment was resorted to, and a captain had absolute discretion to do what he liked in case of insubordination tending to mutiny. In the Italian Navy a similar state of things prevailed. The hon. Member for Leicester said the Return issued that morning of the number of corporal punishments inflicted during the last few years only strengthened his case. He (Mr. Hanbury Tracy) maintained the contrary. It was admitted on all sides in 1871 that the settlement then arrived at on this subject was a right one, and Mr. Otway thought the flogging in the Navy would gradually die out and be only retained for extreme cases. In 1871 the number of cases of flogging was 51; but the number under the new state of things was as follows:—In 1872 there were only 16 cases; in 1873, 19; in 1874, 8; and he believed last year there were only six. He believed that number would be still further reduced. The hon. Member for Leicester said that they had now such magnificent men in the Navy that they need be under no fear through abolishing this punishment; but he could inform the hon. Member that sailors themselves were by no means anxious that flogging should be altogether done away with, because they knew that it was only the exceptionally bad men who were liable to the punishment. The hon. Member for Leicester had contended that desertion would be reduced by the abolition of flogging; but he thought that it would be far more considerably reduced by a slight increase being made in the pay. The chief cause of desertion among the ordinary seamen was their being kept for months at a time in harbour, where they got into debt, and frequently into prison. Some people thought that the right hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) had already gone a step too far in abolishing flogging in the Navy except in the two cases of mutiny and of offences imperilling the safety of the ship; but without wishing to take a backward step as matters now stood it would be highly imprudent to go any further in that direction. The hon. Member for Leicester had instanced the Merchant Navy as a proof that ships might be safely navigated without recourse being had to flogging; but it was only a few weeks ago that they had had lamentable cases of mutiny in that service. When it was recollected what an unnatural life men led at sea, when it was remembered what countless dangers were continually being run, which naturally made seamen somewhat reckless, and when it was also remembered how easy it was for the best men to be led astray when physically demoralized from over work or excitement, he apprehended they ought not to be surprised that an exceptional punishment was required for these purely exceptional state of things. He desired to defend the penalty of flogging for these extreme cases on the very ground taken by the hon. Member in wishing to abolish it. He believed it was out of all comparison the least cruel mode of dealing with these peculiar offences. If in their attempt to give up this remedy for that one crime of insubordination tending to mutiny, endangering the lives of all on board, they set to work to devise other punishments which should act as a deterrent on the human mind, he was certain they would be led into the infliction of tortures far more cruel, far less efficacious, or be forced into taking human life. Surely it would be contrary to the principles of humanity to take men's lives for every act of mutiny on board ship, and he trusted that such a horrible stigma would not be laid upon the British Navy. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Amendment.

SIR WILLIAM EDMONSTONE, in seconding the Amendment, said, he believed the hon. Member for Leicester had brought forward this Motion in the belief that he was promoting the cause of humanity, but his speech was mischievous and dangerous. If delivered on board a man-of-war, the person who delivered it would have been subjected to a pretty good share of the punishment it condemned. Speaking from an experience afloat of more than 50 years, he could say that the infliction of corporal punishment was the most painful part of an officer's duty, and that it was never resorted to except from absolute necessity. It was a punishment, however, which officers in command of ships ought to have the power of administering in cases of emergency. He did not like to make sensational speeches, but he might mention an incident which had occurred to himself—not yesterday, it was true, but years ago when he was in command of a brig in the Mediterranean. There happened to be an unruly spirit amongst his crew, and word was brought him by his officers that the men had refused to wash the deck when ordered to do so. He gave them a second opportunity of obeying the command, and placing a loaded pistol upon the capstan, he ordered the few men who remained obedient to seize one of the ringleaders and flog him. This being done, he ordered three others to receive the same punishment, and that quelled the mutiny effectually; and had he not possessed the power of administering this punishment the ship would not have remained in his hands. If they gave up flogging, they must resort to the punishment of death. In other navies where flogging was not administered most barbarous punishments were resorted to, which he hoped would never disgrace the British Navy. During all the years he had been afloat he never knew of an instance in which a sailor who had been flogged bore a grudge against his commanding officer for having so punished him. He believed the better class of seamen would regret to see the abolition of this punishment; and he was sorry that this Motion had been brought forward, regarding it as implying a calumny on the officers of the Navy.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "House" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "corporal punishment in the Navy having been abolished in 1871 for all offences which do not require prompt and immediate punishment, and being only now retained for the case of mutiny and for offences which may imperil the safety of the ship on the high seas, it is inexpedient to take further steps for the total abolition of the punishment,"—(Mr. Hanbury-Tracy,)

CAPTAIN PRICE said, that as a rule questions of discipline in the Navy ought to be left entirely in the hands of the Executive; but this was an exceptional case. He had received no communications from his constituents upon the subject, or from any persons in the Navy except some officers. The Amendment would have the practical effect of leaving the subject where it now was, and with regard to the Motion of the hon. Member for Leicester he sympathized with it, but he could not go to the extent the hon. Member did. He would therefore suggest as a compromise that the Army and Navy should be placed on an equal footing—namely, that in both Services the punishment of flogging should be abolished in time of peace, but that it should not be abolished altogether, and that in time of war the Executive should have unlimited power. The punishment was without doubt a barbarous one, and every one would like to see it abolished, if possible; but he feared the time had not yet arrived at which such abolition was practicable. The object of the punishment was twofold. In the first place, it was intended to act as a deterring influence upon the man flogged, and to make a better sailor and a better subject of the Queen; but he, for one, could not conceive that the best way to a man's heart was an attempt to effect a forcible entry through his back. And, in the second place, punishment should be such as to deter others from taking a similar course; and, from his experience, he did not think that flogging achieved the object for which it was intended. Flogging, so far from deterring other men from committing crimes, rather engendered a spirit of callousness in the men very much like that dare-devil life of crime that was found to exist on shore from reading The Newgate Calendar and The Illustrated Police News. He should certainly like to know the exact nature of the offences for which the punishment of flogging had been inflicted of late years, as conflicting and inaccurate statements had been made on the subject. It was said that in the Navy men were only flogged for offences requiring prompt punishment; but this was not the fact, for men were often flogged after the holding of courts martial, which did not sit until long after the offences had been committed. Flogging in the Navy was sometimes defended on the ground that on shipboard there were not the same means of punishing offenders that existed in the case of soldiers quartered in camps or barracks on land. This, again, was not strictly accurate. In large ships there were cells, and in all vessels there were irons, into which offending sailors could be put. Dr. Johnson described life on shipboard as resembling life in a prison, with the additional chance of drowning. He could not go quite this length; but he certainly thought that if punishment on land was unpleasant, it must be much more unpleasant on board ship. If this punishment was barbarous in times of peace, it must be equally so in times of war; but there was no doubt that in times of war exceptional means must be used, and the powers of the Executive must be unlimited. The Government would do well to put the Navy on the same footing as the Army with regard to the infliction of corporal punishment. He thought the Government would act wisely if they adopted his suggestion, for the total abolition of flogging must take place eventually. He had only to add that he could not vote for the keeping up of the present state of things, and that he would not promise that he should not vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Leicester if the answer of the Government was not satisfactory.

CAPTAIN NOLAN thought the hon. and gallant Member for Devonport (Captain Price) had made a very sensible speech, which the Government might accept as a solution of the question. As regarded flogging in the Army, he declared that men were sometimes on active service flogged for almost nothing. ["No, no!"] Courts martial did not flog for almost nothing, he allowed; but the provost-marshal did, and there was no return of his floggings. Every man and non-commissioned officer was liable to be flogged when on service in the Army, and that should be remembered in their recruiting arrangements. These matters should be attended to now, whilst there was yet time, for if war came upon us it would find us with our house not in order. The Army was in peace time in respect of flogging in a much better condition than the Navy; and what had been the result of making the Army better? It had certainly not been the insubordination of which they had heard so much as likely to be the effect before the improvement was made. If hon. Members consulted a work written by the late Colonel Stewart, called Recollections of a Soldier, they would see what the result of flogging in the Army was 30 or 40 years ago. The author, who was not in favour of the total abolition of flogging, but was of the present system, said that that punishment, as formerly administered in large doses, had the effect of making men reckless and insubordinate. There was no flogging of the men in the Cunard line, and yet no one would say that those men were insubordinate. The hon. Member for the Montgomeryshire Boroughs (Mr. Hanbury Tracy) had spoken of the condition of the Merchant Service; but he should remember that if mutinies occurred they arose from the fact that good men could not be had for low wages, and that the bad men who took their places could not be trusted. The hon. Member also said that flogging was necessary to prevent the men from breaking into the spirit room; but in troop-ships, where the discipline was purely naval, there was no flogging of the men for that purpose. Now spirit rooms were only liable to be broken into in case of fire or apprehended disaster; and although he had known in musters for fire parade in troop ships loaded revolvers furnished to the guard on the spirit room, he did not think that a cat-o'-nine-tails would furnish an additional safeguard. He was quite prepared to admit that if flogging were abolished on board ship it might be necessary, in some extreme case, to inflict the punishment of death. He did not shrink from that conclusion, and should be prepared to show that the mere fact of its existence would not in any way detract from the value of the abolition of flogging, which lowered the tone of any service in which it was retained.

MR. HUNT said, the hon. Member for Leicester had made a very interesting and forcible speech on this subject. So far as his own feelings went he could assure the hon. Member that he greatly sympathised with the expressions he had used; but it was necessary not only to regard the question as one of feeling, but to look at the reasons which called for the infliction of corporal punishment. For his own part, he should have been exceedingly glad if he could have expressed his concurrence in the terms of the Motion of the hon. Member for Leicester—namely, “that the time has arrived when the punishment of flogging in the Navy should be abolished.” He could assure the hon. Member that he had no affection for the “cat,” and that he had no objection to be crowned by the chaplet of laurels which he had offered him if he could feel it his duty to accept this Motion. But not having any prejudices to overcome on this subject, and not having been brought up in the groove of corporal punishment, but looking dispassionately at the matter from the post he occupied, he could not agree with the hon. Member that the time had arrived when corporal punishment could be wholly abolished in the Royal Navy. He regretted exceedingly to be obliged to come to that conclusion, because it would be a proud day for the Service and for the country when flogging could be abolished in the Navy. His hon. Friend the Member for the Montgomery Boroughs had pointed out the great diminution in the number of cases of corporal punishment that had taken place of late years, and had attributed that diminution very properly to the Admiralty Regulations issued in 1871, limiting very much the discretion of officers with regard to the infliction of summary punishments on the person. It had been objected to the form of the Amendment that under the authority of a court martial punishments might still be inflicted other than those which had been mentioned by his hon. Friend. According to strict accuracy, that objection must be held good; but, at the same time, he believed that, practically, the words used by his hon. Friend very much represented the actual state of things. A Return had been presented to that House which showed that in 1874 there were only eight cases of corporal punishment among 30,000 men; but he would call attention to another Return presented a few days earlier from which it appeared that seven of those eight cases occurred abroad, and only one at a home station. That showed that corporal punishment was so little required at home stations that it might be said to be practically abolished. The others were cases of flogging at sea and at foreign stations, where no means of imprisonment existed. The hon. and gallant Member for Devonport (Captain Price) wished the Navy to be put on the same footing as the Army, in which flogging was abolished except in case of war—and as he was reminded except on board ship, and the reason for that exception was obvious—on shore there was the artificial system of magisterial supervision and imprisonment which enabled us to confine malefactors for the advantage of the community and without risk or immediate danger to the community. But that was not the case on board ship. His hon. and gallant Friend (Sir William Edmonstone) had alluded to a case in which, with a pistol in one hand, he had to order four men to be flogged. Suppose his hon. and gallant Friend had had no such power of flogging those men who, it was assumed, had been guilty of some offence against discipline, what might have been the fate of the ship and of those on board of her? Or put the case of a young seaman refusing to do the work assigned him, and, on being again instructed, striking the superior officer who gave the order. It was said, "Imprison him;" but on a small ship there was no means of imprisonment, and though it was possible to put him in irons, would that commend itself to the hon. Member for Leicester? If it would, it must be remembered that these things were catching and several men might refuse to work if being put in irons was all the result. In this way a mutinous disposition might spread among a crew until the number refusing to work might imperil the safety of the ship. It had been found necessary, in order to secure the safety of ships, to invest captains with a certain amount of despotic power—of course making them responsible to their superiors at home. On board large ships there were, of course, means available for imprisoning offenders, and the risk, as to the safety of the ship, would consequently be less than it would be in the case of small ships where no means of imprisonment existed. But even in large ships there was extreme difficulty in dealing with offenders at stations where there were no gaols. It was, therefore, exceedingly difficult to deal with the case of those who refused to work or who struck at superior officers. He was sorry he was unable to give the particulars of the eight cases that had occurred in 1874, as there had not been time to obtain the information since it was asked for; but, as far as his recollection went, in nearly all the cases the offence committed was that of striking a superior officer; and that offence he thought did resemble that of the garotter. In both cases personal violence was offered, and those who offered it had the least reason to complain if personal punishment was awarded them. The infliction of corporal punishment in places where an offender could be dealt with by means of imprisonment or otherwise might be safely abolished; but where there were no means of subjecting a man to irksome punishment for offences against the discipline of the Navy it was necessary to retain the power of inflicting corporal punishment. The power of officers to inflict summary corporal punishment was now much limited by the instructions issued by the Admiralty in 1871. No petty or non-commissioned officer, no seaman, Marine, or other person in the first class for conduct belonging to Her Majesty's ships was liable to summary corporal punishment, except for mutiny; and any case in which it was inflicted must be immediately reported to a superior authority. No seaman or Marine of the second class for conduct was liable to summary corporal punishment in time of peace, except for mutiny, or using or offering violence to a superior officer where the offence could not be visited with summary imprisonment. These instructions, issued in 1871, had very materially restricted the power of officers summarily to award corporal punishment, and the result had been the great diminution in the number of cases which had been already pointed out. It was true that courts martial still retained the power of inflicting corporal punishment in other cases; but it was also true that the Admiralty had discouraged the use of excessive corporal punishment; and it was perfectly well known that the Admiralty were anxious that the awarding of this punishment should be as restricted as possible, and, indeed, that it should be given only in exceptional cases. The knowledge of that fact had deterred courts martial from inflicting this punishment in the way they used to do. It would be quite possible to restrict by regulation or by statute the infliction of the punishment at home ports; but that would be merely making law of the present practice. As regarded foreign stations and ships at sea, it seemed that it would hardly be safe to limit the power of flogging more than at present; but he hoped the day might come when they might see their way to act upon the view expressed in the Motion of the hon. Member for Leicester. It would be a happy day for the Service if they could see their way to abolish flogging altogether, but he did not think the time had come when that could safely be done. He should prefer to give a negative to the Motion of the hon. Member for Leicester rather than to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Montgomery Boroughs, because he did not think that its words technically described the present state of the law. If therefore that Amendment was withdrawn and they took the division on the Motion of the hon. Member for Leicester, they would have a clearer issue before them.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he was unable on that occasion to give any other vote than he would have given if he had still been in any degree responsible for the discipline of the Navy, and he thought it only fair to his successor that he should state that frankly to the House. He was glad that the measures taken in 1871 had practically had the effect, if not of technically abolishing corporal punishment, yet of reducing it to the very smallest possible proportions; and he trusted that what had been said that night would not create the belief out-of-doors that corporal punishment prevailed to any extent in the Navy, or that the officers of the Navy were not as anxious to put the very narrowest limits to that detestable punishment as any Member of that House. While himself at the Admiralty he had to deal with many officers of all ranks, of both sides in politics, and belonging to both the old school and the new; but he was unable to get from any officers, even of the new school, or from any officers who had been in high command or even responsible in any degree for the discipline of their ships, such a body of opinion as would have justified him in assenting to the Motion of the hon. Member for Leicester. At the same time, he had received from those officers every support in limiting that form of punishment in the way it had been limited in the last three or four years, and he well remembered the great care that was taken by the Admiralty whenever it was actually inflicted to ascertain every circumstance connected with the case, and to see whether the regulations had been in any way infringed. He believed that in only one instance within the three years during which he was First Lord was there any doubtful case in regard to the conduct of a naval officer on that point. While corporal punishment had been thus reduced, our sailors were treated in every other respect with more humanity and more gentleness by their officers than those of any other nation. It was notorious that other nations had recourse to punishments for the sake of maintaining discipline, in the absence of corporal punishment, that we had never sanctioned, and which would almost revolt everyone in that House. ["Name."] He did not know whether he was asked to name the country or the punishment; but he thought it would scarcely be fair to name the countries. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) seemed to suggest that it might be better to shoot two or three men than to have to flog eight. But would the officers have the two or three shot? Would they accept the responsibility of doing that? They might, perhaps, be driven to do it, but what would then be said of the Service? The difficulty of maintaining discipline on distant stations was extremely great, and when it was urged that men might be put in irons and in cells, he remembered what had been said to him by naval officers on that subject. They said, for instance, that if they found themselves in the Red Sea, where the heat was tropical, and they imprisoned men for a fortnight, that punishment would be far more cruel and almost more dangerous to life itself than any other punishment that could be inflicted.

MR. T. E. SMITH believed that for one man flogged in the Navy 100 were deterred from entering the Naval Reserve. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr.

Mr. Hunt

Goschen) said that if flogging were abolished it would be necessary to resort to more revolting modes of punishment; but he had omitted to specify the punishments to which he referred, so that the House might have an opportunity of forming its own opinion on the subject.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD was of opinion that it was a good thing that captains of ships should have the power of flogging. Seventeen years ago when he joined the Service as a Midshipman flogging was common for all sorts of offences, and small acts of insubordination, but now the reverse was the rule. The hon. Member for Leicester had spoken of the Returns of punishments not being so great as they used to be, but he had not hit upon the real cause, which was that offences were not now nearly so numerous as formerly, and the men were so very much improved. They now tried to teach them instead of driving them. He was glad of this, but he should be sorry to see the power abolished altogether. The fact that only some seven men were flogged last year out of about 28,000 showed that that form of punishment was not abused, and he believed that its existence exercised a wholesome effect on the Service. Indeed, the men would probably regret the abolition of flogging as much as anybody. When men did not go smartly about their duty, he had sometimes heard old blue-jackets regret that they could not get a dozen lashes for it as in the good old days. It was a great mistake to suppose that the abolition of flogging would stop desertion or induce more men to enter the Service. It would do nothing of the sort, for what was wanted was a little more pay.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR, in reply, said: In one thing, Sir, I think the outside public will agree on reading the report of this debate—that when the two front benches do agree, their unanimity is wonderful. I think I can anticipate the mode in which people will speak of the debate to-night, and I think I can assure the right hon. Gentleman of one thing that they have made up their minds upon, that they cannot understand the mysteries which attach to officialism. The right hon. Gentleman has declined to do that which he says when done will be a happy day for the Navy, and the right hon. Gentleman on this side of the House enthusiastically defends a punishment he designates as detestable.

CIVIL SERVICE TRADING.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

SIR THOMAS CHAMBERS called attention to the subject of Civil Service trading, and moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the matter. He was encouraged to do so by the reception which previous Motions had met with from the House. The Civil Service Supply Association turned over per annum £1,000,000; the Army and Navy Co-operative Society, £500,000 per annum; the Haymarket Association, £750,000; and, altogether, more than £3,000,000 was received and turned over every year by such associations in the metropolis alone. It was obvious, therefore, that they were diverting trade from ordinary retail channels. The question, therefore, was whether it was co-operation in the fair sense of the word, or whether it was a gigantic system of joint stock trading. He maintained it was the latter—

OBSERVATIONS.

CAPTAIN NOLAN rose to ask the Secretary of State for War, If any Officer stationed at Newbridge had been refused, verbally or in writing, leave to contest an Irish constituency; and was this refusal on account of his politics?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY not being present in his place, and no Answer being given—

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, that as he had received no Answer, and was not likely to receive one, he need hardly apologize for moving the adjournment of the House in order that he might explain the circumstances of the case, and the reasons that influenced him in giving Notice of the Question. The constituency of the county Leitrim had before them at the last General Election three candidates—one a supporter of the Government, and the other two opponents. One of those opposed to the Government was returned; the other, Captain O'Beirne, actually had more votes than the supporter of the Government, but he was not returned, some of the voters being disqualified by the Returning Officer on an alleged informality caused by his own subordinates improperly and informally marking the voting papers. He mentioned this to show that the gentleman to whom he was about to allude (Captain O'Beirne) was a bonâ fide and substantial candidate. That gentleman was an officer of the Army, and at the present moment was quartered at Newbridge. Now everyone knew that the representation of that county was practically vacant, though the writ had not been moved by the elevation of a supporter of the Government, Mr. Ormsby Gore, to the Peerage by the death of his brother, Lord Harlech. This amounted practically to the refusal of permission to this officer to become a candidate for the vacant seat. He did not wish unfairly to blame the Ministry in this matter, and he did not charge them with having sent orders to Newbridge to place obstacles in the way of this officer proceeding to the West of Ireland because he was opposed to them; but to a certain extent the Government were, he thought, responsible. He knew that the Secretary of State for War could not be present that day, because they knew that the right hon. Gentleman had had an engagement of several days' standing to go to Shoeburyness to witness Artillery experiments. But on Monday the Ministry were aware that this officer had been practically refused leave to contest the vacancy, and they then had the means of influencing the military authorities in Ireland who had the power of granting him leave. In these days there was very rapid communication by telegraph, and the Government ought to have known how to act without loss of time; and had he telegraphed at once to Ireland, he might have had an answer in three or four hours' time; but it appeared that an answer had only reached them at 11.30 that day stating that that officer had applied for leave from the 22nd to the 29th, which would be granted. That meant that there had been a delay of several days; for part of which the Government were responsible, and he could only say he should be sorry if the Party with which he was connected gained an electioneering advantage at such a price. He regretted that there was no Minister present to answer his Question, which referred to a political rather than a military matter. He would conclude by moving that the House do now adjourn.

MR. SULLIVAN seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—
—(Captain Nolan.)

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN presumed the object of the Motion was to enable his hon. and gallant Friend (Captain Nolan) to make his statement, and if possible to elicit some explanation from some Member of the Government. He saw one of Her Majesty's Ministers sitting on the front Government Bench (Sir James Elphinstone). If that hon. Gentleman did not afford some explanation, he should recommend his hon. and gallant Friend (Captain Nolan) to ask permission of the House to withdraw his Motion for the adjournment, and to bring the subject forward again to-morrow, when the Secretary of State for War would be in his place.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he had been so pointedly alluded to by the right hon. and learned Baronet that he could not avoid rising in answer to his appeal; but the fact was that he had no knowledge of the transaction they were discussing, and his geographical knowledge of the part of Ireland under discussion was very limited. But he thought that, instead of bringing that matter before the House, more especially on a Wednesday, when Ministers were engaged in important business in their offices, it would have been much better if that question had been postponed until it could be properly answered. The hon. and gallant Member had acknowledged that he was aware the Secretary of State for War was at Shoeburyness on public business. He would only add, without reference to this particular case, that he trusted that the number of military Gentlemen on full pay in that House might not be increased, and that the Conservative candidate at Leitrim might succeed.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he had no doubt the hon. Baronet very earnestly desired that a Conservative might succeed in getting in for Leitrim county; but he (Mr. Sullivan) did not do the Ministry the injustice of thinking they would try to snatch a petty advantage by finesse and manœuvring. In an election contest an early start was half the battle, and it was well known that if one party could so manœuvre as to keep their opponent out of the county for five or six days, they could secure all the cars and the solicitors and laugh at him when he entered the field late. He did not for a moment suppose that the question affected the Secretary for War; but it was very well known that unless someone stood between Captain O'Beirne and the constituency of Leitrim for four or five of the most precious days in the campaign, by no means could that gentleman be defeated. It was not through any fault of his own or of his supporters that he was not returned at the last election, but simply because the Sheriff's officers had put marks on voting papers.

MR. GREENE deprecated the practice of moving the adjournment of the House on every trivial occasion—a proceeding which had been more frequently resorted to this Session than he had ever known before. He sympathized with the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan), and regarded the question as one of considerable importance; but he thought that as the hon. and gallant Member knew that the Secretary of State for War would be absent that day he ought to have put off his Question till to-morrow. The candidate referred to would not have suffered by a day's delay, and he might by telegraph have ordered the "cars" for bringing up his voters if he wanted to engage them so early. It was not fair that a grave charge of that kind should be made in the House when no one was there to answer it, so that it might be represented by telegraph all over Ireland that the Government were intriguing against that particular candidate. No Government in their senses would be parties to so foolish a proceeding, and to bring forward such an accusation in so unfair a manner was like attacking a man in the dark.

MR. SPEAKER said, it was an unusual course for an hon. Member to move the adjournment of the House on a Question, when those who alone were able to give explanations on the subject were not in their places.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY maintained that his hon. and gallant Friend (Captain Nolan) was perfectly justified in the course he had taken. His hon. and gallant Friend had brought the matter to the notice of the Secretary for War on Monday last. Having consulted some of his friends, they advised him to go at once to the head of the War Department, instead of making it a public matter, in the full expectation that the right hon. Gentleman would at once telegraph and desire that the proper amount of leave should be given to Captain O'Beirne. Nothing of the kind, however, appeared to have been done, and then his hon. and gallant Friend put his Question on the Paper for the purpose of eliciting an Answer, 44 hours having elapsed since he first brought the subject under the notice of the War Office authorities. The question whether the Ministry had impeded the nomination of a gentleman for a seat in that House was one of constitutional importance, and could only properly be brought forward on a Motion for adjournment. He submitted, indeed, that the conduct of his hon. and gallant Friend in the matter had not only been constitutional, but most conciliatory towards the Government. Although the writ for the election had not yet been issued, the Government candidate was already in the field, and it was perfectly idle under the circumstances to say that his hon. and gallant Friend had at all acted unfairly.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, he had given notice to the Financial Secretary of the War Department that he would ask the Question to-day. He had received from the hon. Gentleman a note dated 11.30 that morning, stating that no news had been received from Ireland; but a few minutes afterwards he understood that seven days' leave had been given Captain O'Beirne. This he could not but consider as wholly inadequate to the occasion; but as no end would be served by dividing the House under the circumstances, he begged to withdraw his Motion.

(Dr. Cameron, Mr. Baxter, Mr. Barclay, Mr. M'Laren, Mr. Edward Jenkins.)

Order for Second Reading read.

DR. CAMERON*: The object of the Bill which I shall to-day ask the House to read a second time is to amend the law of Scotland on a point in relation to which it is admitted on every side—by those who oppose this Bill as well as by those who support it—to stand urgently in need of reform. English and Irish Members will be surprised to learn that no person, of whatever religion he may be, can in Scotland be married by a clergyman without submitting himself to what has been held by the highest Courts of Law to be a sacred ordinance of the Established Presbyterian Church, and having the banns of marriage published in the church of the parish in which he resides. Under the laws of England and Ireland this is not so, and any person who chooses can lodge his notice with the district registrar, and obtain the requisite certificate or licence for the celebration of the marriage. But in Scotland a religious marriage can only be celebrated after proclamation of banns in the Established Church, and any minister—Presbyterian, Roman Catholic, or Episcopal—celebrating a marriage except upon production of a certificate of such proclamation of banns, is liable, according to Acts still unrepealed, to banishment forth the kingdom under pain of death, and to such pecuniary and corporal pains as the Lords of the Privy Council shall be pleased to inflict. The only exception from this rule that no regular marriage can be celebrated without the proclamation of banns, is to be found in the Jewish communion and the Society of Friends, in whose case the necessity for the customary proclamation of banns has been by statute done away with. Before proceeding further it may be well to explain that any person may be married without banns who chooses to dispense with the services of a clergyman and content himself with an irregular marriage. But happily now-a-days irregular marriages are considered more or less discreditable, and few persons care to incur the stigma attaching to a marriage which, however binding, has to be registered as irregular. Persons may, to speak popularly, be married by a Sheriff or by a registrar, but no marriage can be registered as regular which has not been celebrated by a minister after the publication of banns in an Established Church. Were it only irregular marriages contracted before a Sheriff or registrar and subsequently registered which were recognized by the law of Scotland, this stigma would not attach. But in the great majority of cases irregular marriages, whether arising out of verba de presenti, habit and repute, or promise cum copula, are never registered at all, and there is so much difficulty in proving them, that not only do constant disputes spring out of them respecting successions, but in cases of bigamy and desertion arising in connection with them, the laws for the prevention of these very serious crimes against society cannot be enforced. Whatever diversity of opinion, therefore, exists as to the desirability of continuing to recognize irregular marriages, it is universally agreed throughout Scotland that everything should be done to encourage regular marriages, and to render these irregular marriages as little frequent as possible. Now the existing practice as regards the proclamation of banns has directly the opposite tendency. In the first place, while any person who has resided three weeks in Scotland can contract an irregular marriage, no person can contract a regular one who has not lived in the parish in the church of which the banns are proclaimed during the preceding six weeks. Then the charges are high. A Return presented to the House within the last few months, on the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Mr. Noel), shows that the fees paid for proclamations during the year 1874 amounted to upwards of £17,000, and that the average cost was 10s. 10d. per proclamation, or about twice that sum per marriage. In most parishes it is customary to charge a certain sum for the regular proclamation, on three successive Sundays, a considerably larger one for the ceremony if compressed into two Sundays, and a still larger one for it if compressed into one. In a few parishes no such distinction is made, and in a few, proclamations extending over three Sundays are charged at the highest rate; but even the lowest rate in many parishes is as high as 10s. or 12s., and in a case of a bride and bridegroom who may have the misfortune to reside in separate parishes where such a high minimum is fixed, it is impossible to obtain a regular marriage without the preliminary disbursement of £1, or even more for proclamation fees. Throughout Scotland, the average minimum charge shown in the Return is somewhat lower, but I do not think I am above the mark when I say that where persons about to marry reside in separate parishes, the average minimum fees for proclamation, which they must pay if they wish to be married regularly, amounts to between 10s. and 12s. 6d. Now the result of this high charge, according to the concurrent testimony of a large number of most reliable witnesses before the Marriage Laws Commissioners of 1865, is to encourage concubinage, or, to speak more correctly, and to use the language of my hon. Friend the senior Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren,) who was one of the witnesses referred to, to encourage "a kind of concubinage which is called marriage, and perhaps is intended to be marriage"—to encourage, I may add, a form of irregular marriage of the very worst description. If we look for any counterbalancing advantages in the present system, we look in vain. The object of the proclamation of banns is, of course, to secure publicity, and to prevent the contraction of bigamous and illegal marriages. The plan at present pursued was adopted in Roman Catholic times, when, and for long after Roman Catholicism had given way to Presbyterianism, it doubtless answered its purpose excellently. There were then no large centres of population such as have since sprung into existence. There was then no machinery by means of which so effective a publicity could be attained. The people of Scotland almost in one body belonged to the Established Church. No regular marriage could be celebrated but by a minister of the Established Church, and the session clerk, to whom was entrusted the direction of the proclamation of banns, was also practically the registrar of marriages. Moreover, in those days the kirk sessions were entrusted with the charge of the poor, and the fees received for proclamations went towards their maintenance. Now every one of these circumstances has been changed. The Established Church of Scotland no longer comprises a majority of the population. Ministers of every denomination are allowed to celebrate regular marriages, the registration of marriages is conducted by the civil registrar, and the proportion of the fees which finds its way into the pockets of the poor is infinitesimally small. As to the uselessness of the ceremony, I might quote abundant evidence; but as this point is hardly likely to be disputed, it will, I think, sufficiently support my position to quote a single sentence from the Report of the Marriage Laws Commissioners before referred to. In England they say the practice of proclaiming the banns—

"Is practically useless and inconvenient in very populous places. In Scotland, being confined by law to the Established Church, and being performed three times over on a single Sunday, just before the commencement of divine service, it can be of very little, if any, use, particularly in great towns or cities; and it is not unreasonably complained of by the Scottish Nonconformists, who are married by their own ministers, as being in their case vexatious as well as useless."

This brings me to another branch of the subject, and leads me to ask the question, How came matters into this condition? How came it that while in no part of the United Kingdom is there the same opportunity for contracting irregular marriages as in Scotland, in no part of it is the contracting of regular marriages fenced round with the same restrictions?—for in no part of the United Kingdom is it necessary for a person who desires an ecclesiastical marriage to reside six weeks in one parish before he can obtain a licence to be married, and in no part of it must he, to whatever persuasion he may belong, as the indispensable preliminary to it, submit to what has been pronounced by the very highest authority—by the Court of Session and by the House of Lords—to be a purely ecclesiastical ordinance of the Established Church. Well, the history of the present state of things is this. The Scottish law being founded on the Roman law, from the very earliest times embodied the maxim that consent constitutes matrimony. But in the olden days of ecclesiastical intolerance, whatever Church happened for the time being to be supreme claimed a monopoly in the celebration of marriages accompanied with any religious ceremony, and did everything in its power to procure the legal suppression and punishment of clandestine marriages by the ministers of every other persuasion. Thus, before the Reformation the Roman Catholics had secured a monopoly of regular marriages, and this monopoly was seized as part of the privileges of the National Church, as the Episcopalians or Presbyterians respectively succeeded in acquiring ecclesiastical supremacy. The system of proclaiming banns of marriage in the Established Church survived through all the different régimes, and as each régime succeeded its predecessor, each asserted its claim to the sole right of celebrating regular marriages. Each stigmatized all marriages celebrated otherwise than by one of its own ministers, after proclamation of banns in one of its own churches, as irregular and clandestine, and enacted against them sundry pains and penalties. During the long reign of the present Established Church of Scotland this monopoly in regular marriages remained in force practically down to the year 1834. It is true that more than a century previously an exception had been made in favour of Episcopalians who had taken the oath to Government, but with that small exception no clergyman of any other denomination than the Established Church—no Dissenting Presbyterian, or Methodist, or Roman Catholic could celebrate a regular marriage in Scotland. I need not here enter into a discussion of the effect which this piece of ecclesiastical tyranny had upon the Scottish people, or how it drove them into the very system of irregular marriages which it was intended to suppress. Suffice it to say that in 1834 this ancient disability was repealed, and the power of celebrating regular marriages was thrown open to ministers of every persuasion. But the reform then effected stopped short half way. It left unrepealed the Clandestine Marriage Acts of 1661 and 1698, according to which any clergyman celebrating a marriage otherwise than after the proclamation of banns is liable to be banished from the kingdom and to such pecuniary and corporal penalties as the Lords of the Privy Council may choose to inflict. This law, it is true, has not been lately enforced, simply because it has not of late been broken. But when, shortly after 1834, some of the newly-enfranchised Dissenting clergymen attempted to set it at defiance, intimation was conveyed to them from the Crown Office that it would be put in force against them, unless their irregular proceedings were at once discontinued. The anomaly has been greatly aggravated by a decision pronounced only last year by the Court of Session and confirmed a few months since by the House of Lords—Harper v. Hutton. Up to the date of that decision it was practically supposed that the proclamation of banns, although a duty entrusted to the officials of the parish church, was really a civil ceremony, and in accordance with that supposition the right of proclaiming banns of marriage was up to last year confined to the parish churches of parishes quoad omnia. Thus it occurred that it was in a comparatively small proportion only of Established Churches that these proclamations were made; and any disability which might attach to ministers belonging to other denominations to marry persons who had not been proclaimed in the parish churches was shared by the ministers of the quoad sacra Established churches and chapels of ease. The recent decision has, however, altered this, and according to it the proclamation of banns in the eye of the law is a purely ecclesiastical institution, and consequently not only is every quoad sacra parish entitled to proclaim the banns of every person residing within it, but every person living within a quoad sacra parish, desirous of marrying, must have his banns of marriage proclaimed in the church of that quoad sacra parish. The language adopted by the Judges in the case to which I refer declares in the most unmistakable terms the purely ecclesiastical nature of the ceremony. Thus, the Lord President, in the course of his speech, said—

“The Reformers, though they rejected the idea of marriage being a sacrament, and assumed it to be a civil contract, always claimed the right to regulate the preliminaries to marriage as being an ordinance of the Church, and so inter sacra, and I can find no distinction drawn by the Reformers in this respect between marriage and baptism or any other sacrament of the Church. . . . In any aspect, this matter of the proclamation of banns is essentially ecclesiastical, not in the sense of consistorial, but as being within the regulation and control of the Church, and particularly of the minister of the parish.”

Now we have seen that even under the old theory, the Marriage Laws Commissioners, referring to the fact of proclamations being in Scotland confined to the Established Church, stated that the system was—

“not unreasonably complained of by the Scottish Nonconformists, who are married by their own ministers, as being in their case vexatious as well as useless.”

Is it to be wondered that, now that proclamation has been authoritatively pronounced to be not a civil ceremony, but a sacred ordinance of the Established Church, the Dissenting bodies of Scotland should feel their repugnance to it greatly increased? Is it to be wondered that the discontent and dissatisfaction which had so long slumbered broke forth into open agitation? The decision in Harper v. Hutton will, however, clear away a great practical difficulty. Hitherto the officials of the parish churches had enjoyed a monopoly of the fees derived from the proclamation of banns and supposed themselves to have a vested interest in them. Now as these fees amounted to £17,000 a-year, the sum necessary to buy them up was the first obstacle in the way of a reformer. Now, however, Harper v. Hutton decided that no such vested interest exists. And what has taken place since then will have a still more serious effect in dispelling any lingering idea as to the vested rights of kirk sessions or session clerks in the matter which may still remain. For the General Assembly of the Established Church, taking advantage of the principle so clearly laid down in the recent decision, with the object of meeting that objection raised to the expense of the present system has in an overture to the presbyteries of the Church recommended that henceforth no fee exceeding 2s. 6d. shall be charged for the proclamation of banns, thereby reducing, at a stroke of the pen, the previous average charge of 10s. 10d. to less than a fourth of that sum. This, however, was not the only change in the present system enjoined by the Established Assembly at its last meeting. Its overture to the presbyteries, in fact, proposes a change in that system quite as sweeping as anything proposed in this Bill. The Assembly virtually admitted that the old practice, in which proclamations were, in a very large number of cases, made three times on one day, was illegal, for it recommended that henceforth they should be made on three separate Sundays. It further admitted that for purposes of securing publicity the system was altogether unsatisfactory, for it recommended that henceforth a list of the notices should be posted on the church doors for 14 days before the last day of proclamation. Now, Sir, so far as regards the first of these changes—the recommendation that henceforth proclamation must be made in every case on three successive Sundays—its effect would be to aggravate the obstacles at present placed in the way of regular marriages. For, whereas it is possible under the whole system for two persons to get married after a residence of six weeks and two days in their respective parishes, it would not be possible if this proposal were adopted for them to get through the prescribed preliminaries under eight weeks and two days. When it is remembered that the only restriction upon irregular marriages is a residence of one of the couple for three weeks in Scotland, it is easy to perceive the impolicy of throwing any additional obstacle in the shape of parochial residence in the way of regular marriages. Having said so much on the subject generally, I may dispose of the provisions of the measure now before the House in a few words. The Bill proposes to do away with those pains and penalties which at present attach to the celebration of a religious marriage without the publication of banns, and to substitute for the present system as the legal preliminary of all regular marriages, a notice published through the district registrar. It may be asked why not simply abolish the necessity for any preliminary notice, if, as appears to be universally admitted, the system of proclamation pursued for so many years has been utterly inefficient as a means of ensuring publicity? Well, there are very good reasons, it appears to me, for not adopting this course. In the first place, the distinction between a regular and an irregular marriage in Scotland consists not in the fact of registration—for irregular marriages may be registered as well as regular ones—but in the twofold fact of publication of notice of the intention of marriage, and the celebration of the marriage by the minister of a recognized religious sect. It seems to me, therefore, that it would be going altogether in the wrong direction to reduce that distinction by eliminating the element of notice of intention and recognizing solely the element of religious celebration. Especially would it be so, where, as in Scotland, that celebration does not take place in church or according to a prescribed form, but ordinarily at the house of the minister or that of the bride, and according to any form which the celebrator may think fit to adopt. Moreover, I think that an effective publication of intention to marry is most desirable as a preventive of illegal and bigamous marriages, and in this I am so completely borne out by public opinion in Scotland, that I am not aware of any serious proposal from any section of the community to simplify matters by abrogating these preliminary notices altogether. Now, publicity is provided for in the Bill before us by enacting that notice shall be given to the district registrar, who shall expose all such notices in a part of his office accessible to the public, and leave them thus exposed for a week before issuing the certificate upon which a marriage may take place. This, it will be observed, is very much the plan which the General Assembly proposes to adopt, and it is probably the most effective means by which publicity could be secured. I have been asked, Why not advertise the notices in the local papers? My reply is, that to do so would entail expense, whereas according to my plan the notices will be advertised in the most effectual manner, and that without expense. For if ordered to be advertised, the expense would prevent the notices being inserted in more than one paper circulating in each town or district, and the fact of their being there paid for as advertisements would prevent their free insertion by the other papers of the district. On the other hand, I believe that if it were put within the power of every local paper to publish them or not, as it chose, the great majority of papers would consider such announcements as of quite as much interest as those of bankruptcies, and would insert them as news. But not only will this publicity be attained through the newspapers, but from what I have heard I think it more than probable that various of the churches would, if the work were thrown open, proclaim banns of intended marriages in which their own congregations were interested. In preparing this Bill, my object has been, in the first place, carefully to abstain from any interference with the Scottish marriage law; and, in the second, bearing in mind the facilities with which irregular marriages can be contracted in Scotland, to avoid the imposition of any avoidable impediment in the way of regular marriages. With this view, the fee which registrars are authorised to charge in connection with each notice is 2s., or considerably less than half the sum now charged as a minimum in the great majority of parishes. Then the Bill proposes to curtail the total period of residence in a district from six weeks, as it now stands, to 21 days, as is the case with registrars' certificates in England. Twenty-one days seem to me quite long enough for all practical purposes, and if a person may under Lord Brougham's Act contract an irregular marriage after 21 days' residence in Scotland, I cannot conceive what advantage is to be gained by requiring of both the man and woman six weeks' residence in their respective parishes as an indispensable preliminary to a regular marriage. In dealing with the subject I propose to amend the present law in one or two points in which it is at present very defective. At present, for instance, there is no machinery for dealing with the objections raised by persons who "forbid the banns"—no punishment for making wilfully false statements in filling up the schedule for the session clerks. This Bill proposes to deal with these points; but as they are mere matters of detail, and as, if the House accords the Bill a second reading, I intend considerably to modify its details in Committee, I shall not further allude to them at present. Now, Sir, as I said in starting, every section of the community is agreed that the old law of banns is altogether unsatisfactory and that it must be reformed. So far as I am aware, only three plans of reform have been proposed—(1) That which has been proposed by the Established General Assembly; (2) the throwing open of the right of proclaiming banns to Dissenting Churches; and (3) the plan proposed in the Bill now before the House. The plan adopted by the General Assembly, and which I have already described, will, I venture to say, satisfy no one. It is a significant commentary upon it that it was never heard of until it was hurriedly concocted by a Committee of the Assembly, called into existence by the fact of this Bill being before Parliament. The members of the Assembly were allowed no time for its consideration. Judging from the reports of the proceedings, the rev. gentleman who seconded the adoption of the plan could not have known of its existence half-an-hour before he acted as its sponsor. It was read over to him, and some 34 other ministers and elders who were present, only after he had made a speech in defence of this very Bill; and after a short discussion in that meagre house it was adopted, after a division, by a majority of but 24. Compare that with the expression of opinion in favour of my Bill, which has been before the country for months, which has been discussed in almost every Free and United Presbyterian Presbytery in the country, and which both the Free Assembly and the United Presbyterian Synod by unanimous resolutions resolved to support. The lowering of the fees would certainly be a step in the right direction, but in other respects the plan proposed by the Established Assembly aggravates the grievance of which not merely Dissenting Bodies but the marrying public generally have so long complained. The abolition of the convenient irregularity of proclamation three times on one day would prove very annoying in many cases. But the great objection to the scheme of the General Assembly is, that it places more plainly before the country than it has ever been placed since clergymen outside the pale of the Establishment were allowed to celebrate marriages, the fact that no person in Scotland can obtain a regular marriage without undergoing what a member of the Edinburgh Presbytery lately characterised as "if not exactly a sacrament, at least a very holy thing," and that no clergyman—Presbyterian, Episcopal, Roman Catholic, Methodist, or Baptist—can celebrate a marriage except on the production of a certificate that this sacred ordinance of the dominant Church has been complied with, under pain of banishment and fine. Not only so, but the action of the General Assembly brings out this most remarkable fact—that, as the law at present stands, if a majority of the Established Presbyteries throughout the country adopt the overture which has been sent down to them, the General Assembly will next year, without appealing to Parliament, and without consulting a single individual outside its own sect, be able to effect an entire change in the law relating to the proclamation of banns, and affecting not merely members of its own Church, but those of every other persuasion in Scotland. The second proposal—namely, that proclamation of banns should be allowed to take place in any recognized place of worship—is free from the objections to which the General Assembly's makeshift plan is open, but it is open to two objections equally fatal. In the first place, as many persons, especially those belonging to the smaller denominations, attend churches which are situated neither in their registration districts nor in the parishes in which they reside, it would be difficult to devise machinery which would enable the proposal to be worked out satisfactorily. In the second place, while a cumbrous and objectionable system would thus be inaugurated for the purpose of conciliating the Dissenting Bodies, it would be a system for which none of these Bodies have expressed the smallest desire. So far back as 1866, the accredited representatives both of the Free and the United Presbyterian Churches laid their views before the Marriage Laws Commissioners, and in both cases what they recommended was the plan embodied in this Bill—namely, that publicity should be given to the intention to marry through the agency of the officer entrusted with the duty of registering marriages—the district registrar, to wit. If this proposal were carried out, its effect would be to relieve Dissenters, lay and clerical, of an invidious and degrading disability. It has been attempted in some quarters to connect this Bill with the questions of the secularization of marriage and of disestablishment. It has nothing to do with either. The proclamation of banns in an Established Church may be an ordinance very sacred to the members of that Church, and there cannot be the smallest objection to its being voluntarily continued in their case, but it can do no more good to force every Free Churchman or United Presbyterian, every Episcopalian or Roman Catholic, to partake of that ordinance than it could do to make them, one and all, sign the Thirty-nine Articles as an indispensable preliminary to marriage. With the question of disestablishment, this Bill has nothing whatever to do. The Church of England possesses no such monopoly—has no such powers of regulating the preliminaries of religious marriages of Dissenters as that which the recent decisions has shown to lie in the hands of the Scottish Established Church. But no one will pretend to say that the want of that invidious control in any way weakens its real power or threatens to bring its existence to an end. The hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) has, I perceive, at the very last moment put down a hostile Motion against this Bill, and proposes to refer the law of the subject to a Select Committee. The law of the subject has been before the county session and the House of Lords for the last six months, and what possible legal light the hon. and gallant Gentleman can expect to result from an investigation by a Committee of this House I confess I am at a loss to conceive. Had he proposed to refer the Bill to a Select Committee I should have desired nothing better. It is too late in the Session to allow us to hope that this Bill can this year become law—nor am I particularly anxious that it should pass until the most ample time has been afforded to discover and rectify every flaw in its details; but, Sir, I would earnestly ask the House to affirm its principle by reading it a second time. The time for a change is most opportune. The old system has been overturned within the last few months; the new system of quoad sacra proclamations has not had time to acquire the consistency of a recognized or familiar practice. While another change is contemplated by the Established Assembly next year, the present is the time for reform. I need hardly invoke the vote of Protestant Dissenting Members to remove an un-called-for and insulting disability against which their brethren in Scotland, of whatever denomination, have long protested. I call, however, upon every Episcopalian who sits here to vote with me, unless he would brand Episcopalians in Scotland as unfit to be allowed to marry, without first submitting themselves to a sacred ordinance of the Established Presbyterian Church; and I call upon every Roman Catholic to support me, unless he would rivet upon his co-religionists in Scotland the necessity which the law at present imposes on them to participate in a quasi-sacrament of the Established Presbyterian Church as the one portal through which they can be admitted to their own sacrament of marriage—the one condition on which their priests are allowed to administer that sacrament of their Church. In conclusion, Sir, I beg to move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Dr. Cameron.)

MR. ORR EWING said, the hon. Member who introduced the Bill (Dr. Cameron) had given an interesting history of the penal laws on the Statute Book with reference to irregular marriages in Scotland; but he (Mr. Orr Ewing) did not see within the four corners of the Bill any provisions to remedy this evil. The object of the Bill was to abolish the ancient system of proclamation of banns of marriage in Scotland, which had existed for centuries under various Christian Churches. It was a custom that was not confined to Scotland; the same law prevailed in England and Ireland; and he was not aware that the Episcopal Church in England, or the Roman Catholic Church in other countries, stood in that respect in a more favourable position than Scotland. Neither of those Churches would marry until they had proclaimed to the world the intended marriage. The Bill proposed not only to abolish the present law, but to substitute for it another—namely, that of simply registering the intention of marriage in the books of the Registrar appointed for registering births, deaths, and marriages. The reason given for this great change was stated in the Preamble of the Bill to be publicity. The hon. Member had said in addition that his object was likewise to secure economy. He (Mr. Orr Ewing) thought he should be able to show that the method proposed by the hon. Member would not secure greater, but rather less, publicity than at present; while it would entail additional expense upon those who were contemplating marriage. The hon. Member for Glasgow had stated that the present system did not give publicity, because proclamations were made before the congregation had met, and were read over three times so hurriedly that few people knew what was taking place. Now, that was not his experience of the manner in which the law was carried out.

DR. CAMERON said, that what the hon. Member referred to was to be found in the Report of the Commissioners.

MR. ORR EWING said, that in that case the Report of the Commissioners, and not the hon. Member, was wrong. The law was that the proclamation should be on three different Sundays; but there were some cases in which that was not insisted upon. Nor was it insisted upon in England—because special privileges might be obtained by the payment of a fine. But according to the regulations of the Established Church in Scotland, there ought to be a proclamation upon three Sundays; and that was the rule invariably followed in the case of 99 marriages out of every 100. It was only a great swell, who did not begrudge to pay an extra pound or two, who could secure the thing being hurried over and done in one day. But the hon. Member for Glasgow was aware that the Church of Scotland had issued instructions to all congregations belonging to that communion to the effect that all proclamations should be for three days, and it had reduced the fee to a uniform sum of 2s. 6d. He had no doubt that in quoad sacra churches that was to be the maximum; and he believed the day not to be far distant when the proclamation of banns would be done for nothing. Moreover, it was necessary in the case of parties intending to get married who resided in different parishes that the proclamation should be made in each parish. Now, what was the intent of this Bill? It was to enable parties to register their intended marriage in the common register, a copy of the proclamation to be placed outside the walls of the registry office. Now, he (Mr. Orr Ewing) would ask any hon. Member who was acquainted with registry offices in great towns—small offices situated in obscure streets through which the people seldom passed—whether it was at all likely that the general community or those interested in a particular marriage would know anything about it? By the rules of the Church, the proclamation of banns would now be made for three Sundays, when the congregation was gathered together and the clergyman had ascended the pulpit, and he must say he did not know of any system which could be adopted that would give greater publicity than that. He thought his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow stated that the expense incurred was upon an average 10s. 8d. He (Mr. Orr Ewing) did not know where he got his information, but that which he had himself received did not agree with it. He could assure the House that in the country districts such fees were altogether unknown. But whatever fees might have been charged hitherto, hon. Members knew that it was the resolution of the Church that they should be cut down to 2s. 6d.—and under his hon. Friend's Bill they would amount to 2s. 1d. But his hon. Friend stated in his speech that he did not intend to interfere with the Church making such regulations as they thought proper, regarding the proclamation in the Church. If that were so, would it not entail an additional expense? The fact was that the real object of this Bill was to take away the privilege which belonged to the Established Church of Scotland in order to put Dissenting bodies on terms of equality with it. Now, he was perfectly prepared to put Dissenting Churches upon terms of perfect equality with the Established Church upon every question which did not affect the principle of an Established Church, and had the hon. Member brought in a Bill to give to the Dissenters of Scotland the same privilege enjoyed by the Church of Scotland to proclaim the intention of marriage on the part of their own members, he would have given it his most hearty support. But the hon. Member did not like the system of levelling up—what he sought was a levelling down:—and accordingly he had brought in this measure to do what could not help proving to be very injurious. Although the people of Scotland did not believe that marriage was a sacrament, yet they did feel that it was the holiest union that could exist between human beings; and that while it was a solemn ceremony and ought to be conducted by religious service, still that every facility should be given by the law to persons to be married. Nevertheless, very few irregular marriages took place, for the people preferred to be married by a clergyman in a regular way. He thought the present system had worked well in Scotland, and that they ought not to make this revolutionary change without some far stronger ground being shown for it than that relied upon by the hon. Member for Glasgow. He would also point out that the House, in approving the principle of this Bill, would invade the spiritual right of the Church. Parliament and the State had never interfered with the Church in laying down its own regulations as to how its members should be married. If it were thought desirable to make a change in the marriage laws of this country, it was the duty of the Government to introduce a Bill for that purpose; but he must protest against that being done by a side wind. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) had put down an Amendment that, while not refusing to read this Bill a second time, it was desirable that a Committee should be appointed to inquire into the subject. But he (Mr. Orr Ewing) felt so strongly in regard to the principle of this Bill—that it proposed to alter a system which had worked well hitherto, and which the people did not desire to see changed—that he felt bound to oppose the second reading. He desired to see the marriage service in Scotland remain as it had hitherto been, a religious service, and that the ministers of all denominations should take a deep interest in the union of the members of their respective flocks in marriage. He did not desire to see that which he looked upon as a holy service secularized by the simple registration of the intentions of the people in a registry office. For these reasons, he begged to move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

SIR WILLIAM EDMONSTONE seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day three months.”—(Mr. Orr Ewing.)

MR. BAXTER said, there could be no reason for referring the law respecting the proclamation of banns of marriage to a Select Committee or any other tribunal. The law was perfectly well known, and the question was an extremely simple and plain one. His hon. Friend, the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) in a very interesting address had entirely exhausted the subject, both as regarded its history and the present position of the law. He therefore had not the slightest intention of troubling the House with a long speech upon that occasion; but he must say that he had long thought that the law with respect to the proclamation of banns in Scotland was in a very unsatisfactory state. Indeed, he thought it was some reflection on Scotch Members that not one amongst them had taken up the question long ago. The hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr Ewing) said the proclamation of banns in churches was an ancient and time-honoured institution. Well, probably when it was instituted it was not only the best, but the only mode of securing publicity. But his hon. Friend altogether passed over the fact that circumstances had entirely changed in Scotland. So far from considering that the proclamation was of any use, his experience of it was that it was something very like a farce. The practice was established at a time when there were no registries and no newspapers, and when the whole population of Scotland attended the national Church. The hon. Member knew as well as he did that the population of Scotland no longer attended the national Church. He would probably not admit it, but he (Mr. Baxter) maintained that the Dissenters were in the majority, and therefore circumstances had completely changed. But, moreover, he entirely agreed with the hon. Member for Glasgow, that the great majority who did attend the Established Church did not hear these proclamations. The hon. Member for Dumbartonshire said that it was not so; but the General Assembly had admitted it, because they had passed a series of resolutions, one of which was that the proclamation should in future be made after the clergyman had taken his place in the pulpit.

MR. ORR EWING: That was only because the practice was not followed out in all churches.

MR. BAXTER: It was because it had not been the practice in Scotland that the General Assembly had issued an instruction to put matters in a more satisfactory position; but he joined issue with the hon. Member altogether, and would go further than his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow in this matter. To his mind, these proclamations were very much out of place—and he had often thought they rather savoured of an offence against good manners. They often saw a man get up immediately before the solemn worship of God commenced, and bawl out in stentorian tones the banns of marriage between certain parties. These announcements were possibly necessary in barbarous times, when there was no other mode of obtaining publicity, and that was the only possible thing that could be said in their defence; but to his mind the whole system, now that they had other means of obtaining publicity, was very much like a farce. The hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr Ewing) let the cat out of the bag when, after objecting to some of the provisions of the Bill, he said the reason why he opposed it was that he believed it to be a covert attack upon the privilege of the Church of Scotland. Now, he (Mr. Baxter) was not going to say a word against the Church of Scotland, which had a grand and noble history, and which he admitted had still some claims upon the sympathies of the Scotch people—and more especially as it seemed probable now that that party in the Church to which the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire probably did not belong—powerful in talent, but probably not very influential as yet in numbers—might gain the upper hand. He meant that party in the Church which did not believe in strict Confessions and exclusive Creeds, but which was setting a noble example in favour of liberality of sentiment and Catholicity of spirit. He (Mr. Baxter) looked forward to that party gaining the upper hand in the General Assembly. Be that as it might, he totally objected to the General Assembly of the Established Church, or of any other Church, having it in its power to fix fees, or to amend or alter the law of Scotland in any respect with regard to the law of marriage. It was entirely a civil affair. It was very proper that all the ecclesiastical denominations should have their own rules and arrangements with regard to marriage; but the publication of the intention was an affair which concerned not the religious persuasions only, but the whole body of the people, and it was the duty of the Legislature to secure to the whole body of the people means of becoming aware of that intention. And he knew no better means than was proposed in the Bill of his hon. Friend. The Bill had received the sanction of the General Assembly of the Free Church; and, surely, the registrar of the district was the proper party to receive the notice and grant the certificate in the case of marriage. It had been proposed frequently that that privilege, which was at present monopolized by the Established Church of Scotland, should be given to the Dissenters; and he was rather sorry to hear the hon. Member for Glasgow say that in the event of that privilege being conceded, he thought that some of the Dissenting denominations in Scotland might well avail themselves of it. [Dr. CAMERON explained that he spoke of purely voluntary action.] He (Mr. Baxter) believed that Dissenting Bodies did not want the extension of this privilege—what they asked for was the Bill of his hon. Friend. He thought that to extend this privilege, either by law or voluntarily, would be a sort of aggravation of the evil. As to the Bill which the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire said was a revolutionary measure—if every simple Bill of that sort was to be considered a revolutionary measure, the term would be greatly misapplied. He thought it was an extremely well-drawn Bill, and that it afforded the best remedy for the grievance which was on all sides admitted.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON: Sir, I had intended moving that this subject should be referred to a Select Committee, but as I have not, as I expected, been called upon from the Chair, I have missed my opportunity of moving that Amendment at present. I shall therefore content myself with stating my objections to the Bill. I find some difficulty in dealing with the question brought before us by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), in consequence of the vagueness of the 4th clause. The House is asked to repeal all laws, statutes, and usages, so far as they require proclamation of banns of marriage between persons intending to contract marriage; but the hon. Member has not said in the Bill what those laws are—what Acts or parts of Acts he refers to. As far as my limited experience of this House goes, it is the invariable practice, when a Bill for repealing Acts is brought before the House, that those Acts should be specified. We are now called upon to repeal—we know not what—the laws relating to marriage and banns of marriage in Scotland. When we consider what some of those Acts contain, we should be cautious how we repeal them without knowing exactly what we are about. Now, there is one Act to which all Scotchmen attach importance—namely, the Act of Union, which only obtained the consent of the Scotch Nation upon certain conditions. In that Act will be found the words—

“That the Presbyterian form of Church government, so ratified and established, shall continue without any alterations.” &c.

Without the Acts which it is proposed to repeal being specified, I think it would be a very imprudent step on the part of this House to say that they should be repealed; and on that ground alone I think I shall be justified, if the opportunity is afforded me, of moving that this question should be referred to a Select Committee. I should like to correct an error into which the hon. Member for Glasgow fell when he informed the House that Episcopalian ministers could only celebrate a marriage in an Episcopalian church after the banns had been published in the parish church of the Establishment. He will find that the Act 10 Anne, c. 7, s. 6, runs as follows:—

“And provided likewise that no Episcopalian minister residing in Scotland may presume to marry any person but those whose banns have been published three successive Lord's Days in the Episcopal congregations which the two parties frequent, and in the church to which they belong. Parishioners by virtue of their residing for,” &c.

Then it goes on to recite—

“And the ministers of the parish church are hereby obliged to publish the said banns, and in the case of neglect or refusal, it shall be sufficient to publish the said banns in any Episcopal congregation alone, any law, statute, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding.”

That shows that so far back as 1711, Episcopalians could be married by banns published in their own churches only. The House will bear in mind that in 1711 the Episcopalians were the only Dissenting Body in Scotland. At the present time they only amount to something like 60,000 out of a population of 3,500,000, and in those days they must have been, I imagine, very much fewer; and it only shows what Parliament did 150 years ago in regard to giving facilities for Dissenters publishing banns of marriage. Now, the Preamble of this Bill states that it is brought before the House in order to make better provision for giving publicity to the intentions of persons about to marry; and unless the hon. Member for Glasgow and those who support him can show that greater publicity will be obtained, I say that they have not proved to the House that the Bill ought to be read a second time. The hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr Ewing) has anticipated me in a great deal of what I was going to say, and I will not repeat his arguments to the House. Anyone who knows my countrymen will know that they do not waste their time going about to registry offices to find out who is going to be married:—if they know a marriage is going to take place they do not require to come to the registrar's office to get the information; and if they do not know it, they will not waste time in going to the registry. Therefore, I consider that the proposed mode of publishing the banns will not give the publicity which the hon. Member seeks. I admit a great deal of what the hon. Member for Glasgow stated, as to the objectionable nature of the present system. The high charges in many cases have been most improper. The publishing of the banns thrice on one Sunday is also in my opinion most improper. I wish to remind the House, however, that this proposed step is an important one which affects not Scotland only, but the other two Kingdoms. I hope the House will be cautious before such a step is taken, for we are asked to alter in this hurried way a system which has existed for 300 years. I should like to see this question further inquired into before we legislate upon it, for many reasons—one of which is the recent decision in the House of Lords. I should like myself to see the practice of publishing the banns of marriage extended to all religious bodies, and made as valid in their places of worship as in the Established Church; and I should like to see the certificate of any of their ministers as valid as that of the ministers of the Establishment; but I think further inquiry is necessary. The Bill does not provide for one defect which the hon. Member for Glasgow stated was in the existing law—namely, the absence of registration of marriage. The Bill provides for the registration of the publication of banns, but does not, as far as I can see, make provision for the registration of the marriage when it takes place.

DR. CAMERON: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to explain, I would say my position is that the registration of marriages after they take place is at present amply provided for by the existing Act.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON: Then there is no alteration in the law—the Bill does not provide the remedy which I understood the hon. Gentleman to say was required. It repeals the old law. Perhaps I may have an opportunity of moving the Amendment I have on the Paper on a future stage; but, in the meantime I have only spoken to that of the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he thought the alteration proposed by this Bill was one which could not be said to affect in any serious way the Church of Scotland. The Church would flourish and be as strong after the Bill passed as before; and those hon. Gentlemen who had spoken against the Bill had refuted their own arguments by exposing the defects of the existing law and their willingness to accept changes of equal importance to those proposed by the Bill. The hon. Mover of the Amendment (Mr. Orr Ewing) admitted that the present state of the law afforded no security for that proper publication of the intention of the marriage which the public had a right to expect. This question was not merely one of expediency; it was a question of urgency; for while Parliament was deliberating, the General Assembly was acting—it had already proposed a resolution on this subject; and the question they had to consider was whether this was not an Imperial question, which Parliament should take cognizance of, and which they could deal with in a far more effective manner than the General Assembly. He trusted there would be no obstacle interposed which would prevent this House taking the question up and dealing with it effectively. While saying that much, he honestly confessed that although there was great inconvenience in the present state of the law in populous districts, where the different denominations divided the population, the law afforded a very easy and simple mode of giving publicity to marriage in thinly populated districts. He rose for the purpose of suggesting that the second reading should be assented to, and that the Bill should be put into shape in a Select Committee. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Orr Ewing) was apparently unnecessarily alarmed at the repeal of existing usages proposed in the Bill. It would not repeal any usage the Church of Scotland chose to insist upon among its own churches—it would only repeal those statutory enactments which established certain preliminaries as a condition of legal marriage. It did not interfere with any privilege which the Church of Scotland could justly claim; but he did think that there was here a fair opportunity of bringing the law more in accordance with that of England, under which banns were proclaimed in churches, but power was given to Nonconformists or others to proceed by another process through the registrar—that being an equally legal mode of giving publicity to the

they had got rid of the fee, which was productive of discontent and immorality. Above all, he objected to the Bill on the ground that it was confessedly piecemeal legislation, and that it only touched a fringe of perhaps the greatest question upon which a statesman could have power to legislate.

MR. RAMSAY supported the Bill. In illustration of the want of publicity in the present system of proclamation of marriages, he said that on occasions when there was no worship in a parish church, or before a single member of the congregation had arrived, the banns were often proclaimed by a precentor or other officer going to the door of the church and reading them aloud. The question at issue was really whether Parliament should leave it to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland to determine what regulation should be made to secure publicity of marriage, or whether Parliament should take upon itself to determine what these laws should be. The objection that the General Assembly had already reduced the fees was no reason why this Bill should not be passed, and was far from satisfactory to him. To Dissenters it was an aggravation of the offence of the Assembly for them to say that they were to take upon themselves to administer or regulate the law of marriage in Scotland. It had been said that Dissenters did not wish for the Bill. This was contrary to the fact, they might well take for granted that the United Presbyterian Church and the Free Church, knew their own minds when they had passed their resolutions in its favour.

MR. MAITLAND was bound to say that, having read very carefully the provisions of the Bill, he was convinced that it would not do anything to increase the publicity that now existed for proclamation of marriages. On the contrary, he felt it almost impossible for any man who had considered the matter fairly, and apart from the religious question, not to believe that it was much more likely that people in a neighbourhood would hear who were going to be married, if that intention was proclaimed (it might be only once in a few cases, and he thought it ought always to be thrice) in church, than if the intention were announced in writing in a document on the door of the registrar's house or office, which many of the people, no doubt, most affected by this Bill could not read. Even if it did, however, secure the publicity at which it professed to aim, there were many persons who by no means entirely approved of publicity. For instance, where a man and a woman had been for some time without notoriety living in a state of concubinage, and wished to legalize their union, they would have a very strong objection to have that fact made known to the world, as it must be were there to be a general system of publicity. He had no interest whatever in the jealousies of the various Churches. The Established Church might be very far wrong in this matter. Undoubtedly, it was a great mistake that the fees were so high, and he hoped that would be remedied. There might be difficulties also in parties being required to reside so long a time in the place where they were to be married, but whatever need there was for reform in this matter, he did not think the proposals in this Bill would do the thing it professed to do; and on that ground he felt unable to support it.

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME said, it seemed to him curious that the most convincing speech in favour of the Bill had been made on this side of the House by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Ayrshire who intended to vote against it, and the most convincing speech against had been delivered by the hon. Member who had just sat down, who intended to vote in its favour. He entirely agreed with the last speaker in believing that publicity was of greater importance, and generally agreed with him in all he said against the proposal. He did not intend to follow him through his speech; his object in rising was to reply to a remark made by a previous speaker, who said there was no alternative but either to accept this Bill or to have no reform at all, and that the question really was whether the whole matter should be left to the General Assembly, or whether Parliament should undertake it on the lines of this Bill. He (Sir William Cuninghame) considered there was another alternative, which was to reject this Bill and hope for a less objectionable proposal at some future day, which step he ventured to urge the House to take as he did not consider the plan of reform proposed in the Bill was such as ought to be accepted by the House. He entirely agreed to England as well as Scotland; but they said that publication created great disquietude to people who were apprehensive of temporary annoyance. The Report was suggestive on this head. It said—

“As we have been informed, some who have been living in concubinage, and who otherwise might have been disposed to marry, have abstained from doing so in consequence of the notoriety attending the publication of the banns.”

And the Commissioners added—

“It seems universally agreed that no really valuable publicity is attained by the banns. They afford no safeguard against improvidence, illegality, and fraud, and they are often productive of greatly inconvenient and unseemly interruption to Divine service.”

That last remark, of course, applied more to England than Scotland. In England the banns were at any rate duly proclaimed by the minister from the reading desk, and hence were done decently and in order, and on three successive Sundays; but in Scotland, notwithstanding what was said by the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. Orr Ewing), the banns, as a general rule, were proclaimed by the precentor, in the absence of the minister, and before the congregation assembled for Divine worship, and he maintained, in opposition to the hon. Member, that oftener than not a triple proclamation was made on one Sunday. The pay was much or little in different parishes, according to the will of the session clerk. The hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) said on this point—

“It had come to this—the session clerk in one parish may say, ‘My fee is 10s.’; another will say in another parish, ‘My fee is 15s.’; and a third in a third parish will say, ‘My fee is a pound;’”—

And then his hon. Friend went on to tell the Royal Commission that the people did not dispute the charges, for they could not help themselves. In return for these exorbitant fees, the session clerk did nothing or next to nothing. In the evidence before the Commission it was recommended that a fee of 2s. 6d. should be the general and legitimate charge, and this sum the General Assembly now rather tardily had proposed in substitution for the present exorbitant fees. He had the greatest respect for that venerable body, which had certainly done good work in the past, and he hoped would do good work again; but he thought they had a good right to ask what had been the reason of their delay in this matter? A document had been issued by that body to Members of this House, which he could only characterize as one of the most extraordinary that ever emanated from so distinguished an assembly. This document was entitled “The Banns of Marriage (Scotland) Bill — Statement against.” He ventured to think that nothing more deplorable, nothing more disingenuous, than that statement was it possible to conceive. There was a great deal in it about the great desirability of celebrating marriages in facie ecclesie, and about the right of the Assembly alone to regulate the publication of banns of marriage, or otherwise amend regulations which they had entirely neglected to amend. The document went on to say that the General Assembly had already proposed to amend regulations. That word “already” would lead any inattentive observer to think that they met this question long ago; whereas they never took any action in the matter until it was suggested to them by the Bill introduced by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Dr. Cameron). The Royal Commission sat 10 years ago, and notwithstanding that it was proved by not only Dissenters, but the most eminent men of the Church of Scotland, that the present lax practice was productive not only of hardship and of discontent, but also of positive immorality, it was only now that the General Assembly roused itself from its lethargy, and proposed the abolition of the triple proclamation, and to limit the fee to 2s. 6s.—which, if they had the power to do—and that he very much doubted—they ought to have done long ago. Of the many questions discussed by the General Assembly, he ventured to say that none could be more important to the country than this. Doubtless the General Assembly was very much occupied; but as long as it neglected this and other great kindred questions affecting the welfare of the whole people, their best motto would be Strenua nos exercet inertia. Why, then, should he not vote for the Bill of the hon. Gentleman? Simply, because there should be a locus penitentiae, even to such an august body as this — because although their concessions were tardy, they were valuable; because

It was a great step in that direction. He confessed he was surprised at the assertion of the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr Ewing,) that the publication of banns was confined to a few isolated cases of "swells." In the chief town of the hon. Member's own county he found that 33 out of 90 must be "swells," and in the village of Row the number of cases proclaimed once on Sundays was 29 out of 66. He denied that the Bill would take away any privilege of the Church. Either the publication of the banns was a religious act, or it was not. If it was a religious act, then they were placed in the extraordinary position in Scotland, that Protestant Episcopalians or members of the Roman Catholic Church must needs go through the religious rite of the Presbyterian Body before the rite of their own Church could be performed. Could any Member representing an English constituency vote for such a principle as that? If it was a religious act, why was this privilege to be given to one Church? If it was not a religious act, why were not the Dissenters allowed the privilege? He should have been disposed to support the proposition of the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) if this subject had not already been fully investigated: but there had been investigation. In 1866 there was a Report issued by a Commission appointed to inquire into the Marriage Laws, and he wished to call the attention of the House to that Report, believing that when hon. Members opposite heard the names of the Commissioners, they could not refuse their votes to this Bill. The Commission said—

"Without proposing that the publication of banns should be prohibited or interfered with in the Established Church, when desired by the parties, or any other Churches when required by their particular discipline and usage, we recommend that such publication should not henceforth be required by law as a condition either of lawfulness or regularity of marriage."

This Bill went on the lines of that recommendation. The hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr Ewing) said this was a revolutionary measure. Who were the revolutionists? The first Commissioner was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope)—a name that would command the universal respect of the House. The recommendation was concurred in by Lord Chelmsford, a Conservative ex-Lord Chancellor, and by Lord Hatherley. Was he a revolutionist? Was he one who wished to deprive the Church of her privileges? Would he do anything to secularize marriage? These were the words also of Lord Selborne. Was he one who would do anything to secularize marriage, or do away with anything that made marriage sacred? But, more than that, these were the words of one who must command the highest respect—the present Lord Chancellor. When such men as those had made this recommendation, it would be a very strong measure indeed for hon. Gentlemen opposite to vote against it. The Nonconformists of Scotland not unreasonably complained that the existing regulations were vexatious as well as useless. Yet the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire, and Conservative noblemen in the country, called this Bill revolutionary, and wished to preserve the existing law! In his own part of the country, where a river divided the town, parties marrying on the one side were made to pay a fine of £2. To a poor man that was a very hard case. Holding marriage to be a religious act, he believed the law a bad one which imposed a fine on persons who wished to be married religiously; and he supported this Bill because it would enable people to be married by sacred rite and in proper order.

MR. DALRYMPLE felt certain that if a division were taken on the second reading of the Bill there would be a good deal of cross voting. The strongest arguments against the Bill had come from the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), and yet he intended to vote for the Bill. The strongest speech in favour of the Bill had been made by his hon. and gallant Friend behind him (Colonel Alexander), and he did not intend to vote for the second reading. He (Mr. Dalrymple) felt no doubt about the course he should take. He disliked the Bill; and while admitting that there was a great deal of truth in the statements of the hon. Member who moved the second reading, he did not think the machinery he proposed was of a kind the House ought to sanction. The hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. Noel) quoted high authorities in favour of some changes in the direction of the Bill; but did he mean to assert that the ex-Chancellors and others whom he had quoted had recommended the particular proposals of this Bill? He believed that there was sufficient publicity obtained for marriages under the present system; but he was at the same time of opinion that the present discussion would be of some use in drawing attention to irregularities in the proclamation of banns, and to the unevenness in the imposition of fees. The Bill was similar in one respect to the legislation said to have been characteristic of the measures of the late Liberal Government—it bristled with pains and penalties. In more than one clause were penalties of £50 awaiting persons about to marry. He clearly objected to placing the duty proposed in the hands of the Registrar. The proclamation at present was sufficient for the purpose, and he very much doubted whether the proclamation through a Registrar's office would be as effectual. Statements had been made to the effect that because there were many different religious bodies now in Scotland, there was not the same publicity as formerly in proclamation of banns in the parish Church. Would anyone really assert that, at all events, sufficient publicity was obtained, and that was all that could be expected. He was unable to see that there was anything "revolutionary" in the Bill; it would not do to use that word so lightly—they might need it for other and more serious matters—he himself was simply opposed to the machinery of the Bill, and he should therefore vote against the second reading.

MR. M'LAREN rose chiefly to make a suggestion—that the Government should allow the Bill to be read a second time, not as approving it, but for the purpose of its being sent to a Select Committee. He had no doubt that any Committee that might be appointed would come to an agreement. If the Lord Advocate did not take up the Bill as a matter of principle he advised him to take it up out of sympathy with his own friends, who had made such strong speeches condemnatory of the present system. If there had been any difference in the condemnation between the two sides of the House, it had been stronger on the Conservative than on the Liberal side of the House.

MR. M'LAGAN said, he did not approve of the details of the Bill, but he thought the time had come when a change was necessary. When the law was passed which insisted that there should be a proclamation of banns in connection with the Church of Scotland, the greater number of the people of Scotland belonged to that Church. That time had passed: now at least one-half of the people of Scotland belonged to Dissenting Churches, and it was therefore absurd to talk of greater publicity being obtained by the proclamation. But the time had come when there should be a change, and if the Bill should be read a second time, he should prefer a scheme like that which had been recommended by the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr Ewing). He thought such a scheme would be more in accordance with the religious feelings of the people of Scotland than the scheme in the present Bill. He hoped the Lord Advocate would allow the Bill to be read a second time, for to refer it to a Select Committee would be simply to shelve it.

THE LORD ADVOCATE: The question involved in this Bill is one that deals with a matter of very great delicacy. It relates to the law of marriage in Scotland, which differs from that in England especially in this respect, that it undoubtedly affords facilities for irregular marriages. Although I believe there is a general concurrence amongst the people of Scotland in preferring their marriage law to that of England, yet, at the same time, looking at the substantial difference which exists between the law of the three countries—for there is a difference in the law of Ireland and England as well as in the law of Scotland—it becomes a very delicate matter indeed to interfere in anything that enters into the marriage ceremony of any of the countries. Further, it is the interest of Scotchmen not to secularize more than there may be necessity for the marriage ceremony in Scotland. At present, both in England and Ireland, as well as in Scotland, the law provides for proclamation of banns in each country. No doubt it is not essential in England and Ireland that the proclamation should be in the parish church, but it is a matter of some difficulty to arrive at a correct conclusion as to the precise provisions which are there in force as to the mode of proclaiming the intention of marriage, and how far it is afterwards to be completed by a religious ceremony. Assuming, however, that it is the law in England and Ireland—at all events, it was in Ireland before the Irish Church was disestablished—that there should be a proclamation of banns in a church or building licensed for that purpose, is it not important that the House should do nothing by this Bill to shake the rules which prevail in England and Ireland with reference to the proclamation of banns? Yet it will be observed that the effect of the machinery proposed to be established by the present Bill is to set up a new mode of proclamation which does not exist in either of the two other countries. I caution the House against hastily interfering with the Marriage Laws. Although they have been the subject of a Report of the Marriage Commission in 1866, that Report has been laid aside at present—it has been laid aside by successive Governments, who have not yet thought proper to take up the question. It is a very difficult question indeed—one of the most difficult which can engage the attention of Government. I have reason to know that it was under the consideration of the present Lord Chancellor to take up the question of the Marriage Laws; but he found that the amount of business required to be transacted in the course of this Session was so great that he was afraid to bring forward any measure. But I think that it is not at all improbable that before long there will be some measure introduced by the Government which will comprehend the whole law connected with marriage, and in particular deal with this matter of proclamation of banns. I therefore think it is of great importance that we should not by any Resolution of this House adopt a principle which may produce a totally different system in Scotland from that which exists at present in England and Ireland, or which might fetter the Legislature hereafter, by adopting the machinery set forth in this Bill. It is said that this question of the notice of marriage is really of a civil character. Reference has been made to the case in the House of Lords; but in that case it was regarded as a Church regulation, and was not looked upon merely as a civil question. What is proposed by this Bill is to lay down a contrary rule on the question. I do not say that it is not in the power of the State to control the Church in this particular, for I can conceive that if there is any abuse, the State is quite right to control the Church. But the first point to consider is this—has there been such a practice permitted as would justify the House in coming to a conclusion that the mode proposed by the hon. Member for Glasgow should be supported in preference to that which exists at present? There is no doubt that occasionally, in particular churches, there may not be that attention called to the proclamation of banns which there ought to be; but, as a general rule, I venture to think there is no part in the Church proceedings which is more attended to than that which gives notice of a most important event connected with the personal and social prospects of young men and young women. Without venturing to say that you cannot have a better mode than the present of securing publicity, I have no doubt that the present is much better than the plan of the hon. Member for Glasgow. The hon. Member took occasion to refer to a Report by the Free Church to the Royal Commission, and he said that the system which he proposes is that which was recommended by the Free Church. At page 43 of the Appendix to the Report of the Commission will be found the statement on behalf of the Free Church. They say “the present system is now admitted to be inefficient as a means of proclamation.” Secondly, “it is much complained of in consequence of the fees exigible by the session clerks,” and “the exaction of these fees prevents many poor persons from going through the ceremony of marriage before a minister.” That is a matter which is being remedied by a resolution of the Church—the modification of fees being very considerable indeed, the fee mentioned in the Resolution of the General Assembly being “not exceeding half-a-crown,” which is below the amount charged in England. Lastly, in the recommendations of the Free Church there is no reference made to a notice being given in the registrar’s office. On the contrary, what is suggested is that “it should be published on the doors of the parish church or otherwise.” I cannot say that that would secure adequate publicity, as there are already a great many notices required to be posted on the church doors—such as Militia notices, Income Tax notices, and so on; and if the names of those intending to marry were simply stuck upon a board at the church door, many persons would fail to see them unless they went for the special purpose. Therefore, I submit that neither the plan suggested by the Free Church nor the plan proposed by the hon. Member would provide sufficient publicity. But I return to the consideration which I venture to think is sufficient to determine the action of the House at the present moment, why should there be laid down for Scotland a new rule entirely different from that which prevails in England and Ireland? That would fetter you when you came to deal with the question of proclamation of banns in other parts of the Kingdom. I have expressed the opinion that the Bill does not provide sufficient machinery for notice being given to all parties, and that the present system is preferable to that which is proposed by the hon. Member for Glasgow. But without going into detail, I submit that on the general ground to which I have referred the Bill ought not to pass; and indeed the hon. Member himself did not think that there was any chance for the Bill this Session. There will be no loss, in dealing with the question, by postponing this Bill until we have an opportunity of considering the whole law of marriage, at least in so far as connected with the proclamation of banns in the three countries, as well as in Scotland. I do not dispute that there may be some room for improvement; but then I think in a matter of so delicate a character as that connected with the law of marriage, we ought not to rush into a scheme which evidently has not commended itself to Members on either side of the House.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL thought the Government must feel that some change was absolutely necessary, and he rose to express his disappointment at the declaration of the Lord Advocate, which he must think somewhat feeble. He told them that some day or other the whole law of marriage would be considered. They did not want a radical revolution of the marriage laws in Scotland; and if they did, they would not be likely to get it for a long time, for was it not the case that the House was glutted with business of all kinds? Were they to be satisfied in the hope that a real practical grievance of that kind would be remedied merely by the declaration that the whole law of marriage was likely to be considered? That statement was equivalent to a denial of justice in the matter. It might be that the machinery proposed by the Bill was not the best; but in justice both to the Dissenters of Scotland and to those who wished to preserve the Established Church, it would be just and prudent for the Government to propose a proper remedy for that particular matter. He knew nothing so likely to be injurious to the Church of Scotland or to the whole question of Establishment than the keeping up of an irritating and unjust privilege of this kind. On that account, although he would not pledge himself to the machinery of the Bill, he should vote for the second reading.

DR. CAMERON, in reply, pointed out that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate was in error in supposing that the system proposed by the Bill was something entirely different from what existed in England or Ireland. It was a system perfectly well known in England—where, as his Lordship would see if he referred to Page 8 of the Marriage Laws Commissioners' Report, in all marriages between Dissenters notice was required to be given to the district registrar and a licence obtained from him. In fact, what the Bill proposed was really that the law of Scotland should be assimilated to the law of England on this point. In England the proclamation of banns was made by the officer entrusted with the registration of the subsequent marriage. In England all marriages celebrated in an Established church were registered in a church register of marriages. In Scotland there were no such registers, and the duty of registering marriages in all cases devolved upon the district registrars. In England whenever it did so, the duty of receiving notices of intention to marry and of issuing licences devolved upon these officials also. This was exactly what the Bill before the House proposed. It had been said that the proposal in the Bill was not that which was proposed in the Report of the Commissioners; but without wearying the House with quotations, he had no hesitation in saying that the Report of the Commissioners completely embraced the proposals of the Bill. He was not wedded to the mere machinery of his Bill. He did not care whether the notice was put upon the registrar's door or any other accessible place. What he sought was to get rid of a disability which no one justified, and of which everyone complained. It was useless to argue in favour of the present system, for it was doomed. If Parliament did not deal with it another body would. An hon. Member had objected that the Bill only touched the fringe of the subject; but this was the only part of the marriage question which was certain to be legislated upon by others if Parliament neglected it. The rest of the Marriage Law could be allowed to stand over; but as regarded this part, unless Parliament interfered the result of the action of the General Assembly would be to impose a new law upon members not only of their own Church, but upon the members of every Dissenting Body in the country. The fact that an ecclesiastical Body should thus be permitted to frame a law for persons outside its own communion—to lay down rules, any infraction of which laid the offender open to heavy penalties—at this period of the 19th century was such an obvious anachronism and absurdity that it constituted the strongest argument which could be brought forward in favour of the Bill. His hon. Colleague (Mr. Anderson) had said in the course of the debate that there was no necessity for any publicity being given to the intention of marriage. If he would turn to the evidence given before the Marriage Laws Commissioners by the late Roman Catholic Bishop of his own constituency he would see that he was in error; for Bishop Murdoch stated that although during an experience of over 40 years he had never known any instance of the discovery of an impediment to an intended marriage by the calling of banns as at present practised in the Established Church, discoveries had again and again resulted from the simultaneous publication in Roman Catholic churches and chapels, thus at once showing the need for publicity and the uselessness of the present system in securing it. As to the proposal to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, he desired nothing better. All he wished the House to do was to affirm the principle of the Bill; and thinking it was not too much to ask the House to pronounce an opinion on the subject, he must press his Motion to a division.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND)
ACT AMENDMENT BILL—[BILL 40.]
(Mr. Crawford, Mr. Butt, Mr. Richard Smyth, Mr. Thomas Dickson, Mr. Macartney.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SHARMAN CRAWFORD, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it was similar to that which he brought forward last year; and though on that occasion it was described as extravagant and wild, its principle was simply that of Ulster tenant right as it existed before the passing of the Irish Land Bill in 1870. That principle had been well defined by the late Mr. Conolly when he said, in supporting his father's Bill in 1852, that the custom of tenant right in Ulster implied a power on the part of the tenant, whether on lease or at will, to sell the goodwill of the premises which he occupied to an incoming tenant at the highest price he could obtain in the market, and that he should not be disturbed in his occupation so long as he paid his rent. That was the Ulster tenant right. That was what the late Mr. Sharman Crawford contended for. Moreover, since the passing of the Irish Land Bill many practical grievances and anomalies had arisen in the system, which required a remedy. For instance, on properties where tenant right had existed for generations many complications and misunderstandings arose, and changes had taken place. Farmers having tenant right were not now allowed to sell their right without the consent of the landlord. Last year a farmer died; his widow wished to dispose of the tenant right of the farm, and was offered for it—by a respectable and solvent tenant £500. The office would not accept the offered purchaser as tenant, and offered to take the farm and gave her £170 for it—£330 less than she could have got from a solvent tenant. In another case, a tenant's wife died, leaving a family of sons and daughters. He made up his mind to leave his farm; a wealthy and respectable farmer offered £200 for the tenant-right. The office refused to permit the sale. Circumstances, however, compelled the tenant to leave his farm, and he left without receiving one penny of the £200. He and his young family had to start life anew penniless. It was unjust to the out-going tenant that he could not sell his right without the consent of the landlord. He hoped the House would consider the hardship which this restriction imposed on the tenant, and allow the Bill to be read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Sharman Crawford.)

MR. GIBSON opposed the Bill, and said the hon. Member had prudently abstained from stating the provisions of his Bill, which, in fact, proposed almost a revolution in the law of the land; and he did not think one or two hard cases, such as those the hon. Gentleman had cited, were sufficient to justify a revolution. The Bill pretended to amend the Land Act of 1870, but it was not an amendment Bill: it was a Bill not to settle, but to unsettle—a Bill not to allay, but to create excitement. The fact of the Bill having been brought forward at so late a period of the Session did not look as if the hon. Member intended it to pass—it was obvious that it was brought in to satisfy the tenant-farmers of Ulster that something was about to be done for them. Ulster was prosperous and contented. The tenant right they were now discussing grew up and was fostered under generous landlords, but until the Act of 1870 it had no legal sanction whatever. According to the present law in Ireland the occupier could get compensation for disturbance and for improvements, and any attempt to change such a satisfactory state of things required much grave consideration. The Ulster tenants were in a better position than those of any other parts of Ireland; for in other parts of Ireland the tenants could only appeal to the Land Act, but in Ulster the tenants had the benefit of the Land Act, plus the Ulster customs; but, in attempting to define these customs, the hon. Member was proposing to do that which the right hon. Member for Greenwich was obliged to admit was impracticable, because the customs varied so much in different places and on different estates. It was, therefore, futile to endeavour to compress a description of these customs into seven or eight lines of an Act of Parliament. The only point of doubt which it was desirable to clear up—the extent to which custom should operate in the case of a lease—this Bill would not settle; indeed, it might have been settled satisfactorily by a Bill which had been lately before the House, but for the opposition of the hon. Member himself and of the secretaries of the Tenant Right Leagues, whose occupations and salaries it would have put an end to. The hon. Member (Mr. S. Crawford) had kept back all the main provisions of his measure, putting forward two cases of alleged grievances, which, if they existed, this Bill would neither have prevented nor remedied; while he kept out of sight the enactments he proposed, which were so unfairly adverse to landlords—so manifestly unfair that he could not suppose the hon. Member had the slightest wish or intention of carrying them. The hon. and learned Member concluded by moving an Amendment that the Bill be read the second time this day three months.

MR. CHAPLIN rose to second the Amendment, and was addressing the House, when—

It being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

Then the House having gone through the other Business on the Paper—

METROPOLIS GAS (SURREY SIDE) BILL.

On Motion of Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY, Bill to amend the Laws regulating the supply of Gas by the Phoenix Gaslight and Coke Company, the London Gaslight Company, and the Surrey Consumers' Gas Company; and to grant further powers to these Companies, ordered to be brought in by Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY and Mr. EDWARD STANHOPE.

PRIVATE BILLS—GAS LIGHT AND

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN complained that there was not sufficient Notice of the second reading of Private Bills. It was only by accident that he found this Bill in the list of those set down for second reading on Monday last. It stood on the Paper as practically an unopposed Bill, but it was one which deserved their Lordships serious attention. The Companies to be amalgamated under the Bill as the Gas Light and Coke Company had attained very large dimensions; in the course of a few years it had contrived to absorb almost all its neighbours, and would now extend its operations over three-fourths of the metropolis. Its capital was at present very considerably over £8,000,000 sterling; and in the Bill power was taken to increase that capital by £2,000,000—one-half in share capital and one-half in the form of loan or mortgage. The standard rate of dividend under this Bill was fixed at 10 per cent. That was provided by Clause 10. By Clause 19 it was provided that the initial standard price of the gas should be 3s. 9d. per 1,000 cubic feet. Regard being had to the price charged for the gas, the Company would be enabled to pay a dividend beyond the standard of 10 per cent; for it had been shown by competent authority that 3s. 9d. per 1,000 cubic feet would give a dividend of 10 per cent; and it might be that by lowering the price below the initial standard of 3s. 9d. there would be a consumption which would enable the Company to pay much more than 10 per cent—perhaps 15 or even 20. Therefore, the effect of raising so much of the additional capital by the issue of new shares instead of by loan would be to raise the amount on which compensation must be paid by any public body which at a future time and in the interest of the public might purchase up the Gas and Water Companies. It was true there was a provision in the Bill that the new shares must be put up to public auction, and that would afford some protection to the public, but it was not a sufficient safeguard. If, as was very possible, the new shares should be sold at a premium, he could not see why the amount required by the Company should not be raised by loan. The Board of Trade addressed a letter to Mr. Forster, the Chairman of the Committee that was inquiring into this subject, recommending that the borrowed capital should not exceed one-third of the share capital of a Company. It was not for their Lordships to say how the Company should raise additional capital, but he thought that what they now did would be used as a precedent for the future; but why should they in this Bill guarantee a fixed dividend? The Board of Trade pointed out that it was as much to the interest of Companies to increase their capital as it was the interest of the public that they should not increase it. But if a dividend was to be guaranteed, why should it be at so high an initial rate? It might be said that 3s. 9d. was the sum sanctioned by Mr. Forster's Committee; but he maintained that their Lordships' House was in no way precluded from expressing an opinion on the point, and that as

Bills such as this formed precedents it would be advisable for the House to do so. On looking through the Gas Bills from various parts of the country which had come before their Lordships' House recently, he observed that where the supply of gas was in the hands of private Companies the tendency was to raise additional capital by the issue of shares; but when it was in the hands of public corporations the tendency was to raise additional capital by way of loan. The Board of Trade recommended that where additional capital was required it should be raised by loan and not by the issue of new shares; and he (the Earl of Camperdown) was of opinion that articles of the first necessity, like gas and water, should be supplied in as pure a form and as cheaply as possible, and that this end could best be attained by their being supplied by bodies that had no interest in making a profit out of them. In any case they had a right to demand that these articles should not be supplied at a rate of profit which appeared to be extravagant. Having brought the matter before the House, he would suggest that a Committee of their Lordships' House ought to draw up resolutions expressing the views of the House as to the way additional capital should be raised by Gas and Water Companies and as to minimum or maximum rates of dividend.

LORD REDESDALE said, he did not concur with the noble Earl in the opinion that there was not sufficient Notice of the second reading of Private Bills, but he did concur with him in most of the observations he had made on the Bill now before their Lordships. When it first came before him he made a note on the clause providing for the raising of further capital, that the Company should not be allowed to raise money otherwise than by borrowing. If raised by shares a much larger sum might have to be paid in the way of dividends—which by the Bill were allowed to exceed 10 per cent—than would be paid upon it if it were borrowed:—money could be obtained by this company readily at 4 or 4½ per cent. He thought the arrangement by which the metropolitan Companies were allowed to have a guaranteed dividend very objectionable. That, however, could not be helped now, because the precedent was laid down years ago; but it was quite open to their Lordships to object to the mode in which it was proposed under the Bill to raise the additional capital of the Company. To limit the issue of further shares for this purpose would in no way damage existing shareholders. On the contrary, it would be much to their advantage that additional shares should not be issued, as they would sooner be able to get the larger dividend, whereby the public were to gain by a reduction in price.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON thought the noble Earl (the Earl of Camperdown) had done good service in calling attention to this question; but, at the same time, he hoped he would not interpose any further obstacle to the progress of the Bill. The object of the Bill, which had come up to their Lordships as an unopposed Bill, was to enable the Chartered Gas Company to purchase additional land. When the project was brought forward the President of the Board of Trade saw that it was likely to give rise to protracted and expensive litigation. He accordingly invited the Companies concerned—the Imperial Gas Company, the Independent Gas Company, and the Chartered Gas Company—to meet and discuss the question. He also invited the Metropolitan Board of Works and the Corporation of London, as the representatives of the public and the consumers, to join in the deliberations, and the result of the negotiation and discussion was the compromise embodied in the Bill then before their Lordships. He thought, therefore, that it would be unwise, and he might say unjust, to now stop the further progress of the Bill. The passage of this Bill would secure one point of considerable importance. It was very inconvenient and a great disadvantage to consumers that gas should be supplied in one district by several different Companies: the premises of one firm in the West-end of London were at present lighted by three different Companies. Now this Bill would place three-fourths of the metropolis under one Company. Moreover, purity, uniform pressure, and illuminating power were all promoted by the amalgamation of Gas Companies. He could not go the length to which his noble Friend (the Earl of Camperdown) went in the advocacy of raising additional capital by loan rather than by the issue of additional shares. He was chosen acted improperly. The Act of 1869 contained some very severe provisions regulating the conduct of the trustee, under which he was required to account to the officer of the Court for his administration of the assets, and was bound to pay all sums over £50 in the aggregate he received in his capacity as trustee into such bank as the creditors should select within a very short time of his receiving them. Under the Bill it was proposed that the provisional Committee of Inspection should consist of the five creditors resident in England by whom the largest amounts appeared by the debtor's list of creditors to be provable. The objection to that proposal was that the creditors of a bankrupt who had lost largely by his failure were seldom desirous of coming forward, and thus proclaiming that they had incurred bad debts to a considerable amount in the course of their business. Great complaints had arisen that the dividends paid under the Act of 1869 on bankrupts' estates were very small; but the fact was that compositions were much favoured by the existing law. The clause which directed that unclaimed or undistributed dividends should vest in the Crown at the expiration of five years, would afford a very efficient check upon those empowered to administer bankrupt estates. He was, on the whole, anxious that the measure should pass, believing that it would prove a very useful amendment of the present law; but whilst it seemed a large measure, it was, in truth, with the exception of four or five clauses, a mere re-enactment of the Act of 1869, and he doubted whether his noble and learned Friend would be able to pass it during the present year in that shape.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he would not repeat the observations he had previously made in introducing this measure, and expressed his obligation to the noble and learned Lord (Lord Hatherley) for the criticisms he had made upon the Bill, and the suggestions of amendment that he had offered. He might point out that although the present Bill looked rather formidable in its dimensions, it was in reality mainly a re-enactment of the Act of 1869, with some new clauses and amendments. He admitted that by proposing to repeal the Act of 1869 and to re-enact the greater part of its provisions in the present measure he ran the risk of extending the surface of opposition; but at the same time, having always advocated the principle of repeal and re-enactment, instead of patchwork legislation, he should not like to shrink from carrying out that principle in the present instance. The noble and learned Lord had correctly stated that the object of the Act of 1869 was to transfer the power of initiating proceedings in bankruptcy against himself from the debtor to his creditors; but, unfortunately, that Act allowed the debtor to initiate proceedings in liquidation and composition, and the consequence was that bankruptcy proper as compared with liquidation and composition had become a mere trifle. He had thought it preferable, therefore, to abolish the distinction between those methods of procedure, and to place all proceedings in bankruptcy under proper control, and under a uniform system. It was true that under the Act of 1869 a bankrupt was not entitled to his discharge without the assent of the majority in number and three-fourths in value of his creditors unless he had paid 10s. in the pound; but that provision only applied to bankruptcy proper, and not to liquidation or composition. He quite agreed in the views stated by his noble and learned Friend who had recently addressed the House in reference to the appointment of trustees in bankruptcy, and the period within which estates should be wound up when liquidation had been resorted to.

*Motion agreed to:—*Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

INDIA—SLAVE TRADING OF SUBJECTS OF NATIVE PRINCES IN INDIA. SLAVE TRADE BILL.

OBSERVATIONS. FIRST READING.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in calling attention to the expediency of making provision for the more effectual punishment of the subjects of Native Princes in India who are guilty of the offence of slave trading, and presenting a Bill upon the subject, said: My Lords, the Bill of which I have given Notice is one of considerable importance, and its object may be shortly explained; but I must apologize for not bringing it forward at an earlier period. I postponed doing so, because I hoped the Report of the Royal Commission on the Slave Circular might be in your Lordships' hands before I introduced the Bill, and that I might be certain that in the provisions of the Bill there was nothing that required to be amended in consequence of that Report. The case is this—the slave trade on the coast of Africa had been pointed out by Dr. Livingstone to be in the hands of agents of British Indian subjects. This was not strictly correct. It was in the hands, to some degree, of those who were under British rule; but, speaking more exactly, it was in the hands of the subjects of Native Princes, who are under the protection of the Queen. Until lately it was believed that the laws against the slave trade at Mozambique, Zanzibar, and other places in those seas applied as much against the subjects of Native Princes of India as against those who were under the direct protection of Her Majesty. But in 1874 the case of a Cutchee, the subject of the Rao of Cutch, was brought before the High Court of Bombay. A charge of slave-dealing was preferred against him at the instance of the Consul at Zanzibar; and it appeared by the decision of Mr. Justice Gibbs that the Court had no legal power to try a subject of a Native Prince for offences against the English law; and the result was that he was released. Now, this was an obvious failure of justice. In the case of independent Princes negotiations might have been set on foot, and the subjects of those Princes might have been bound by Treaty between the Sultan of Zanzibar and the other Native Princes. But we have bound the Native Princes in alliance with the Queen not to enter into Treaties with foreign Powers. They have surrendered their foreign relations into our hands, and that remedy, therefore, is not practicable; and it is necessary, as you give them protection and undertake all the duties which fall to the Foreign Office with respect to their subjects, to undertake also the duty of punishing them if they commit crimes against the law. The proposal of the Bill, therefore, is to remedy the defect which was discovered by the judgment of Mr. Justice Gibbs, and to enact that the laws against the slave trade—we propose to limit it to that—shall be enforceable in the High Court of Bombay against the subjects of Princes in alliance with Her Majesty, just in the same way as they are now enforceable against British subjects. Another defect which was brought to light by the judgment I have referred to we also propose to remedy. It turned out that there were no means of taking evidence by commission at the distant places where the offence was committed. If a slave trader is discovered at Zanzibar and sent to Bombay for trial it is almost impossible to send with him the actual witnesses necessary to prove the case. Some may be sent, but all cannot. In the case of British subjects there is a law under which evidence can be taken by commission, and we propose to extend that law by the Bill to the cases with which it deals. Another power we propose to take which, though it is not of very great importance, I think it right to mention. By the existing law all subjects of the Queen committing those offences are tried in the High Court of Bombay, but only Native subjects are tried under the law of England. The result is that the High Court of Bombay has to administer another law in the case of other subjects of the Queen not coming under the denomination of Native Indian subjects. I need not say that there is no difference in substance between the two laws; but there are differences of detail, and inconvenience sometimes arises in the case of persons guilty of the same offence but of different extraction. They are tried under two different laws, and the Court has to administer a law with which it is not familiar. We propose that all subjects of the Queen in custody in India and tried for the offence of slave dealing shall be tried at Bombay under the Indian Criminal Code. That Code is recited in the Bill, and provision is made for its amendment, should amendment be found necessary. These may seem small provisions to attach importance to; but any person who has studied the subject will know that it was necessary to remedy the defects I have pointed out. If Africa were left to herself the slave trade would very rapidly disappear. The very want of civilization, the very savagery which exposes the populations of that Continent to the ravages of the slave dealer—would cure the evil by preventing the appearance of persons of sufficient enterprize and capital and skill to carry on those nefarious operations. The great evil comes from the fact of there being men of a higher stage of civilization, of Arab or Indian extraction, possessed of sufficient knowledge, arms, and organization to enable them to make victims of the helpless populations of Africa. If you reach those men of a superior civilization by the penalties of the law, you will do more to stop the slave trade than you can in any other way; and we who have under our rule, directly or indirectly 250,000,000 of Orientals, furnish no small contingent of the capitalists—if I may call them so—by whom this traffic is carried on. It is essential that the arm of the law should reach the crime they commit. Especially after the judgment which has been pronounced in Bombay there would be no security for the administration of the law; for not only would you be exposed to slave dealing on the part of the subjects of the Native Princes, but it would be impossible to distinguish between those who had been born on their soil and ours, which would practically leave the traffic open to the whole of the Indian population. There is one thing I ought to mention—namely, that the Rao did his best to check his subjects in these nefarious operations, but the Court of Bombay was unable to give effect to his Proclamation on the subject. I believe, my Lords, that if this measure be passed, a great and beneficial advance will be made, and that other Sovereigns and Chiefs will be led to give us power to deal with their subjects, and that we shall come nearer and nearer to the object of deterring from this traffic all those races whose superior civilization now enable them to engage in it. The noble Marquess then presented “a Bill for more effectually punishing offences against the laws relating to the Slave Trade,” and moved that it be now read the first time.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he had no objection to the objects of this Bill; but unless the consent of the various Indian Sovereigns whose subjects it was proposed to punish by the Bill, had been given, the measure would propose to enact that which was contrary to the law of nations and an usurpation. The Bill was apparently intended to operate against the Banyans, who traded principally at Zanzibar, and probably they belonged to a very small number of States, and the consent of their Rulers might easily be obtained; and unless that consent were given this country had no right to inflict penalties on those subjects, and he would feel bound to offer all the opposition to it in his power.

EARL GRANVILLE observed that it would not be convenient at that stage to discuss the provisions of the Bill. From the information the noble Marquess had afforded them he felt convinced that the inclination of the House would be to give the Government all the power they required to carry out the object they had in view.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 1^a; and to be printed. (No. 135.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. RAIKES said, there were certain matters in the measure to which he, as Chairman of Ways and Means, felt bound to call attention. The Bill proposed certain improvements in the City of Edinburgh—and so far he had nothing to say to it; but Clause 10 proposed that after certain lands had been acquired by the Corporation they should be made over to Her Majesty's Commissioners of Public Works for the purpose of being utilized for scientific instruction to the students of the Medical University and others. That was obviously a very excellent object, and one which he would be very sorry in any way to impede; but inasmuch as an arrangement was contemplated which would require some outlay of public money by the Commissioners of Works, the Bill seemed to come within the purview of Standing Order No. 90, which required that in regard to any Bill involving a contract between the Government and some other body, the Chairman of Ways and Means should, three days before the second reading, make a Report of the said contract to the House. He would have been glad to comply with that Standing Order, and to lay the contract on the Table of the House; but, as a matter of fact, that would be a physical impossibility, inasmuch as the contract in question did not yet exist. Had the first part of the Standing Order stood alone it would have been incumbent on him to call for the production of the contract; but it was clear from the second section of the Order that it only referred to contracts already concluded, or at all events contracts in esse, or which it was proposed to conclude immediately. As the Bill referred only to hypothetical contracts to be made at some future time, it might be considered as not coming within the Standing Order; but he had thought it his duty to call attention to it, lest the door should be opened to a general disregard of the Rules. Having cleared his conscience, and it being impossible for him to make any report on the contract, he had nothing further to say. He did not wish it to be supposed that he was opposing a Bill which was, undoubtedly, calculated to confer great benefits on the City of Edinburgh.

MR. M'LAREN said, the House was much indebted to the hon. Chairman of Ways and Means for bringing the subject forward. It appeared that there were large botanical gardens in connection with the Medical School at Edinburgh, and as there were now in the market 30 or 40 acres of land adjoining, this Bill proposed to purchase that land by means of a local rate. The expenditure would probably be £20,000. The Corporation having purchased the land, it was to be handed over to the Board of Works and the Treasury. There had been many pleasant conversations between the Government representatives and the Corporation, and the latter had been persuaded that if the City of Edinburgh would impose the rate and purchase the land, the Government would maintain it in all time to come as part of the existing Botanical Gardens. There were many of the inhabitants of Edinburgh, however, who did not like that kind of mere conversational agreement between the local authorities and the representatives of the Government, and they wished the Standing Order to which the hon. Gentleman had referred had been complied with. If the Government meant to keep up these grounds for the benefit of the inhabitants, it should either be clearly set forth in a Schedule to the Bill what they really did intend, or else some Treasury Minute or a Board of Works contract should be produced on the subject. He appealed to the noble Lord the First Commissioner of Works to inform the House definitely as to the terms of the contract into which the Government proposed to enter with the local authorities. At all events, he trusted the inhabitants of Edinburgh would not lay out a single shilling on the purchase of the land until they had a distinct understanding as to the conditions under which it would be taken over by the Government.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that the Chairman of Ways and Means had been more than justified in making the remarks with which he had opened the discussion. There was, however, no contract yet existing such as was contemplated by Standing Order No. 90, between the City of Edinburgh and the Office of Works. What was proposed was this—that if the Corporation agreed to acquire by a rate certain property on the outskirts of Edinburgh, the Government would then enter into communication with the City of Edinburgh with a view to throwing the land in question into the Botanical Gardens, and keeping it up at the public expense. As there was no contract to lay before the House now, the House might rest perfectly satisfied that it would not hereafter be done without its sanction. If the agreement he had referred to should be made—as he hoped it would be—it would be necessary to confirm it by a Vote of the Whole House. There would then be an ample opportunity for discussion, and the hon. Member for Edinburgh and others would be able to state their views. The hon. Member had challenged him to say what the rules and regulations were which the Office of Works intended to lay down; but it would be premature to make any statement of the kind as to property which had not yet been handed over to the Board. He repeated that before this property could be utilized for Botanical Gardens, a Vote of the House would be taken.

MERCANTILE MARINE—THE “STRATHMORE.”—QUESTION.

ADMIRAL EGERTON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to the Report of inquiry into the circumstances attending the loss of the “Strathmore;” and, whether, with regard to the seventh paragraph of that Report, it is intended to take any official or public notice of the conduct of Mr. D. L. Gifford, master of the American whaler “Young Phoenix,” who is said to have sacrificed his voyage in order to assist the survivors from the wreck?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: The case of the Strathmore has been fully considered, and the Board of Trade have decided to present Captain Gifford with a piece of plate of the value of £21. There was little or no risk, and it is not a case for a medal. The sacrifice of the voyage falls on the owner, unless satisfied by the underwriter. The Board of Trade are endeavouring to ascertain if any compensation should be made.

NAVY—NAVY MEAT.—QUESTION.

MR. PLIMSOLL asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, with reference to the written statement, dated the 2nd day of February 1876, signed Robert Hall, from the Admiralty, Sessional Paper, No. 117, 1876, p. 182, to the effect that “it seems almost unnecessary to remark that no meat is ever sold which is not perfectly fit for food,” he would explain to the House why the loss of public money is incurred which is involved in selling large quantities of meat at prices ranging from 18s. to 30s. per tierce, and even lower sometimes, such meat having cost the country from £7 to £7 10s. and £8 per tierce; and, whether he is willing to give the House an assurance that no more meat shall be so sold whilst fit for food for the Navy, and, when it is no longer “perfectly fit for food,” that it shall be destroyed, seeing that its sale has caused disease in the Mercantile Marine?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, the statement to which the hon. Member referred was not so precise in its terms as it should have been. It should have been—“that no meat was sold for human food which was not perfectly fit for human food.” Meat unfit for human food was occasionally sold to soap boilers and fat boilers for their business. The only assurance he could give was that meat unfit for human food should be declared to be so at the time of sale, and that a record should be kept of the names of the purchasers.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—THE “SKERRYVORE.”—QUESTION.

MR. PLIMSOLL asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to the case of the “Skerryvore,” which is stated to have arrived in New York Harbour on the 18th May last in a sinking state with five feet of water in her hold, and found on being docked and examined to have a large hole bored in her bottom, and to be without any other source of leakage; and, whether he has directed, or is in a position to direct, an investigation into this matter with the view of bringing to justice the perpetrator and instigator of this crime?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: The hon. Member for Derby may have seen reported in The Devonport Independent, with which he is connected, the proceedings against the master of the Skerryvore, on trial, and several times remanded, ever since the 29th of May. The case is delayed for evidence from New York, where the ship lies; but the proceedings have been going on as fast as they can against the master from the earliest moment that they could have been taken.

ARMY—RETIRED OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. PRICE asked the Secretary of State for War, If he can state when the Report of the Royal Commission on Promotion and Retirement in the Army will be laid upon the Table; and, whether he has any objection to consider the expediency of extending to Officers of the regular service the privilege which has been already accorded to Officers of the Militia and Volunteers of retaining their rank and wearing their uniform on retirement after a certain length of service?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I am sorry that I cannot give any information as to the date when the Report of the Commission on Promotion and Retirement will be laid on the Table. The privileges of retaining rank and wearing uniform on retirement after a certain length of service which are enjoyed by retired officers of the Militia and Volunteers were granted probably to render those services more popular. I have no objection to consider the expediency of the extension of these privileges to officers below the rank of field officers of the Regular Army, and, I believe the question will be brought to my notice by His Royal Highness the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief.

POST OFFICE—LETTER-CARRIERS' UNIFORM.—QUESTION.

MR. EARP asked the Postmaster General, If Town Letter Carriers are supplied with new clothing every eight months, consisting of coat, over-cloak, trowsers, and cap; if Rural Post Messengers are supplied only with hat and coat every twelve months; and, whether he will make such additions to the latter supply as will place both branches of the service on the same footing?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, he had no information that would lead him to believe that the clothing supplied to rural letter-carriers as compared with urban letter-carriers was insufficient. It would lead to a great expenditure, which he was not prepared to incur, to put the rural letter-carriers on precisely the same footing as the urban.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—KEYNSHAM BRITISH SCHOOL.—QUESTION.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the Vice President of the Council, If he is able to inform the House as to the legality of the proceedings of the Education Department in refusing a grant to the British School at Keynsham; if he is aware that since the re-opening of this school the names of 110 children have been inserted on the register, of whom 80 had not previously attended the parish school; if his attention has been directed to the fact of the announcement by the vicar that the children of parents attending the British School would be deprived of the benefits of the Parish Clothing Club; and, what precedents there are (if any) for the refusal of a grant to an efficient Elementary School in a district where there is no School Board?

VISCOUNT SANDON: As far as I can ascertain, this is the first instance of a request to the Education Department for an annual grant to a new school in a locality where, in obedience to orders from the Department, the necessary additional accommodation has been supplied by existing public elementary schools. This is, therefore, the first case in which a decision has had to be come to on the subject, though in the analogous cases of localities where there are school boards, we have refused annual grants to Church of England and other schools where, owing to the locality having supplied the additional accommodation which the Department demanded, such new schools were unnecessary. I informed the hon. Gentleman last week, in answer to his Question, that we were advised that we had power to refuse a grant in this case; but that, as he raised a doubt about it, I should be most happy to refer it to the Law Officers of the Crown, and would inform him of the result of that reference. I shall, of course, inform him as soon as I receive the opinion of the Law Officers. Until I have that opinion, I must beg leave to decline to enter further into the question of the legality of the proceedings of the Department.

ARMY—THE RESERVE FORCES—YEOMANRY TRUMPETERS AND BANDS.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT GALWAY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will not re-consider the question of granting allowances to Yeomanry trumpeters; whether it is intended that the cost of such an important part of a Yeomanry Regiment as the Band is to be thrown entirely upon the officers, without any assistance as formerly from the Contingent Allowance; and from what funds or by whom the expenses of Serjeants ordered by Government to the School at Aldershot are to be paid?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Paragraph 2, Clause 28, of the Auxiliary and Reserve Force Circular, 1876, sanctions the issue of 3s a-day during permanent duty for one qualified Yeoman to act as trumpeter. The question whether an additional number of such trumpeters should be allowed is now under consideration, but I can give no pledge as to the ultimate decision. It is not intended to allow any charge against the Contingent Fund for band expenses. This rule is in accordance with the practice adhered to by the War Office in reference to bands for the other branches of the Auxiliary Forces. The serjeants of Yeomanry sent to the Aldershot School are treated in every respect like other non-commissioned officers detailed for such service—that is, they receive travelling expenses, quarters, and rations at contract prices. Routes are in all cases issued for them, and vouchers can be obtained for expenses if applied for by the officer commanding.

IRELAND—THE THURLES CORONERSHIP.—QUESTION.

being taken to appoint a Coroner for the Thurles district of Tipperary; if nearly two years have not elapsed since the death of the late Coroner; and, if further delay in the appointment of a Coroner is likely, he will state the reasons to the House?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: In answer to the Question of the hon. Member, I have to state that on the 6th of September, 1874, the Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal received a certificate, signed by two magistrates, of the death of the coroner. On the 11th of September, 1874, the Lords Commissioners signed the usual warrant for the issue of a writ for the election of a coroner, and notified to the Clerk of the Peace of the County of Tipperary that the writ would issue on the usual fees being paid. No notice has since been taken of the notification to the Clerk of the Peace, and the warrant remains in the Lord Chancellor's office.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE TICHBORNE CASE—ARTHUR ORTON.—QUESTION.

MAJOR O'GORMAN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in the event of any person excepting the Claimant to the Tichborne Title and Estates coming forward and proving himself to the satisfaction of Her Majesty's Government to be Arthur Orton, protection will be given to the said Arthur Orton, after such proof, to enable him to leave the United Kingdom without molestation?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the Question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, I have to state that if any person claiming to be Arthur Orton makes his appearance in this country, he will, like anybody else, be under the protection of the law, and free to come and go without molestation, unless accused of some crime.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC PETITIONS—GRANTS OF MONEY.—QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU asked the Chairman of the Committee on Public Petitions, Whether his attention has been drawn to the Petition from Ropley (App. 535, page 217), and to other Petitions in similar terms, which pray for an increase in the annual Parliamentary grants for inspection in religious instruction (for which no grants are now given nor proposed to be given); and, whether those Petitions are in accordance with the Standing Orders of the House?

SIR CHARLES FORSTER, in reply, said, the Committee on Public Petitions had great difficulty in reference to this question, and he, as Chairman of it, advised them to take an enlarged view of the matter. Still, every case should stand upon its own merits; and while the Committee were prepared to take a liberal view of it, they came to the conclusion that the Petitioners should not ask for public money.

ARMY—WINCHESTER BARRACKS. QUESTION.

MR. SIMONDS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is intended to make additional accommodation in the Winchester barracks to provide for the depôts of the Hampshire Regiments, the 37th and 67th, still in Fort Elson?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Some of the accommodation for this purpose has already been provided, but in order that an entire battalion may remain at Winchester, in addition to providing for the depôts of both the Rifle and county regiments, it is necessary to add some married quarters, as well as to make other additions and alterations, for which plans have been prepared; but some time will be required for the completion of the whole. When the additional accommodation is provided, the depôts mentioned will be moved to Winchester.

THE SLAVE TRADE—THE SULTAN OF ZANZIBAR.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he can give the House any information as to the Proclamation for the Suppression of the Slave Trade lately made by the Sultan of Zanzibar, and as to the steps proposed to be taken by Her Majesty's Government, to support and assist the Sultan in carrying out the same?

MR. BOURKE: The Proclamations alluded to are in these words—

“Proclamation.

“From Barghash bin Saeed bin Sultan.

“To all whom it may concern of our friends on the mainland of Africa, the Island of Pemba, and elsewhere.

“Whereas, in disobedience of our orders and in violation of the terms of our Treaties with Great Britain, slaves are being constantly conveyed by land from Kilwa for the purpose of being taken to the Island of Pemba. Be it known that we have determined to stop, and by this order do prohibit all conveyance of slaves by land under any conditions; and we have instructed our Governors on the coast to seize and imprison those found disobeying this order, and to confiscate their slaves.

“Proclamation.

“JOHN KIRK,

Consul General.”

The Slave Trade Papers are printed annually; therefore, in the usual course, these particular Papers would not be laid before the House before next Session; but as considerable interest is felt upon the subject, I will lay Dr. Kirk's despatch and the Proclamations on the Table this evening. Suggestions have been made to Her Majesty's Government as to certain steps which may be taken with the view of dealing more effectually with the land traffic; and those suggestions have been sent to Dr. Kirk to report upon. It will be necessary to wait for his answer before any decision can be come to. Meantime, when we heard of the issue of the Proclamations, my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs sent the following telegram to Dr. Kirk, which expresses the instructions of Her Majesty's Government upon the important step which has been taken :—

"Express to Sultan the gratification of Her Majesty's Government at the measures adopted by His Highness for suppressing slave traffic in his dominions. You will receive further instructions by post when we receive reply to my despatch of April 20, 1876."

CRIMINAL LAW—THE ESCAPED FENIAN PRISONERS. — QUESTION.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: Sir, as you have pointed out to me within the last few minutes that the terms of my Question are irregular, because they contain an insinuation of want of candour against the First Lord of the Treasury, I shall put it in the following form :— Whether the Governor of Western Australia availed himself of the first opportunity of informing Her Majesty's Government of the escape of the six Fenian prisoners, and at what date did the Government first receive intelligence of the escape?

MR. DISRAELI: The occasion on which I spoke of those prisoners in Western Australia was on the 22nd of May. The first intimation that Her Majesty's Government received of the escape of those prisoners from Western Australia was on the 5th of June.

CUSTOMS—MEMORIAL OF OFFICERS. QUESTION.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether any reply has yet been vouchsafed to the Memorial signed by 923 clerks and officers of Customs, praying for an immediate amelioration of their condition, which Memorial was forwarded to the Treasury by the Commissioners of Customs early in last April; and, if not, when it may be?

MR. W. H. SMITH: In reply to the Question of the hon. Member, I beg to state that a Memorial signed by 923 clerks and officers was received, but it was direct from them. It has been referred to the Board of Customs, but no Report has been received. The following letter has been placed in my hands, and I understand it has been widely circulated. It is dated from the Accountant and Controller General's Office, Her Majesty's Customs, London, E.C., 20th June, 1876 :—

"Dear Sir,—The present Session is rapidly drawing to a close, and our claims for increased pay have not yet been properly met by Her Majesty's Government."

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING: I rise to Order. Is the hon. Gentleman justified in reading a letter in answering a Question?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member can do so in the exercise of his discretion if he so desires.

MR. W. H. SMITH: The letter is as follows :—

H.M.'s Customs, London, E.C.

"Dear Sir,—The present Session is rapidly drawing to a close, and our claims for increased pay have not yet been properly met by Her Majesty's Government. It behoves us either to put on a "spurt" at this juncture or to suffer with what patience we can another year's delay. The general opinion here is that a combined and well-directed attempt should at once be made to obtain for our memorial (which was forwarded to the Lords of the Treasury on the 5th of April last) an early and favourable consideration. This end cannot be better attained than by everyone in the Customs Service at once asking his representatives in Parliament, as well as any other Members to whom he can obtain access, to bring the matter without delay individually, collectively, by question, by deputation, or in any manner which may be deemed most effective, under the notice of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or of the Financial Secretary to the Treasury. I, therefore, earnestly request that you will, without delay, write to your representatives in Parliament, asking them to use their influence in the direction above indicated. There is every reason to believe that a strong and united effort of the whole service, even at this eleventh hour, would ensure our complete success. Trusting to hear from you very soon, I have the honour to remain, dear Sir, your obedient servant,

"JOHN M. BAMFORD."

I need not say that a letter of this description circulated among officers of the Customs must place great difficulty in the way of the Treasury in dealing with a respectful Memorial presented to the Treasury. I trust the House will consider it was an unfortunate attempt on the part of an officer of Customs to obtain consideration for the Memorial.

FISHERIES (IRELAND)—CAPE CLEAR ISLAND.—QUESTION.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Why the fishery harbour at Cape Clear Island, recommended by the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries, and approved of by the Board of Works, and for which the local contributions required by the Board have been raised, has not been proceeded with; and to know when the works may be commenced?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I am informed by the Board of Works that it is due to delays on the part of those locally interested in this work that it has not been proceeded with. The applicants for the grant were informed by the Board on the 22nd of January, 1875, that if one-fourth (£875) of the estimated cost of the work (£3,500) was locally subscribed, the Board would recommend the Treasury to sanction a grant of the remainder. The Board heard nothing further for more than a year, and concluded that the Memorialists were unable to collect the necessary amount. Since that date the Board have been informed, in March last, that the required amount would be forthcoming in the locality; but in the meantime the Treasury have agreed to undertake certain other important harbour works connected with the Irish fisheries, which must therefore take precedence of the harbour at Cape Clear.

FISHERIES (ENGLAND)—RYE BAY. QUESTION.

MR. STEWART HARDY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he will send a cruizer to Rye Bay to protect the English fishermen from the annoyance of the French fishing boats?

MR. HUNT: Orders have already been given that a cruizer shall proceed to that part of the coast.

CATTLE DISEASE (IRELAND)—PLEURO-PNEUMONIA — COMPULSORY SLAUGHTER.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN MOORE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he has received any report of the death of cattle from lung-disease in Ireland since the 1st of January last; and, if so, whether he will introduce a Clause in the Cattle Disease (Ireland) Bill, allowing retrospective compensation to that date in cases where cattle having that disease died or were slaughtered, and reliable proof thereof can be given?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: There have been some reports of deaths among cattle in Ireland from disease since the 1st of January last, but I am happy to say they are not very numerous. I can see no reason why compensation should be granted to the owners of cattle which have died of this disease, nor to owners who have voluntarily slaughtered their cattle affected with it, not being compelled to do so by the provisions of any Order in Council. My hon. Friend is aware that no order has, as yet, been made for the compulsory slaughter in Ireland of animals affected with pleuro-pneumonia; and therefore any such retrospective compensation as his Question suggests could not, I think, be properly granted, to say nothing of the great practical difficulties which would attend any attempt to assess it.

EXHIBITION COMMISSIONERS OF 1851.—THE FINANCIAL POSITION. QUESTION.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can inform the House of the financial position of the Commissioners for the Great Exhibition of 1851, or of the prospect of making the large funds in their hands available for the promotion of science and art; and, whether the Commissioners have made any Report to Her Majesty since that of the 15th of August 1867; and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay it upon the Table of the House?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: As the subject is one which naturally excites some interest, perhaps the House will allow me to read a short statement which I have received from the Commissioners with respect to it. They say—

“The property of the Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851 consists of land returning no income, of exhibition galleries leased or lent to the Government, of land let on building leases, and of house property. Their available income at the present time is about £2,000 per annum. Their financial position will depend upon the mode in which the land now returning no income is dealt with, that is to say, whether let on building leases or reserved for public purposes.

The Commissioners have lately determined to sell on building leases some of the outlying portions of the estate, and to employ £100,000 of the money thus obtained in erecting on their estate a building for a museum of scientific instruments, for a library of works on science for the use of the students at South Kensington, and for public examination rooms, which are much needed. The building would also be available for other objects of scientific education. An offer to this effect has been recently made to Her Majesty's Government, and the matter is now under consideration. The Commissioners propose to expend a further sum in establishing scholarships to give the more promising students of provincial institutions and colleges of science and art the benefit of study in the science and art classes at South Kensington. The Commissioners made a Report of the annual International Exhibitions from the 1st of May, 1871, to the 31st of October, 1874, which has been laid before Her Majesty."

I have no objection to lay that Report upon the Table of the House.

TURKEY—THE EASTERN QUESTION. QUESTION.

MR. CHAPLIN asked the honourable Member for Portsmouth, If he intends to proceed with the Motion on Friday which stands first in his name on that day?

MR. T. C. BRUCE: I am very anxious to proceed with that Motion if it can be done without inconvenience to the negotiations at present going on. I am informed that certain Papers material to the questions involved in my Motion have not yet been laid before the House, and in that case it might be inopportune for me to proceed. I therefore beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he considers that a discussion should take place in the present state of the negotiations, and whether it would or would not be inconvenient to the public service? I also wish to ask whether the Government are prepared, at this particular period, to give those explanations without which such a discussion would lose a great deal of its value. If the discussion would be inconvenient, I shall have no alternative but to withdraw my Motion. But I trust the right hon. Gentleman will give me an assurance that he will give me the earliest opportunity which the negotiations will allow to bring forward my Motion, and will place me in the same fortunate position in which I now stand upon the Paper. The question is one of the greatest importance, and ought to be debated as soon as possible before the end of the Session.

MR. DISRAELI: If the House will allow me, I will postpone my answer to the Question of my hon. Friend until we come to the Orders of the Day. It would be somewhat inconvenient to reply to it now.

ARMY—KING GEORGE OF HANOVER QUESTION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If it is true, as stated in the papers, that recently the Ex-King of Hanover was gazetted a General in the British Army and his son a Colonel in the British Army?

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, it is quite true that Her Majesty, in the exercise of her undoubted and gracious prerogative, has conferred upon her Royal relative the Duke of Cumberland, a Peer of this realm, and upon his eldest son, the right of wearing the British uniform by conferring upon him the commission of General and upon his son that of Colonel in our Army. I need not add, unless it be for the information of the hon. Gentleman, that these appointments are purely honorary.

ARMY—THE PENSION WARRANT. QUESTION.

MR. PATESHALL asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is intended to increase the pensions of soldiers?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: A Committee that recently sat at the War Office on this subject proposed various alterations in the existing Pension Warrant, and these proposals have been for some time under the consideration of the Treasury, and until their decision is arrived at I am unable to state what, if any, alterations will be made.

INDIAN AND COLONIAL MUSEUM. QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is intended to build an Indian and Colonial Museum on the Victoria Embankment; if so, whether he can state the probable cost of erecting and maintaining such museums, and also from what sources the necessary expenditure would be defrayed?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he had heard from time to time suggestions for the erection of an Indian and Colonial Museum, and, among other plans, of one to erect a building for the purpose on the Thames Embankment. No definite proposal had, however, been submitted to the Government on the subject, nor was there one at present under their consideration. He could, therefore, give the hon. Gentleman no information as to the probable cost of erecting and maintaining such museums, or as to the sources from which the necessary expenditure would be defrayed.

NAVY—H.M.S. "RALEIGH"—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he has any information as to a Court Martial stated (in the "Daily News" of the 19th and other papers) to have been held at Lisbon, to inquire into the collision between H.M.S. "Raleigh" and a Portuguese ship of war, and resulting in blame being attributed to the British ship, with a probable claim on this Country for damages; if it be true, as reported, that Captain Tryon of the "Raleigh," soon after the collision, asked for a Court Martial and was refused; and, if the Admiralty proposes to deal with the matter by a secret inquiry, or how?

MR. HUNT: A Court of Inquiry—not a court martial, as stated in the newspapers—was held at Lisbon to inquire into the circumstances of the collision between Her Majesty's ship Raleigh and a Portuguese corvette, and the Court exonerated the captain of the latter, but I have heard nothing of any claim for damages. Captain Tyron, of the Raleigh, did not ask for a court martial. A Court of Inquiry was ordered by the Admiralty, which was held in the usual manner; and the Admiralty, after perusing the Report of the Court, was satisfied with the account given by Captain Tyron and his officers of their conduct in the matter.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON—CANADIAN FISHERY COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the United States Government has now taken the necessary steps to complete the organization of a Fishery Commission under the Washington Treaty, and when the Commission is expected to meet; and, whether there is any prospect of a satisfactory settlement of the questions raised between Canada and the United States in relation to the use of the American canals, and the imposition of duty on packages containing fish imported into the United States?

MR. BOURKE: Communications are going on with the United States Government as to the appointment of a third Commissioner, and it is hoped that they will shortly agree to take the necessary steps for the completion of the Commission. Mr. Ford, the British agent to the Commission, who visited Canada last autumn, has recently gone to Newfoundland to assist the Newfoundland Government in preparing their portion of the case to be submitted to the Commission. As to the second Question, I can only say it would be impossible within the limits of an Answer to a Question to state exactly the way in which the case at present stands, involving, as it does, many complicated questions of detail between the two Governments. Papers will shortly be laid on the Table upon the subject. In the meanwhile, I think I may say that the questions are in a fair way for a satisfactory settlement.

EXPLOSIVE SUBSTANCES ACT, 1875— EXPLOSION AT HAMILTON.

QUESTION.

MR. RAMSAY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has received information of the occurrence of an explosion of dynamite at a place within one quarter of a mile of the barracks near the town of Hamilton, and within a few hundred yards of the railway station at the same town, whereby a number of persons have been killed; and, if he would state whether the dynamite was stored at the place where the accident occurred by authority of the Home Office; and, if so, whether he would state the precautions which were enjoined to secure the life and property of the inhabitants of Hamilton in the event of such an explosion at a place so near the town?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that information was duly sent to the Home Office of the explosion referred to by the hon. Member. He ordered an Inspector appointed under the Act to make inquiry into the circumstances, and it was found that the dynamite which exploded was stored illegally, and not in any place authorized by the Act. His conclusion on a prima facie view of the case would be that the person in charge of the dynamite had committed an offence, not only under the new Act, but under the old one. The matter was in the hands of the authorities.

PARLIAMENT—ORDER—PRIORITY FOR MOTIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. RITCHIE asked the honourable Member for West Cumberland, Whether, seeing it has been stated from the Chair, that according to the Rules of the House a Member could give Notice of only one Motion with a view of obtaining under the ballot priority for such Motion, and that if several Members combined to enter their names on the Notice Paper with the view of giving Notice of one and the same Motion the rule of the House was thereby practically evaded, he intends to proceed with the Motion which stands in his name for Friday 14th July?

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM: Sir, I think the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets will see, upon consideration of the whole of this case, that in asking me this Question it is practically whether I consider there has been such a breach of the Rules of this House as should induce me to withdraw my Motion from the Order Book. He is asking me to decide a point which it is not for me to decide, and putting upon my shoulders a responsibility which rests upon the shoulders of the House. This is a question of very great interest to private Members, and the object of the Motion is of very great interest to people in this House and out-of-doors. Had the question been decided on Monday there might have been a possibility of bringing the matter forward this Session. We have just heard on high authority that we are very near the close of the Session. The Motion of the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Butler-Johnstone) was withdrawn on the very day when I gave Notice of my Motion, and therefore practically to erase this Motion from the Order Book would prevent its coming on again this year. I have always understood that the universal practice amongst Members of this House not to take up any question or Bill which was in the hands of another Member was a matter purely of courtesy and good feeling between Members, and had nothing whatever to do with the Rules of the House. If there is a question of sufficient interest to engage the attention of many Members instead of one, I do not see why on that account it should be deprived of the greater chance of gaining the attention of the House which it would otherwise possess. There are two ways of getting rid of a Motion—one by the action of the Member himself, and the other by the action of the House after debate, and sometimes on division. I do not intend to put the House to that trouble; but I understand, Sir, that the Question of the hon. Member is exactly the same as that twice put to you by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), and which you refused to answer. I therefore cannot, on the suggestion or hint of any one, withdraw this Motion. If you, Sir, from the Chair, say you think there has been an evasion of the Rules, or of the spirit of the Rules, of the House, which should necessitate my withdrawing this Motion, I shall not hesitate to give Notice of its withdrawal.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has imposed on me rather a serious responsibility. He says if I am prepared to state that, in my judgment, such an evasion of the Rules of the House has taken place as to justify the striking out of his Motion from the Paper, he will abide by my decision. Now, if the hon. Member was acting in combination with other Members to get undue priority for his Motion under the Ballot, I do think that such an evasion has taken place of the Rules of the House as would involve the striking out of the Motion from the Paper on the day on which it was put down. But I must leave it to the hon. Member himself to determine whether he has been acting in good faith to the House, or whether he has been acting in combination with other Members to obtain undue priority for his Motion.

ARMY — MOBILIZATION OF THE FORCES.—QUESTION.

MR. J. HOLMS asked the Secretary of State for War, When the Government propose to submit to the consideration of the House the scheme, together with an estimate of the cost, for the Mobilization of the Forces, which has appeared in the Army List since December last; and, whether, seeing that a Bill has been passed by the House of Commons for calling out two of the eight Army Corps composing such scheme for Autumn Manœuvres, Her Majesty's Government will name an early day for the discussion of the scheme?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, with reference to the first part of the Question, that he had no intention to bring the subject before the House further than had been done on the Estimates. As sufficient provision had been made, he did not intend to submit any additional Estimates to the House. He might remark that the House had not sanctioned the calling out of the Army Corps, but had merely sanctioned the use of certain land for the purpose of mobilization. There was on the Paper a Notice relating to mobilization generally, and he had no intention to interfere with it.

LOANS (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

MR. DODSON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is his intention to introduce a Bill this Session on the subject of the outstanding balances in respect of loans of public money for various purposes in Ireland?

MR. W. H. SMITH: In reply to the hon. Member's Question, I have to state that there is an intention to introduce a Bill on the subject his Question refers to in the course of the present Session.

PARLIAMENT—LEITRIM COUNTY ELECTION.—QUESTION.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I trust the House will allow me to allude to a Question put on Wednesday by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) during my absence on that day. It was a Question serious in itself, and the course which the hon. and gallant Member took on Wednesday, as far as I can understand his remarks—for I did not hear them, and only became acquainted with them in the way Members are obliged to do when not present—seemed to have implied either that the Military authorities or the Government had taken such part with the view of hindering the gentleman alluded to from standing for the representation of an Irish county now vacant. In the Question which the hon. and gallant Member put upon the Paper on Wednesday—which I did not see till that morning, for I left London very early on Wednesday morning, on official business, as the hon. and gallant Member knew I was about to do—he asked the Secretary of State for War—

“If any Officer stationed at Newbridge has been refused, verbally or in writing, leave to contest an Irish constituency; and was this refusal on account of his politics.”

The charge is a very grave one, whether it be addressed to the Government or to the Military authorities. I will therefore tell the House what happened exactly with respect to myself. On Monday evening the hon. and gallant Member asked me whether I had heard anything about this gentleman having been refused leave of absence, and I said that I had not. I was waiting for the Education debate to come on, and could not leave the House to inquire at the Office; but I immediately wrote to my Secretary, requesting him to make inquiries. On going down to the Office on the following morning, I found that nothing was known on the subject, and I ordered that a telegram should be sent to Ireland at head quarters. We got no answer for some time because nothing was known of the matter in Ireland. A telegram was sent to the Curragh, and inquiries were made at Newbridge. Nothing was known at the Curragh on the subject until the 20th. Therefore, yesterday, the hon. and gallant Gentleman was informed by my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary that we had no information on the subject at that time; but later in the day he privately sent to the hon. and gallant Gentleman a telegram which we had received, and which did not contain full information. I have now obtained that information, and in order to show the House what little ground there was for the charge which the hon. and gallant Member has insinuated against the Government or the Military authorities, I will, with the permission of the House, read the telegrams which have been received to-day. A telegram was received a little before 2 o'clock. It is from the Deputy Adjutant General in the War Office at Dublin to the Adjutant General at the War Office in London, and is as follows:—

" Full Report called for by telegraph from General Commanding at Curragh on Captain O'Beirne's case was received here by special messenger last night too late for London post, but went by this morning's post, and will reach you to-night. Nothing was known of this case here until your telegram of the 20th was received. The facts are these:—On 16th instant Captain O'Beirne applied to his Commanding Officer for leave, for electioneering purposes, for a period beyond the power of that officer to grant. He offered, however, all he could—48 hours, and referred Captain O'Beirne personally to the General Commanding at the Curragh. Captain O'Beirne, on the 20th, did not see the General. On the 21st Captain O'Beirne applied through his Commanding Officer for leave from the 22nd until the declaration of polling for county Leitrim, which was immediately granted by General Seymour."

Subsequent to that, and in consequence of the Government sending another telegram, they received very shortly before I came down to the House another telegram from the Deputy Adjutant General in Ireland—

" Your telegram just received. A full telegram has been already sent to you this morning. On the 16th instant Captain O'Beirne asked his Commanding Officer for several days' leave for electioneering purposes. Colonel Stewart replied that he had only power to grant two days' leave. Captain O'Beirne said that would do him no good. The Colonel then told him he had permission to go and see the General Commanding at the Curragh. Captain O'Beirne went to the Curragh that evening, but finding the Brigade Office closed he did not go to the General's private residence or take any further steps. General Seymour knew nothing of the matter until a regular application for leave from Captain O'Beirne, which was sent in on the 20th was received on the 21st. It was immediately granted."

Then there is a telegram from General Seymour himself to the Military Secretary here—

" Captain O'Beirne's application for leave was from the 22nd to the 29th instant, or until the declaration of the poll for the county Leitrim, and was at once granted by me. No blame attaches here. He never took the trouble to come to me personally, nor did I hear all this until yesterday. Have never refused leave here."

Therefore, it is clear, that so far as the Military authorities in Ireland are concerned they have not interfered with this gentleman either on military grounds or on the ground of his politics. So far as the Government are concerned I hope I need not say that they have had nothing whatever to say to the question. The subject of leave is a matter of discipline in the Army, and does not come before the Secretary of War at all; and it was quite obvious to me, when the hon. and gallant Member applied to me on the subject, that my first duty was to ascertain what had occurred in Ireland, and that I had no right to interfere with the discipline of the Army or to take any steps until I knew what had been done. It appears now that Captain O'Beirne was delayed by his own fault, because he had permission to obtain leave earlier if he chose, but did not ask until the 21st, and then immediately received the leave which he applied for.

CAPTAIN NOLAN: I trust the House will permit me to offer a few words of explanation. The Secretary of State for War has overwhelmed me with telegrams and Reports, received since I brought this question before the House. What has happened out of the House is this—and it shows the importance of bringing these questions before the House, for although I waited 44 hours after bringing this matter under the notice of the Government, the only information I received was of a meagre and unsatisfactory character. But the moment this question is before the House, I am, as I have said, overwhelmed with Reports and telegrams. Now, Sir, the course I pursued has been stated to a great extent by the Secretary of State for War. I applied to him at 4 o'clock on Monday, but until Wednesday, at 12 o'clock, I received no information as to what had been done in Ireland; and when I did receive some information then from an official telegram, it was that the officer could only receive leave for seven days, which was quite insufficient to conduct a county election. The Secretary of State has admitted that my Question was down on the Paper on Tuesday, when the right hon. Gentleman was here, and at his request I postponed it. And I postponed my Question in the most formal manner by public Notice in this House. The words I used, following the advice of a Member who sat near me, were—"I will postpone the Question until this evening, or, if more convenient, until to-morrow." So that the right hon. Gentleman had full Notice of it. I certainly knew he was at Shoeburyness, as I publicly stated in the House yesterday. The right hon. Gentleman says this is a military question; but I think it is sufficiently political for any other Minister to have given me an answer. The inference the House may draw is, that there has been a great deal of friction between different Departments, as it took 44 hours to obtain a telegram. I cannot say whether it was the fault of the Government, of the General in Ireland, or of the Colonel. Even if I could, I should be sorry to do so. All I can point out is, that there has been a great deal of friction and delay which, so far as it extended to telegraphic messages, seems to have been totally removed as soon as the question became one not of letting an opposition candidate go to the poll, but of vindicating the Ministry. We then had a full Report. As to Captain O'Beirne's applying for leave or not, that is the very question on which I asked for information, which I could not obtain. It is evident, however, from the Secretary for War's statement, that he did make an application; and an officer asking for leave to contest a county, and surrounded by military authorities—let me inform the House from personal experience—is in a very different position from a Member speaking in this House under privileges which have grown up during 400 or 500 years, and which are very necessary for the protection of some individuals.

TURKEY—THE EASTERN QUESTION.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

MR. DISRAELI: I will now, with the permission of the House, answer the Question of my hon. Friend (Mr. Bruce)—whether it will be convenient for the public service that we should enter at once into some discussion on the present state of affairs in Turkey; and, if not, whether I could feel it my duty, when the occasion serves, to facilitate that discussion in this House? Her Majesty's Government appreciate—entirely appreciate—the sage forbearance—I will even say the patriotic reserve—which has been extended to the Government in circumstances of difficulty, and which has induced the House to refrain from discussing affairs the public notice of which we may assume might be inconvenient. I myself trust that this forbearance will not be abused, and I can assure the House that there is no wish on the part of Her Majesty's Government that we should take advantage of it for any other object than that of the public welfare. The House will perhaps best form an opinion as to the expediency of discussion at present upon the affairs of Turkey if I place before them, as accurately as it is in my power to do, the exact position of affairs. The Great Powers, although they may have differed on other points, have unanimously agreed upon one—namely, that after the events which have happened at Constantinople, and the accession of the new Sultan, it was just and expedient that he should not be unduly pressed, but that he should have sufficient time to survey his position, and to decide what, in the opinion of his Ministers and Counsellors, was the best course by which he might extricate himself from his difficulties and bring about a state of affairs more satisfactory to Europe. With this view the Sultan has published a Proclamation, which grants a general amnesty to all his subjects in Herzegovina and in Bosnia, and at the same time has announced a suspension of hostilities. In what manner this Proclamation has been received by the Insurgents we have no formal evidence, which is the necessary consequence of their having no Provisional Government or recognized head. But so far as we can now form an opinion from what is occurring in those countries, the Proclamation has, at least, elicited some inert sympathy; because we have it in evidence that it has been in the power of the Turkish authorities to revictual the most important stronghold in Herzegovina without any difficulty, though the attempt to do so a few weeks ago caused a severe and sanguinary struggle, and I might say more than one sanguinary struggle. I may also observe that we have reason to believe that communications are at this moment passing between the Government at Constantinople and various bodies of other subjects of the Sultan. What may be the result of these negotiations I do not pretend to give an opinion; but the House can now judge whether they think it expedient that we should enter into a discussion of these important affairs under present circumstances. From its own experience the House is quite conscious that, in debate, a single expression often leads to great misapprehension—that it may foster very unreasonable expectations in some quarters, and may lead to some delusive hopes. I should say my-

have a wider area of qualification coupled with a power of selection.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 195; Noes 105: Majority 90.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH then moved to reduce the qualification from £50 to £45 in Class 2.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING objected. He said that if the Bill was passed with the qualifications proposed by the Government it would not be in operation long before it would be denounced in that House. The effect of the Bill would be in Kerry, Roscommon, and Sligo to reduce the required number of jurors by 25 per cent. He moved the omission of the word "five."

MR. LAW also supported the reduction of the proposed qualification on similar grounds. The right hon. Baronet, he thought, should make some concession in this case, and name an amount that would insure the attendance of a sufficient number of jurors.

THE O'CONOR DON said, he had understood that the right hon. Baronet would assent to the £40 in the last case. There was still more reason why he should assent in this case.

THE O'DONOGHUE, speaking of the county Kerry, could only say the consequence of adopting the figures proposed by the Government would fail to supply a sufficient number of jurors.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY protested against this franchise of the Irish people being frittered away.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, that in considering the number of jurors who would be secured by the proposed qualification, it should be remembered that the household qualification would give a large number of additional jurors in towns and villages of an intelligent class.

MR. BIGGAR hoped the hon. Member for Galway would move that the Chairman should report Progress, as he himself would then move that he should leave the Chair.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA hoped the hon. Member for Galway would not follow the advice just tendered to him. He thought they might facilitate a satisfactory arrangement if they only had a little more deliberation. The present qualification was £30, the Bill proposed to make it £45, and he would suggest to the right hon. Baronet (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) that the Amendment fixing £40 as the qualification was a fair compromise.

Amendment (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) agreed to.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH intimated that he was prepared to assent to the proposal for £40 in all the classes, and would insert a Proviso for that purpose on the Report.

MR. BRUEN said, he must protest against this arrangement. For the purpose of putting himself in Order he would move that the Chairman be ordered to report Progress. The House had, by a large majority, agreed that £45 should be the qualification for certain parts of Ireland, and it was hardly respectful to the House for the Minister to reverse that decision on a future occasion. This appeared to be the result of certain negotiations which had been carried on by the recognized Leaders of the Party, without any consultation with their Followers. Such tactics were extremely painful to those who sat behind the Ministerial Benches. They all acknowledged Party ties; but when these ties were subjected to such rude wrenches as had just been given, he must offer his expression of sorrow that the proposed change had been brought about in such a manner.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Bruen.)

MR. LAW said, it was a simple question of arithmetic as to what the qualification should be, so as insure a sufficient number of jurors. It had been suggested that £40 should be accepted as the amount requisite in Class I. On that they went to a division, and no doubt there was a majority in favour of £45; but on the next proposal no division was taken, and he must say it seemed to him that the right hon. Baronet had acted with perfect fairness and propriety in accepting the proposal to make the qualification £40 throughout.

MR. W. JOHNSTON said, he had heard with regret the remarks of the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen). He entirely agreed with the reduction to £40. At any rate, it showed a reasonable desire to meet the wishes of hon. Gentlemen opposite.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he, too, regretted the feeling which had been expressed by his hon. Friend, and should regret it still more if he thought he had deserved it. The Government were dealing with a matter of considerable difficulty, upon statistics which were the best they could obtain at the time, though they were not so full or so satisfactory as they could wish. He had had some consultation with his hon. Friends behind him on the subject, but he did not understand from them that they thought there were insuperable objections to the figure which had now been agreed to. As it was, he thought the question had been settled upon a fair basis, after due notice to all concerned; and he believed that the Bill in its present shape would add greatly to the efficiency of the Irish jurors, because it would to a large extent raise the qualifications.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, the hon. Member for Carlow had failed in an attempt to exclude the majority of the Irish people from the jury-box.

MR. VERNER concurred with the opinion expressed by the hon. Member for Carlow. Having taken part in the vote he came into the House a few minutes afterwards, and was surprised to find that the Government had given way. He thought they were in the habit of giving up far too many things.

MR. BIGGAR said, he had often had occasion to blame the Chief Secretary, but now thought that many of the sins for which the right hon. Gentleman had been visited should really have been laid at the door of a small minority behind him.

MR. BRUEN, in asking permission to withdraw his Motion to report Progress, said, he did not think he need say anything as to the motives for his conduct. No doubt the Chief Secretary had received the support of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and of that he could not complain; but as regarded himself he must say that the Chief Secretary, having the figures and facts before him, recommended his supporters on that side of the House to agree to a certain qualification, and immediately afterwards had abandoned what had been deliberately agreed to. If he had said anything offensive to the right hon. Gentleman he begged to apologize.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule agreed to.

PRISONS BILL.—[BILL 180.]

(Mr. Secretary Cross, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Assheton Cross.)

MR. RYLANDS, in rising to move, as an Amendment—

"That the House, whilst recognizing the necessity of measures being adopted to secure economy and efficiency in the management of Prisons, is of opinion that it would be inexpedient to transfer the control and management of Prisons from Local Authorities to the Secretary of State, said: In calling attention to the Prisons Bill proposed by the Government, I venture to move my Amendment, acting entirely upon my own convictions. I have no claim to represent any political Party, or section of a Party, in the House upon this question. I speak as an independent Member, and I would appeal to independent Members on both sides of the House upon this subject in which we are all so much interested, and I am anxious to make no remarks which would give rise to feelings of a Party character. Nor do I intend to enter into the great question of local taxation that may come up in the course of the debate; but I shall abstain from going into it, merely remarking that I hold it a great mistake to transfer large sums from the local rates to the Exchequer. I do not purpose to move the rejection of the Bill. I simply propose to call the attention of the House to the subject, and to move my Resolution as it stands upon the Paper. In doing this I wish to give the greatest credit to the Home Secretary for the very able manner in which he brought this important question before the House in the statement which he has made. I do not wish to stand in the way of any plan calculated to increase the efficient management of prisons or of economy in that management, but I think we must be on our guard, and not be led away by exaggerated ideas or mistaken statements. In the course of Public Business hitherto it has not unfrequently been my lot to advocate measures of reform, and the right hon. Gentleman has taken up a position to restrict such measures. Our positions in the present instance are reversed. The right hon. Gentleman comes forward as a Radical reformer, while I fill the rôle of a Conservative. It is the usual habit of reformers to exaggerate the benefits they hope to derive from the course they propose to adopt, while, at the same time, they keep in the background the disadvantages which may result from the change. The Home Secretary has done both—he has exaggerated the benefits to be expected, but he has withheld important objections. He has drawn a striking contrast from cases of certain large and small gaols. He held up three examples of the excessive cost of maintaining prisoners in small gaols as compared with larger and better managed prisons, showing that while in Stafford the cost was £23 per head, in Salford £15, and in Manchester £17, in Tiverton it amounted to £104 11s. 7d., in Lincoln £114 11s. 7d., and in Oakham as much as £150 4s. 2d., and the consequence was these “shocking examples” were taken up by the newspapers and spread throughout the country an opinion in favour of reform, and an inducement to accept the Prisons Bill. But I must call attention to facts which I think will show the apparent cost is not so great and unequal as it appears to be. I find that according to Returns for 1874, which were laid before the House upon the Motion of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), there is a considerable difference from the statement made by the Home Secretary, whose Returns were based upon the year 1875. The result of this comparison is as follows:—In 1874 the cost of each prisoner in Tiverton was £60 2s., not £104 11s.; in Lincoln £41 13s., instead of £114 11s.; and in Oakham the cost in 1874 was £117 7s., as compared with the following year £150 4s. 2d. Now, to what are we to attribute the difference? Why simply to the fact that in 1874 there was a larger average of two or three prisoners per day than in 1875. The entire cost of Tiverton Gaol in 1874 was £210, and yet upon this case and those of two other small prisons we are called upon to make this sweeping change in the management of our gaols! In the course of his speech the right hon. Gentleman led us to believe that small prisons were in all cases necessarily more expensive than large prisons. Now, what is the fact? In these Returns for 1874 are included large and small prisons, and there are many cases in which the latter show a more economical management in the cost per head than do the larger ones. In Devonshire, with a daily average of 156 prisoners, the cost was £34 1s. 3d. per head, yet in Barnstaple where there was a daily average of eight prisoners it was only £25 8s., and besides several other instances there was Buckingham, where the cost per head was £27 8s., and where the daily average of prisoners was three. Now, I think these statistics for 1874 deserve the careful attention of the House, and should induce some reflection before we are led away by the revolutionary ardour of the right hon. Gentleman. I will admit ceteris paribus that small prisons can be less economically managed than large ones, still I think this principle can be pushed too far; there are limitations. You might suppress small prisons that are well and economically managed, and you might build others so large as to lead to abuses and waste. It seems to me there is in this some resemblance to a manufactory. Of course, it is an advantage to have extensive works, but manufacturers well know the evil of overgrown manufacturing establishments. No doubt the proposal in the speech of the Home Secretary for equal prison districts was a taking one. The right hon. Gentleman said that 40 of the larger prisons provided accommodation for 20,000, and that this was largely in excess of the average of prisoners, the daily average being only 17,806. In these 40 prisons there are 20,000 cells. Well, then the question might be very fairly asked—why not do away with all the prisons with the exception of these 40 large ones? I venture to say that proposal is a very taking one, having regard to the saving of expense; but there are serious objections to carrying it out to the full extent. I think that in dealing with the establishment and constitution of prisons

we must have regard to considerations depending upon local circumstances. These cannot be left out of view. You might make some little economy, but at the risk of creating local inconvenience that is not desirable. We must take care to have a good margin for the accommodation of prisoners between the daily average and the number of cells. Any one who has given attention to the subject knows that there are considerable fluctuations in crime—cycles of crime—some periods having an increase, while at another time the number is much smaller. In addition to that there is the increase in population, in some districts very rapid, while in others it is much less so. These circumstances have to be provided for in prison accommodation. Then also we must have prisons situated not too far apart or too few, or it would lead to an increase in the cost of conveyance of prisoners. It may not be a very serious item of expense; but it certainly is undesirable that prisoners should be conveyed long distances from one part of the country to another. But although the Home Secretary admits the accommodation for 20,000 prisoners, he does not propose to cut down the number of prisons to 40; but what he does propose is to reduce the number of prisons by 50 out of 116, with a view to secure considerable economy. I should like the attention of the House for a short time while we deal with this proposition, and inquire how far it will go towards the attainment of his object. He proposes to retain 66 out of the existing number for the accommodation of 17,806 prisoners. I must take it for granted he will allow for a certain proportion above the average of 1874. If we must have cell accommodation for 22,000 prisoners—4,000 or 5,000 cells less than we have now—that will give us an average of 365 cells to each prison, and I think the right hon. Gentleman can hardly go lower than 365 to provide for the daily average. Well, it is to this point I would direct attention. We want 66 prisons with an average of 365 cells in each. There are, however, not 25 prisons in England and Wales that have that amount of accommodation. But the proposition of the Home Secretary does not stop here. He will maintain one prison in each county, and what position shall we be in with regard to the prisons in the counties? I find that in 13 counties

there is no prison with cell accommodation above 100; in 11 counties no prison with 200 cells; and in 9 counties no prison with 300 cells; so that in 33 counties out of 52 there were no prisons to meet the requirements of the Home Secretary for the carrying out his scheme. What does this mean? It means that the Government scheme will force them in one of two directions, either of which will tell against the desired economy. We must either retain the small county prisons at the expense of management, or we must build larger ones to accommodate the prisoners from those buildings pulled down or otherwise disposed of. My impression is that this suppression of 50 prisons is really what it has been described—a revolutionary scheme. I think after carefully looking at the Returns upon the Table that the suppression of 20 would be amply sufficient. If it is necessary to suppress some prisons, what is the proper course? Clearly, to follow the course adopted in 1865, when 14 prisons were suppressed by a Bill in which these 14 prisons were scheduled. Then every hon. Member could see exactly what was proposed to be done, and the various localities affected could make any representation to the House they thought fit in respect of the Government proposal. I do not doubt that some 15 or 20 prisons might be suppressed, but let these be properly specified. And let me remind the House that since the Returns of 1874 two prisons have been discontinued in the county of Norfolk by the arrangement of the local authorities, one at Swaffham, and another at Yarmouth, with a view to efficient management, and it seems to me that there is an example that might be followed without such a scheme as that proposed. There is another point to which I will call the attention of the House. The Government proposal is directed more against borough prisons than county prisons. [Mr. ASSHETON CROSS dissented.] Well, some in boroughs, and some in counties. There has been within the last few years a number of prisons erected at the expense of boroughs: for instance, take the town of Portsmouth. When in the secret recesses of the Home Office, and surrounded by his counsellors, the right hon. Gentleman takes this prison into consideration he may, under the despotic power conferred by the Bill, decide to it can only be with reference to diet and labour. That would be easily rectified. The Secretary of State might by this Bill take any additional powers that are required. The Home Secretary also takes credit in his statement for a great saving of £50,000 from prisoner's earnings. Something in this way, I think, might be done. We are very much behind-hand in this respect, and it is a question deserving the serious attention of this House and of prison authorities. There has been, on the part of prison authorities, a disposition to proceed in one groove—in a jog-trot mode in such matters. With judicious management I think the earnings from prisoner's labour might be materially increased, and I hope we may see them increased. It is in some sort a technical education of prisoners, and by employment they might be fitted in after time when they go out of prison to earn wages to keep them from commission of crime. A great reform in the development of prison industry can be better carried out under local than under a central authority, because local bodies would be better able to understand the kind of labour in which prisoners might be most profitably employed, and can make better arrangements for the disposal of the results of their labour than could the Home Office. I find in following out the average of earnings in different prisons that they are very small, and that they vary up to £14 per head. There are several in which the earnings reach from £6 to £10. There are others where they are no more than from £3 to £5, and a considerable proportion where the sums are very small indeed. It seems to me we ought to take blame to ourselves in not increasing the average of prison earnings, because by doing so we should derive great benefit to the county, to the country at large, and to the future of the prisoners themselves. Now, what is my proposal? It is this—and I submit it to the Home Secretary, with the hope that he will see no practical objection to it—to give to the prison authorities every year a percentage equal to the average earnings of the prisoners up to £10 a-year, to be devoted towards the maintenance of the prisons. The number of prisoners at present is 18,000. If it were possible for the local prison authorities by judicious management to bring up the average profit of prison work to £10 a-head, £180,000 would be produced. From the experience in Germany and elsewhere, we may form an opinion that it is not unreasonable to suppose that £10 a-head could be produced. In a variety of ways it might be possible if some inducement were held out to prison authorities. If you get this moderate amount my proposition is, that Government should supplement it with a similar amount, this will make £360,000. To the grant there might be attached any conditions which the Home Office might think it right to impose, and you would have all the improvements in prison management without interference with local management of expenditure. I may say that, in taking up this question, I have done so from no feeling but that of the interest I take in local self-government. As a magistrate I have taken part for 25 years in the local matters appertaining to that part of the county where I reside, and I honour the public spirit which induces gentlemen to act in their locality for the public service, so that this proposal of the Government appears to me a most dangerous one, striking at the policy which I believe is one of the essential elements on which the progress and well-being of the country is based. If the Government take over the control of the prisons, every argument the right hon. Gentleman has urged applies in equal force to taking over the control of the police. If I had the honour of a seat on the front bench opposite, I venture to say I could come down to the House and make a speech, in which I could show that by taking all the borough police and the county police under one control, the Government would effect a great economy of management, would employ a less number of police at less cost. All these and similar arguments I could advance by the dozen together. But if the Government take over the prisons and the police they must not stop there. I recollect when my hon. Friend the Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Sir Massey Lopes) brought in his Resolution in regard to local taxation. What argument did he use? He claimed that prisons should be taken up by the Government, because they were used not only for the security of real and personal property, but for the security of life. The same argument applies with equal force to the police. But if the Government take over the prisons and police, they must, as I have said, go further; they must take over the control of the magistrates, and institute a system of paid magistrates, like that in Ireland, a sort of superior inspectors of police, and then what a grand flow of promotion we might have!—from policeman to sergeant, from sub-inspector to inspector, and at length to a seat on the magisterial bench. I have seen a newspaper—whose extreme views I do not share—which approved of the Bill, because it was a “slap in the face for the great unpaid.” For my own part, I should be sorry to see this body of gentlemen superseded in favour of salaried officials, and I do think that, considering the large number of magistrates, and the variety of cases that come under their adjudication in contrast with a much smaller number of police magistrates, I may venture to say that comparatively the paid magistrates have made more blunders in the administration of justice, and given rise to more scandal by those blunders in proportion to their numbers, than unpaid magistrates. I have often sat with unpaid magistrates, and remarked the great attention and care they give to the consideration of a case before them. They have not the same amount of legal training; but, for my own part, if I should have the misfortune to be put upon my trial in some case where great care was necessary to secure my liberty, I would rather trust my fate to the consideration of three English gentlemen, because I know that if one should err there would be two others to set him right, than I would to the pig-headed decision of a police magistrate who, with his head full of his own legal knowledge, might be more likely to send an innocent man to prison. Such an instance occurred the other day. Now, I would appeal to the country Gentlemen in this House. There is a newspaper known to many of them, with which I do not often happen to agree—I mean The Standard; but in an article on local taxation and local self-government, the writer expresses my views in words I could not hope to improve, so that I will take the liberty of reading an extract. The writer says—

carried beyond a certain point, honeycombs the life of a nation and destroys its political energies. But the constant outcry against local burdens must, if successful, tend to the establishment of centralization, and we would ask the English gentry and yeomanry fairly to consider whether the game is worth the candle, and whether they are not departing from their most honourable traditions in giving precedence over all considerations to the breeches pocket. If the provincial aristocracy of this country wish to retain their hold over the people and to continue to exercise the influence which has been exercised by their forefathers from time immemorial, they will be careful of making too great an outcry about the incidence of taxation, against which they have many sets-off, though undoubtedly it is quite true that it may press upon them here and there with undue severity.”

I will only add my hope that the English country gentlemen will continue to exercise that influence exercised by their forefathers, and that they will not abdicate that honourable position in which they employ so much time upon public matters for the public good, for the sake of saving a paltry penny or two in the pound. In conclusion, I have to apologize for the length of time into which my remarks have run, and I beg to move the Resolution which stands in my name.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “this House, whilst recognizing the necessity of measures being adopted to secure economy and efficiency in the management of Prisons, is of opinion that it would be inexpedient to transfer the control and management of Prisons from Local Authorities to the Secretary of State,”—(Mr. Rylands,)

—instead thereof.

SIR MASSEY LOPES, having taken considerable interest in this question, wished to say a few words in support of the second reading of this Bill. The hon. Member opposite had been one of the strongest opponents of the reform of local taxation and grievances; it was refreshing to hear his hon. Friend advocating the cause of country gentlemen and of the unpaid magistracy, but from the tenour of his speech, he strongly suspected that he spoke more in the interests of unrated property than in those of local self-government. Turning to the proposals of the Government, he wished to point out that there were three cardinal reasons which would recommend them to the approbation of the House and of the Government. In the first place, those proposals would insure a much more efficient management of our prisons; secondly, they would tend very much to secure greater economy; and, thirdly, they would do what was an act of justice to those who had been unduly charged with the cost of prison administration. The main evils under the existing system which the present measure sought to put an end to were the want of uniformity of the management of our gaols, the excessive number of those establishments, and the extravagant cost at which they were kept up. The gist of the recommendations of the Lords' Committee of 1863 was simply that a uniform system should be adopted in our prisons with regard to labour, diet, and discipline. The Act of 1865, which was based upon recommendations of that Committee, was, no doubt, a great improvement upon our previous regulations, because it established a system where previously none had existed. What had that Act effected? It had, in the first place, substantially handed over all management of prisons and the power of making regulations with regard to discipline, diet, management, and construction to the Secretary of State for the Home Department. It had also imposed various very strict statutory obligations on prison authorities, or the Visiting Justices. The effect of the Act, therefore, was to transfer from the local authorities the powers which they had previously exercised with regard to our prisons to the Secretary of State. The great blot in that Act, however, was that while it gave the Secretary of State enormous powers on those points, it omitted to give him any means of enforcing his regulations, except by withholding the Government grant. Thus the Secretary of State had power by that Act to close defective prisons or those which did not comply with his regulations; but he had no power to compel the neighbouring authorities to receive the prisoners who were in the prison it was intended to close. And, again, while it gave him power to close unnecessary prisons, it gave him none to compel the neighbouring prison authorities to unite in maintaining one such establishment between them. But the great practical defect of the Act had always been felt to be that the local ratepayers, and not the State, paid the cost of keeping up these establishments. A difficulty had always presented itself in interfering with the organization and management of our prisons by the Secretary of State, because such a small part of their cost was defrayed out of Imperial taxation. The hon. Member opposite had objected to the prisons being taken from under local control; but he should like to know what local control the ratepayers now had over those establishments or over their management and cost. The very small amount of local control which still remained was exercised by the magistrates, who were the representatives, not of the ratepayers, but of the Crown. Magistrates were in no respect responsible to ratepayers; they were the instruments of the Legislature; their appointment and authority emanated from the State. In his opinion, there was not the slightest ground of complaint against the magistrates for the way in which they had exercised the power entrusted to them in this respect. They had performed their functions in a way that had been of the greatest benefit to others, and which had reflected the highest honour upon themselves; but, at the same time, he could not admit for a moment that the magistrates could fairly be described as local authorities. Then, again, the power was not exercised, by the magistrates as a body, but by a few of them who were appointed to the office of Visiting Justices. It was not proposed that their jurisdiction should be altogether superseded, they would still retain a great portion of their authority; it could not be expected that the Government would defray the whole cost out of Imperial funds, and leave the management where it was. To hand over Imperial funds to local authorities over which Government had only a limited control, would possibly lead to great extravagance—there would be no security for better management or increased efficiency. Local relief would be unaccompanied by any reform. The hon. Member had referred to the loss of dignity which the country gentlemen would incur by surrendering this power; but he gave the magistrates credit for too much character and patriotism to suppose that they would regard their dignity as lowered by being deprived of the petty patronage which enabled them to appoint a few prison officers. Looking at the subject as a question of principle, he had always understood that there ought to be no local taxation without local management and local control over the expenditure, and he should like to know in what respect the ratepayer exercised either of those powers over our prisons at the present time. He thought it was a sound constitutional maxim, that those who provided the money should have some voice in its expenditure; that taxation and representation should go hand in hand, but in this case the principle was entirely ignored. He had always been a strong advocate of local self-government; but he felt that since the Act of 1865 all local control of our prisons had been taken away. The hon. Member opposite, therefore, was fighting for the shadow after the substance had been lost. He had always been of opinion that it would be impossible to change the system without changing the administrators. The reforms which were necessary for the better management of prisons were far greater and more comprehensive than ever could be carried out by the dispersed and independent action of local authorities; they never could be effected by the voluntary agreement of one Board with another. In the majority of cases the local authorities had no bond of union, and it would be quite impossible for them voluntarily to come to the adoption of any uniform system. To make the prison system efficient you must have uniformity. He did not think that uniformity was possible without absolute control on the part of a central authority, and such absolute authority ought, in his opinion, to be vested in the Secretary of State for the Home Department. At present his authority was a divided one, and as opposed to justices, was conflicting. Under the present system there were too many separate jurisdictions and too great a division of authority for it to be expected that an uniform mode of dealing with the question could be arrived at. Each local jurisdiction had peculiar theories with respect to discipline, and therefore every prison had a separate system. The existing discrepancies in regard to diet, discipline, and the other details of prison management existed not alone in different parts of the country, but were to be found in prisons situate close to each other. Punishment of crime ought not to vary with local and personal fancies and theories, but should be precisely similar in every part of the country. The great fault was inequality and uncertainty; there was no common accord, no fixed principles. Hard labour meant very different things in different places. Two sentences, nominally alike, meant two very different things. Every county and borough might just as reasonably have separate criminal laws as have different modes of carrying out the sentences of the law. His hon. Friend the Member for Burnley had alluded to some of the advantages that had been set forth as likely to result from the passing of the present Bill; but he had failed to mention one or two of some importance—namely, the fact that under a system of prison management with a central authority there would be the means of securing the services of a trained and therefore more efficient and experienced class of officers. There would be the advantage of being able to group and classify prisoners, of devoting special prisons to special trades. Another important feature of the question was that while prison labour could not be profitably employed in small establishments, it could, in large prisons, be made to go very far towards paying the establishment charges. The earnings of prisoners in large and well-managed prisons went far to render these establishments self-supporting. There was great waste of public money from neglect of profitable prison labour. It was the only machinery to recoup the tax on the ratepayer. If the rogue did not work to maintain himself, honest men must work to maintain him. It was to be recommended not only on financial but moral considerations; it was a great moral motive power. Prison work was penal and deterrent, and at the same time reformatory, and if not remunerative, was demoralizing. His hon. Friend the Member for Burnley had laid before the House certain figures in reference to the cost of maintaining prisons; but, unfortunately, his averages had been calculated on the Returns of different years, and therefore they did not agree with those of his right hon.

Friend who had charge of the Bill. In the year 1874 the payments for prison officers' salaries amounted to £242,000, the average being one officer to every seven prisoners; if, as in our best managed prisons, the average was one officer to ten prisoners, only 1,800 officers, instead of 2,500, would be required, and this alone would be an enormous saving; but if the proposal contained in the Bill under discussion was adopted, and 60 prisons were abolished, almost half the salaries of the most highly paid among the officials would be saved. His right hon. Friend, in introducing the Bill, had, in his opinion, considerably over-estimated the additional cost to the State which the direct assumption of all prison charges would involve. His right hon. Friend's estimate was £285,000; but he calculated that, with good management and under a central system, prisoners could be kept at 1s. per day, and therefore that the net annual cost of maintaining them would be £178,000, instead of £285,000. The average annual number of prisoners was 18,000; at 1s. a-day the amount would be £328,000. If you deducted from this amount the profits from labour £100,000—which was at the rate of scarcely 4d. a-day for each prisoner—and also the present Government Grant of £85,000, and added the present annual cost of buildings, repairs, &c., £35,000, the additional annual cost to the State would be £178,000 only; and it must be remembered that in some of our best managed prisons at Salford, Durham, &c., the prisoners did not cost more than 1s. per diem, and we only paid that amount for our Army and Navy prisoners. A comparison of the cost of management in several prisons disclosed an anomalous state of things that could not continue if the Government Bill was adopted. In Sandwich there was one gaol for 3,000 population, in Grantham one for 5,000, in Staffordshire one for 858,000, and in Liverpool one for 500,000. But as regarded prisoners and officers the disparity was greater still. In Buckingham there were three prisoners and four officers; in Tiverton two prisoners and five officers; in Poole five prisoners and four officers; and in Stamford five prisoners and five officers. There were other anomalies which he desired to point out. There were five prisons in Devonshire where two would be sufficient. The county prison was in Exeter. The prison at Plymouth contained an average number of 31 prisoners, at a net cost of £31; that of Devonport 27 prisoners, at an average cost of £25 14s.; that of Barnstaple nine prisoners; and that of Tiverton an average of two prisoners, at a net cost of £103. It was impossible to deny that a large reduction of prisons might be made. Instead of having 116 prisons, 81 county and 35 borough, or one for 200,000 inhabitants, there might be only 60 to 64—or one prison to 350,000 inhabitants, and the prisons need not be then more than 15 miles apart. With an average annual number of 18,000 prisoners, he found that in 1874 62 prisons contained 15,100 prisoners, while the remaining 54 prisons contained only 2,500 prisoners; there were eight prisons in Lincolnshire, and only 231 prisoners altogether in them; one prison would accommodate every prisoner easily; each prisoner in the county prison there cost £114. There were two prisons in Leicester, the county and the borough; each contained the same number of prisoners—namely, 86, and yet, in the same town and with the same number of prisoners, a prisoner in the county prison cost £47 net, and only earned 15s., while a prisoner in the borough prison cost only £27 net, and earned 64s. He proposed to say a word as to the injustice of charging the ratepayers so large a proportion of prison expenses. The injustice in his view was patent and palpable. The punishment and repression of crime were questions of national importance; they were the functions of national government. There was no duty more Imperial. It was just as much the duty of the State to punish wrongdoers at home as to punish our enemies abroad. What were the primary necessities of every civilized nation? They were the protection of life, the security of property, and the preservation of law and order. The machinery of justice was carried on not for the benefit of any particular locality, but for that of the county at large. Offences were not limited to any particular locality—they were breaches of the Imperial law, and therefore, a charge put upon a particular locality for the repression of crime was unjust. The penalties inflicted should be at the cost of the country, not of the locality. It was most unjust to particular localities to mulct them with the cost of imprisoning a criminal whose crime was against society generally. Why, then, should one-seventh only of the income ability of the country be charged with the cost of the repression of crime? Why should not personal property pay its quota to punishment of crime? It received more protection than houses or lands. It was movable, and excited the cupidity of the criminal classes more than houses or lands did. They could not be taken away; but it was the property in them and the persons on them that required protection. The cost, therefore, of the repression of crime ought to be placed proportionately upon all descriptions of property. It should be borne by persons, rather than by lands and houses; that could only be done by charging it on Imperial funds to which all persons and property contributed a fair proportion. A considerable proportion of the cost of the administration of justice was already paid by the Imperial Exchequer—the salaries of the Judges, the expense of the Courts, and the whole expenses of Army and Navy prisoners. The principle, therefore, was admitted. More than that, the State paid the whole expense of convicts. What, he asked, was the reason that in the case of a man sentenced to five years' penal servitude the cost of his punishment was charged to the community, whereas in every case short of five years the cost was charged to the locality? Why should the incidence of the cost of punishment be made to depend on the gravity of the crime or the duration of the punishment? Local taxation reformers were not asking for exceptional relief, for it must be remembered that real property contributed its quota to Imperial taxation in respect to prisons, besides the exceptional charge which it bore at present. His hon. Friend had referred to the relief he had had; but what relief had been afforded during the last 20 years to ratepayers, except that recently given by the present Government? There had been within the last 20 years remissions of Imperial taxation to the amount of £28,000,000, of local taxation—previous to the accession of the present Government, nil. During the same time there had been additions to Imperial taxation to the extent of about 10 per cent. Local taxation had been increased by 100 per cent. In fact, during the last 40 years, with the exception of the small amount given in 1846, no relief of local burdens of any kind had been afforded. On the contrary, new charges had been continually imposed. There was not a single reform, social or sanitary, which was thought to be for the benefit of the country at large which had not been placed on local taxation. Let them take the case of education alone. They all remembered how much was said when the Chancellor of the Exchequer added 1*d.* to the Income Tax; but what sympathy or consideration was shown for the ratepayers when a charge for education which, he believed, would amount to 6*d.* in the pound was added to the rates? The increase of the income tax they could get rid of; but the 6*d.* for education would remain. It would become a rent charge—a permanent income tax. It was said that the remission proposed by the Bill was that of an old charge. No doubt it was; but how many new charges had been imposed? Again, it was urged that the charge was necessary to secure local supervision. For this charge he contended there was no such reason. Local supervision was not necessary, and therefore it was desirable and expedient to take off the charge. And what did it amount to? He was, he believed, overstating it when he said that the maximum of the relief would not amount to more than £400,000, or less than 1*d.* in the pound, for 1*d.* on the net rateable value produced about £185,000. Did the House grudge so small an amount of relief to those upon whom they had recently imposed so many new burdens? He would only say, in conclusion, that under the present system there was great waste of power; that the variations in prison system was absurd, anomalous, and most unjustifiable; and that it was evident that if the cost was placed upon the Imperial Exchequer there would be reduced expenses and greater efficiency, and that great gain would accrue to the public from the direct assumption of the cost and control of the prisons by the State. The proposal of the Government was not only expedient, but it was equitable, and economical. The charge, he did not hesitate to say, belonged distinctly to the State. By the State it ought to be controlled, and to the State it ought to be transferred.

MR. EVANS said, that the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had described himself in this matter as a strong Conservative, and the Home Secretary as a Radical Reformer who had brought in a Bill of a revolutionary character. He did not know how this might be; but he congratulated the right hon. Gentleman upon having the courage of his convictions. The Party at present in Opposition had hitherto been twitted with advocating measures of centralization, but now a scheme of that character emanated from the other side. Far from complaining of this, he heartily approved of the Bill, because he believed it would be for the benefit of the country, and therefore hoped the House would pass it. He had no doubt his constituents would be glad to be relieved from the great expense of prisons. There were many precedents in favour of relieving local taxation from this burden. The trial of prisoners, the prevention of crime, and the maintenance of convict prisons were already borne by the State, and why should not the maintenance of prisoners in gaols be also regarded as an Imperial question? The relief to local rates, although important, was not, however, the greatest merit of this Bill. He believed that by such a system alone as was now proposed could real uniformity of prison management and punishment in the gaols throughout the country be secured. His hon. Friend (Mr. Rylands) was quite mistaken if he supposed that by the Act of 1865 uniformity had been obtained. On the contrary, in spite of that Act, the greatest possible diversity existed. Some magistrates thought remunerative labour a good thing; others that useless labour was more deterrent. In one place there was one dietary, and elsewhere another. Sometimes the separate system and at other times the silent system was adopted. He was not finding fault with the local authorities, and in his own county (Derbyshire) they had done their best to make the gaols efficient; but as opinions differed it was inevitable that gaols should be managed in different ways throughout the country. He might claim to be pretty well acquainted with the wishes, tastes, and fancies of the prisoners in our gaols, and he could assure the House that the discrimination they showed in their appreciation of different prisons was almost beyond belief. Some five or six years ago a man was tried before him for stealing fowls, in Derbyshire. Being an old offender, he was intimately acquainted with the interior of all the gaols in that and the neighbouring county. After the theft, which he had committed near the boundary of the counties of Leicester and Derby, he went to a furnace—for it was a cold winter's night—and there cooked one of the fowls, then ate half of it, and fell asleep. Early the next morning a policeman found him fast asleep, with the remains of his spoil scattered around him. He shook him by the collar and said—"I take you in custody on the charge of stealing these fowls." The man rubbed his eyes, and the very first words he said were—"Do tell me in what county I am? In Leicestershire or Derbyshire?" "In Derbyshire, to be sure," said the constable. The man instantly replied—"Thank God for that." The hon. Member for Leicester, sitting opposite, would no doubt be pleased with that answer. As one of the magistrates of Derbyshire he (Mr. Evans) confessed he felt humiliated. They had been racking their brains to make their prisons as unpleasant to criminals as possible, yet here was a man who thanked God that he was going to Derby instead of Leicester Gaol. Now, his desire was that there should be a most unpleasant and disagreeable uniformity and monotony in the gaols throughout the country. These "light-fingered gentry" who lived upon the public ought no longer to speculate as to which gaol they should be sent to, or what form of punishment they would have to undergo. So important was this uniformity that if the Bill secured that alone it would be a very valuable measure. He was not quite so sanguine as the Home Secretary as to the diminution of expense under the Bill, because when the magistrates of his county wished to reduce expenditure, the Home Office and the Inspector of Prisons took a line which rendered it necessary to augment it. He agreed with his hon. Friend that questions of county expenditure would very soon have to be settled by Financial Boards. Many years ago it was said that that question was a monopoly of the Liberal Party, and he had on many occasions raised a cheer from his constituents in advocating such a change; but it was impossible to make political capital out of it at the last Election, for he found that his opponent was as strong on the point as he was. He believed that they must before long entrust the management of county expenditure to Boards elected by the ratepayers. He had, however, always doubted whether a Financial Board would be so good a body as the magistrates to manage the gaols; but now that the prisons would be managed by the Government that difficulty would be got rid of, and a County Boards Bill would be more easily carried. He thanked the Home Secretary for bringing in a Bill which was bold and sweeping, but which he believed would be exceedingly advantageous to the country.

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT regretted that he was obliged to speak strongly against the Bill. He had had the greatest confidence in the Home Secretary and for what he had done at the Home Office; but on this occasion he neither liked his policy nor the reasons he had given for introducing the Bill. If uniformity in the management and the abolishing of certain of our gaols was all the Bill proposed to do he should be prepared to adopt it, but he had other objections to the measure. He objected to it because it was a direct blow against the jurisdiction of the local magistrates of the country, because it was a direct blow against local self-government; he objected to its confiscating character, and to its centralizing tendency. There was no man who knew more the value of local magistrates, or who ought to do so, than the Home Secretary, because he had been a magistrate for many years, and had been chairman of quarter sessions. He knew exactly their capabilities, and that they had endeavoured honestly to do the duties that had been reposed in them; but this was the greatest blow that the magistrates, as a body, had ever received, and he was indeed surprised it should come from his right hon. Friend. As the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) had reminded them that the Government paid the Judges, he could not help seeing in that remark a suggestion that they might have a magistracy also paid by the Government. The hon. Baronet shook his head. Then having taken the management of the prisons out of the hands of the magistrates, why should not the Government take the management of the police also out of the hands of the magistrates, because the two ought to go together. For the sake of the trivial saving that was promised, ought we to depart from old usage and adopt centralization, which would weaken those local institutions to which we owed so much of our national life and greatness? If the Returns for the gaols were analyzed, and Salford, Winchester, or any gaol might be taken, it would be found that five-sixths of the prisoners were in gaol for short periods, periods under two months, and only one-sixth for what might be denominated long periods; indeed, nine-tenths were for periods under three months and one-tenth only for longer periods. Were these short-term prisoners to be moved about all over the country; and, if so, who was to bear the expense of their conveyance? Where were prisoners to be remanded to, and were new police cells to be built for remanded prisoners, and that with the chance of their being confiscated without notice? They might feel sure that after this change had been effected others would follow. Could it be true that the Home Secretary contemplated the confiscation of £3,000,000 of the property of the ratepayers? The gaol at Salford had cost £180,000; it had been furnished with the most modern appliances and all those deterrent means that were thought to be necessary; it provided accommodation for 1,100 prisoners, the average number for five years having been 600; and now it was to be taken from the ratepayers and confiscated to the Government. Surely that could not be right. The town of Bolton, which had sent its prisoners to Salford under arrangements by which it contributed towards the cost of the gaol, was to be called upon to find accommodation for 100 prisoners at a cost of £120 a cell, which would involve an expenditure of £12,000. Was it wise and prudent to impose such a burden on the town under the circumstances? and if Bolton was to pay for the accommodation provided for it surely it was only just the ratepayers who built and provided extra accommodation for Bolton should have the benefit of the money so paid by Bolton. No doubt there had been anomalies in prison management; but the Act of 1865 had gone a long way towards remedying them, and an amending Act would have done all that it now required. In this way the extra cost of building could have been avoided. A more or less uniform diet could have been enforced, but absolute uniformity was impossible, because different localities were inhabited by different classes, some who lived high and fast, and others who lived low and poorly, and the two could not be treated exactly alike. The Government lunatic asylums did not compare favourably with others in the cost of the management, and he feared that the results of the management of prisons by the Government would be disappointing. Would the necessity for and the cost of improvements be as carefully considered by Commissioners as they were by magistrates? As to prison labour, that could easily have been made more uniform if the Home Secretary had exercised the power he possessed, or had taken a little more if he required it. It was right the criminal classes should expect equal punishment everywhere, and that could have been accomplished by more efficient inspection without centralization. Magistrates could not continue to take as much interest in prison management under Commissioners as they did now. By one clause in that Bill his right hon. Friend, knowing that he had a large majority to support him, was prepared to say that no further contracts should be entered into or anything done in respect to gaols until that Bill came into operation—namely, on the 1st of April, 1877. That, he thought, rather a strong measure. If that Prisons Bill became law, the next thing would be the transfer of the lunatic asylums to the President of the Local Government Board. He was told that in some places the authorities had taken fright at that Bill, and that works had been stopped. There was to be a great meeting on that Bill to-morrow, and the Home Secretary ought to have allowed the measure to be considered in the country before pressing it to a second reading. He asked whether they were going to give up all their independence and submit to centralisation for the sake of local taxation relief of £150,000? He was, he said, willing to accept from the Government the amount it might be pleased to give them, as long as it left them the control they possessed, but he was unwilling to accept a single farthing from it if it took the control away from them. The Home Secretary might increase the sum he gave the localities for the maintenance of prisoners and still leave the prisons in their hands. Again, the patronage which the Bill would give the Government was a dangerous thing; and he doubted, moreover, whether it would be possible to find men more capable than the governors of gaols in England generally were of doing the duty required of them. That measure was a revolution, not a reform. It would go a long way to destroy that interest in county management which was taken by so many gentlemen. Under those circumstances he had asked himself what he ought to do. He might vote for the Bill; that he could not do. He might walk out of the House without voting, but after what he had said that would be cowardly. He was driven, therefore, to vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Burnley. [SIR WILLIAM EDMONSTONE: No.] But he should. The hon. and gallant Member had not a pistol that night, and he (Sir Walter Barttelot) might fire his shot as he thought best. He appealed to his right hon. Friend not to press the second reading of the Bill. It had only been before the country a fortnight, the quarter sessions were coming on next week, and until the opinion of the country was pronounced it was neither wise, prudent, nor statesmanlike to press the measure forward. When the Bill had been thoroughly discussed by the country, and if it was accepted by the country, the Government would then have an easy task in passing it.

MR. NORWOOD quite agreed with the hon. Baronet who had just spoken, and cordially endorsed every word he had uttered, and more especially his condemnation of the way in which the Bill was being hurried forward. He had that day presented a Petition against the measure from the mayor and corporation of the borough he had the honour to represent (Hull), which had been agreed to at a meeting held yesterday, which protested strongly against the injustice of the measure, and pointed out that in their case it would amount to confiscation and robbery. The Home Secretary had claimed a saving of £100,000 from the adoption of his scheme; but he was confident that not even that small amount of economy would be effected by it when they came to pay the salaries of the proposed Commissioners and Assistant Commissioners, and also the allowances to those officers who were to be pensioned off. He believed the unpaid magistrates, whose authority was threatened by the Bill, performed their duties on the whole exceedingly well. To a certain extent, the liberties of this country were bound up in the present system. If a prisoner were ill-treated now while in prison, he could easily obtain redress; but if he were sent 100 miles away from his locality, it would be very difficult for him in many cases to communicate with his friends, and he would be almost entirely at the mercy of his gaolers. The principal consideration which he had to submit to the House, however, was a financial one. The gaol of Hull happened to be a new one, built on a very expensive site, and worked on the most approved system. Hull being a growing town, the local authorities had very wisely provided accommodation considerably in excess of their immediate requirements. The result was, that although the daily average of prisoners at Hull in 1873 and 1874 was only 235, there were no fewer than 389 cells. The gaol cost in building £83,000, and there was at the present time a mortgage debt of over £40,000 in connection with it. If the Government scheme were carried out, therefore, Hull would be placed at a very serious disadvantage. A town which did not provide sufficient prison accommodation would only be called upon to contribute at the rate of £120 per cell. The contribution paid by Hull in such a case would only amount to £28,200. Yet the Government proposed to confiscate at Hull buildings and land which were worth £83,000, and on which rested the mortgage debt already mentioned. He could not believe that the right hon. Gentleman had contemplated such a case as that of Hull in framing his measure. They had sufficient experience of Government management to beware of its further extension. He did not know a single Department that was not managed in the most expensive manner. He had voted for the acquisition of the telegraphs; but if the vote was asked for again, he should certainly hesitate very much before giving it. The Bill would throw well-managed, moderately managed, and badly-managed prisons into hotch-potch, to the grievous injury of the best-managed and the great advantage of the worst-managed gaols. Again, the Bill would diminish the inducement now felt by the magistrates to repress crime, and it would place sober localities on a level with drunken ones. Then centralization itself was a dangerous step. On the whole, he believed the Bill would be unfortunate in its results, and he hoped the Government would re-consider, at all events, some of its provisions.

MR. RODWELL remarked that it could not fail to be gratifying to the Justices to hear the compliments which were being paid on all sides as to their usefulness. With regard to this Bill, he must say that, on the grounds that it secured uniformity in discipline and punishment in our gaols, and relief to local taxation of the burdens of which they had long complained, he gave it his cordial support. He demurred entirely to those statements which seemed to make it appear that this system of centralization was entirely unknown. He believed this Bill was only an extension of the principle introduced into the Act of 1865. That measure had proved a complete failure, and he denied the proposition that all that was now required was to amend it; for in his opinion it was hopeless to secure uniformity and economy in management while so many persons had limited control, subject to the superior control of the Home Secretary. When he was told that if this measure was passed the visiting magistrates would feel so hurt that they would become negligent of their magisterial duties, he could not accept such a view of the case. On the contrary, he believed that if their power was still more crippled, they would be still found ready to perform their duties in the detection and punishment of crime. As regarded the argument in respect to centralization, he would ask what were the powers of the visiting magistrates under the existing law? This Bill was only carrying out the principle acted upon since 1865, and he believed the only mode in which they could accomplish this was by placing the power in the hands of the Home Secretary in the manner proposed by this Bill. He was not surprised at the notion of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), that this was an interference with the legitimate duties of the Justices; but the hon. Member would find, if he inquired, that in every single thing connected with the management of a gaol they could not stir one step without the authority of the Home Secretary. He would a hundred times rather conduct the business of a gaol, as a Visiting Justice having some controlling power over him, clearly defined and settled, than be wearied and sidged by continual appeals to authority at headquarters. There was nothing more perplexing and embarrassing than to be told by the Clerk of the Peace—"You cannot do this without sending to the Secretary of State." If this Bill pass, the duties of the Home Office would be strictly defined, and the duties of the Visiting Justices would be strictly defined. He was surprised to hear it said the Visiting Justices would have nothing to do—that they would be superseded by these Commissioners. As far as he could understand this Bill it meant no such thing. They continued now to the rules made by the Secretary of State, and if they were provided the privilege of selecting the gaol and those he should be allowed to see the gaol, the Home Office had no right to interfere. Then as to the gaol, would it be left in the hands of the Government, then in the hands of the magistrates? The speaker said he said that many things would be put in the Bill, and would be subject to the control of the Home Office, and he was sure that the Bill would be a great improvement on the present state of the law.

County Lunatic Asylum; but the circumstances of the two institutions were so entirely distinct that the comparison was a fallacious one. It had been said that the question had not been discussed in the country. It might not have been discussed at quarter sessions; but for some time this question of local taxation with reference to prison charges had long been discussed, and if he had seen one article in the public journals, he had seen hundreds. For anyone to urge that this Bill was to be delayed because the feeling of the country was unknown upon the subject was an argument which, under the circumstances, he could not at all understand. If anyone went down to any district and told the people—“This measure will save you $\frac{1}{2}$ d. or 1d. in the pound per annum in your rates, and the only sacrifice you will have to make will be to transfer certain powers into the hands of the Secretary of State or give him direct powers where at present he has indirect powers, to carry out the discipline of our gaols,” he was sure they would find very few people who would not be in favour of the proposal. It was said the next thing that would go would be the police; but at the present moment he was not prepared to say that if the Government took the course any law would be done. He did not see what centralization there was there. The hon. Member for Bathurst and his hon. and gallant friend said that would lead to stipendiary magistrates. He denied this. The only way the reason why the plan of the Bill was proposed but stipendiary magistrates would be an enormous increase in expense. The commission which was now before the House as was far from correct. In the whole, he had no objection to the Bill interfering with the prerogatives and duties of the Justices, and he did not believe there was any objection shown upon them. The Bill would be carried by a large majority and become the law of the land.

Mr. TROTTEN explained the Government's position and a thorough discussion of the report of his son and daughter followed. The son sat down. The father, who might be termed "the old man," stated that in reason he approved the war because it would save him three farthings in the pound. [Mr. RODWELL: I did not say that.] At all events, such was the effect of his hon. and learned Friend's argument. He (Mr. Dodson) could not agree with his hon. and learned Friend that this Bill was merely an extension of the principle of the Act of 1865. The principle of that Bill was that the Secretary of State should have certain powers of supervision and control; but under this Bill the powers of the Visiting Justices were virtually put an end to. His hon. and learned Friend might as well say that cutting a man's throat was only an extension of the act of shaving. He looked upon this Bill as a material interference with local self-government. But, although he was an advocate of local self-government, he was not such a fanatical supporter of that system as not to admit that there were cases in which centralization might not be desirable. He made this admission to the Home Secretary—that if there were any matters to be taken into the hands of the Government, prisons and lunatic asylums might fairly be so considered. But the Government had exposed themselves to the strictures made on this Bill by the course they had adopted with reference to local taxation. If they had shown any indication of a settled policy in regard to that subject; if the House could see any disposition on the part of the Government to deal on principle with this question; if they saw the Government centralizing in one direction and decentralizing in another, they might be prepared to approach the consideration of this Bill in a more favourable spirit. But, while this was undeniably a measure of centralization, magistrates, in their capacity of Visiting Justices, having authority and control over prisons, were lowered to the position of mere honorary reporters to the Government. The hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to him to have misunderstood the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot) when he attributed to him the opinion that the magistrates would, if this Bill passed, neglect the other duties. Nothing could be further from his hon. and gallant Friend's mind than to convey such an impression as that. [Sir WALTER BARTTELOT: Hear, hear!] All he wished to convey to the House was that they would not for the future feel the same interest they had hitherto felt in the proper administration of the prisons. Under Clause 11, certain shreds of power as to visiting and reporting on prisons were left to them, and it would be well if those shreds of power did not bring them into collision with the Assistant Commissioners, who were to have similar powers. No one could regard the concentration of power and patronage which this Bill placed in the hands of a Minister as a matter of indifference. Already they had a large and increasing number of Commissioners and Inspectors. Every other man one met was a Commissioner or Inspector, and this Bill enabled the Home Secretary to create a Board of five Commissioners, with an indefinite number of Assistant Commissioners. All the appointments in existing gaols were transferred to the Home Secretary, except those who were described as subordinate officers in the Act of 1865. The number of persons who were not subordinate officers was very considerable. There were 149 gaolers, 132 chaplains, 118 surgeons, 111 matrons—in all 510 persons. There were besides these nearly 2,000 subordinates, whose appointments would rest with the Commissioners. Directly or indirectly that Bill would place in the hands of the Home Secretary the appointment of upwards of 2,500 persons. Besides this, there were 1,700 appointments in convict prisons which were under the patronage of the Home Secretary, and thus he would have the patronage of upwards of 4,000 appointments. It had been suggested that the second reading of this Bill should be deferred till after the quarter sessions had met, and there was much force in the reply of the Prime Minister that it would be instructive to the magistrates if the House discussed the Bill on the second reading. He thought a course might be adopted which would combine both advantages. The Bill should be discussed as far as the House thought fit to-night, and then the debate might be adjourned till the quarter sessions were over. The Bill would extinguish one of the principal powers of the magistrates who had discharged their trust faithfully and well, and this part of the Bill should not be affirmed until the magistrates had had an opportunity of considering the matter. The hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes), whose voice had, after a long interval of silence, been once more heard in that House, speaking with his old force and ability on the subject of local taxation and the grievances of the ratepayers, had said that the blots in the present system were want of uniformity and extravagant expenditure. No doubt the want of uniformity was a defect; but it might be remedied by a measure less sweeping than the present one, which if it had been introduced by the late Government would have been described as an heroic measure. The local ratepayer was to be relieved of £400,000 of expenditure, and the general taxpayer was to be burdened to the extent of £300,000. The hon. Baronet (Sir Massey Lopes) had strongly insisted that the protection of the police and the punishment of crime was exercised mostly in respect of personal property, and that therefore personal property should be called on to pay. Both real and personal property, however, would contribute to the £300,000. It was said that there would be a net saving of £100,000, derived partly from the suppression of a number of small gaols, the concentration of prisoners within fewer walls and under a smaller staff of officials, and partly by the increased earnings of the prisoners. This saving, however, would depend not on the Bill, but on the firmness with which the Home Secretary for the time being exercised the powers of retrenchment and of regulation which would be conferred on him. One supporter and another of the Government would represent to him that a particular prison should not be suppressed. With regard to the reduction of the number of prisons, he might observe that the 27th and the 42nd clauses, taken together, provided for the maintenance of one prison in each county. Consequently, the Home Secretary would be bound to maintain such small prisons as existed at Oakham, in Huntingdonshire, and in several Welsh counties. There were many county prisons in which there were very few prisoners. The £50,000, therefore, which was to be derived from the suppression of small prisons would be, to say the least, doubtful. As to the £50,000 additional to be got from the earnings of prisoners, he doubted whether the Government management would be so superior as to secure this additional sum.

Mr. Dodson

In the convict prisons there were 10,000 prisoners who earned £200,000 a-year; but that was the estimated value of their labour upon public works, and not money realized from the sale of their work. Convicts were also mostly in prison for long periods, so that they could be trained to work effectually. In the local prisons 18,000 prisoners only earned £50,000 a-year. The House must remember that the majority of the prisoners in those gaols were only under sentence for short terms, and could not therefore be taught a trade. Did the Home Secretary hope that the Government officials would make better salesmen than the local authorities? He feared, too, that in disposing of the mats produced by the prisoners the Government would be told that they were competing with "honest labour," and that this objection might lead to serious inconvenience—for example, on the eve of a General Election. The Home Secretary was sanguine that he would be able to reduce the cost of maintaining the prisoners. According to the judicial statistics of 1874, the average cost of a convict appeared to be £33 a-year, and deducting the labour, value £20, the net annual cost was £13, while the cost of a prisoner in local gaols was stated by the right hon. Gentleman to be £27 or £28. In prisons, however, where the convicts were not engaged upon public works—as at Pentonville, Millbank, and Woking—they cost as much as in local prisons under local management. Some explanation should be afforded on these points, and he hoped that the Government would consent to adjourn the debate, so that the subject might be considered at quarter sessions before the House was called upon to affirm the principle of the Bill.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he thought that the details mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman were rather questions for Committee. Of the 118 prisons throughout England and Wales there were 20 with an average of only nine prisoners each, while each prison had four or five officials, and 24 more prisons had an average of only 22 or 23 prisoners. These facts of themselves afforded almost a sufficient justification for the Bill. It was in 1823 that an Act was passed by Sir Robert Peel calling on each county to provide a prison for itself and to appoint Visiting Justices. All the Acts on the subject of prisons passed since 1823—and they were many—had been entirely in the direction of inducing the prison authorities to diminish the number of prisons. No doubt originally every man committed to prison was committed to the prison of the county where the offence had been done. But within the last 25 or 26 years Acts were passed authorizing persons to be committed to some other prison besides that of the county, and in that way some of the expenses entailed on counties and boroughs were diminished, those who were not inclined to incur of themselves the cost of building a prison, making certain contributions to other prisons, in proportion to the number of prisoners committed. It had been complained by a large number of Members on both sides that an enormous amount of additional responsibility and expense was imposed on the local authorities by modern legislation. In this very Session there were five or six Bills conferring larger powers on local authorities, and requiring larger contributions from them. The hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot) said that if they began by taking the prisons they might continue the work by taking the police. But was there not a time when a great outcry arose among the country gentlemen that they should be called upon to bear the burden and expense of the police in the rural districts? The truth was that it was according to human nature that when a power was once acquired an outcry was sure to be raised when it was attempted to remove it. In proof of this he might refer to the boroughs, which fought so hardly when their municipal privileges were attacked, either as regarded their prison, police, or magisterial jurisdiction. Magistrates would have quite enough to occupy the whole of their spare time in attending to the various new duties imposed upon them, if relieved from the task of looking after the local prisons. And apart from the question of economy, which should not be disregarded, if we could diminish the number of gaols and insure a uniform system of regulations, so as to make punishment really deterrent, by that means alone we should effect an object which would be of the greatest benefit to the nation. He understood the object of the Bill to be not that there should be one prison in each county, but one to be fixed in each locality according to the amount of crime, and he could not help thinking that under its operation a great saving would be effected, and a public advantage gained.

MR. COLE said, he was greatly disappointed at the character of the Bill. It did nothing with respect to the great question of industrial labour, leaving the Prisons' Act of 1865 untouched as to this, and its simple object seemed to be centralization. It, moreover, furnished no means of knowing what gaols were proposed to be abolished, and it took out of the hands of the Justices the whole power which they possessed, except that of interfering in small matters of general discipline, such as authorizing the Governor of a gaol to put a prisoner in irons, and reporting to the Home Secretary. The abolition of too many of the borough gaols would create great inconvenience and also hardship to prisoners committed for trial. The expense, too, of the removal of prisoners to the county gaols instead of their committal to borough gaols would be great, and this expense would fall on the ratepayers. If a man were committed to a borough gaol he could send for his friends or his attorney; but if he were committed to a county gaol 100 miles off from the place where he lived, how could he consult his friends or his attorney? The Home Secretary proposed by uniform management to obtain a much larger sum from the industrial labour of prisoners than it yielded at present. How was that to be done? Under the Act of 1865 prisoners committed for any period not exceeding three months could not be put to industrial labour at all; and as to those who were sentenced to six months' hard labour, the first three months must be passed in the first class of hard labour under the Act of 1865—that was to say, in carrying shot from one end of the prison yard to the other, in grinding the winch, in going on the treadmill, or breaking stones. The Bill ought to deal with the question of industrial labour. The men who were sent to gaol were generally found to be extremely ignorant of handicraft labour. While they were in gaol they ought to receive instruction in some handicraft trade in order that when they left gaol they might have no difficulty in earning a living. He regretted extremely that this Bill had been pressed on before the meeting of magistrates at quarter sessions, and believed the Government would find there was a strong feeling against it in the country. As the measure was not comprehensive he should oppose it.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the Government had no reason to be dissatisfied with the course of the debate or to suppose that if the decision of the House on the second reading of the Bill should be deferred they would be in any worse position with regard to it than if the measure had passed this stage at an earlier period. An hon. Member said the Bill would so fetter by its restrictions the power of the Visiting Justices that practically there would be no use for them. The Visiting Justices were quite aware that their present powers were limited by the discretion of the Secretary of State. The Visiting Justices could go into and inspect private lunatic asylums; but they had only power to report to the Lunacy Commissioners the results of their observations. As to remunerative labour on the part of the criminals, that was a subject of great difficulty. By the system proposed in the Bill they would be able to teach the prisoners a variety of trades, and, taking the proposed scheme into consideration, be able to make criminal labour more productive. What, among other things, they asked the House to consider was the deterrent influence which the measure would in its operation have upon criminals. It would become a reformatory measure and a productive one. It was a measure which was worthy the most serious consideration of the House. The reduction of local taxation was a subject which many hon. Members were fond of bringing before the House, and it was a subject the importance of which he was fully prepared to admit. His own view of the question was that local reforms, regarded from a financial point of view, would become much more practicable after the management of prisons was taken out of the purview of local authorities. The power to which objection had been taken—namely, that of retaining one prison in each county, was practically a safeguard against the evil to which it was contended it would give rise. From the information which had been laid before the Home Secretary he could say that the proper selection of prisons would practically bring each within reasonable distance in each criminal jurisdiction, and that prisoners could be as easily remitted to those prisons as they now were to the existing prisons; it was only in the case of convicted prisoners that the powers of removal for the purpose of classification could be exercised. It had been urged more than once that night that the Secretary of State based his advocacy of the Bill on the ground of great economy, and figures had been largely quoted in reference to that subject; but they might take it for granted that there was a great discrepancy between the cost of prisoners in one prison and in another, but the average per head was about £35 a-year, and deducting the labour earnings of a convicted prisoner from the cost of his maintenance, it would reduce the latter to about £13, and wherever the labour test could be applied they would get the cost of maintenance of prisoners very considerably reduced. One of the effects of the Bill would, he believed, be not only a reduction of prisons, but also of the gaol staffs to a considerable amount. He was satisfied, speaking as a magistrate, and well acquainted with the feelings of the magistrates of England, that they would give their hearty co-operation to the Government in carrying out any arrangements that might be made for the management of the prisoners, just as they had co-operated with the Lunacy Commissioners, and as they had done in carrying out the regulations of quarter sessions. Believing that the Bill would work a great reform in the history of our criminal populations, and that it was a measure of long-called-for relief to local burdens, he thought the House would act wisely in giving the Bill a second reading.

Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Alderman Cotton.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it would be unreasonable to offer any objection to the adjournment of the debate. Other business having intervened, the House had not had a full night for the discussion of an important and interesting subject, and the Government would not, therefore, throw any obstacle in the way of the adjournment. With regard to the resumption of the debate, he wished to point out that to-morrow morning had been assigned to business which it would be inconvenient to alter. Next Monday had been appropriated to the Navy Estimates, and Thursday in next week had been given to the debate on the Irish Land Bill. There would not therefore, he presumed, be any opportunity of resuming the debate on the present Bill until the week following. In the absence of the Prime Minister he would not fix the day, but would move that the debate be adjourned until this day week, in order that the day for resuming the debate might then be named. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, when asked by an hon. Friend (Sir Walter Barttelot) to adjourn the second reading until after the quarter sessions, stated that he thought it would be more advantageous that it should be discussed in that House before quarter sessions than afterwards. He believed that the discussion of that night would very much assist those who might take an interest in the Bill at quarter sessions, and enable them to discuss with greater advantage the details of a measure which was of great importance to the country, and not to the magistrates principally, but with reference to the incidences of local burdens. Considering the important part magistrates had played in the past, and the important part he hoped they would continue to take in the future, the Government had no desire whatever to weaken their position, but every desire to secure their co-operation and assistance; and if the matter were fully looked into, it would be found that what the Bill did was mainly to relieve them from some of the difficulties incidental to their position. The debate might now be adjourned for a period which would enable quarter sessions to consider the measure.

MR. NEWDEGATE hoped that the debate would not be resumed until after next week, when the quarter sessions would generally be held throughout the country, and when many Members of the House would necessarily be absent who were directly interested in the question. He could state the bench of magistrates with which he was connected had taken precisely the views expressed by the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot).

MR. GOSCHEN asked the Home Secretary to lay on the Table of the House information respecting the computation of savings to be effected under the Bill, including superannuations and pensions.

MR. PAGET asked the Government to re-consider Clause 8 of the Bill, with a view to its modification, so as to give Visiting Justices the power of appointing subordinate officers, in order to give them control over those officials. He, however, approved of the Bill.

MR. PEASE asked the Home Secretary to lay on the Table of the House a schedule of the gaols that would probably be closed under the operations of the Bill.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked to have a day fixed for the further consideration of the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill, because, after next week, the Members of the Bar who were Members of that House would be away on circuit.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he would lay what information he could respecting what had been asked of him on the Table. He was sorry that, by the adjournment of the debate, he was then unable to give an answer to one or two points that had been raised in the course of the debate.

MR. WHITBREAD expressed a wish that the right hon. Gentleman would state the bases of the calculation according to which he expected to be able to maintain prisoners at £24 per head.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON urged the advantage of the calculations as to the saving that would be effected by the measure being presented to the House in a clear and intelligible form.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

EMPLOYERS LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO THEIR SERVANTS.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire whether it may be expedient to render masters liable for injuries occasioned to their servants by the negligent acts of certificated managers of collieries, managers, foremen, and others to whom the general control and superintendence of workshops and works is committed, and

PARLIAMENTARY AGENCY.

MOTION FOR A JOINT SELECT COMMITTEE.

LORD REDESDALE, in moving the appointment of a Select Committee to consider, jointly with a Select Committee of the Commons, the existing system of Parliamentary Agency, said, that at present there was practically no professional qualification required in the case of persons practising as Parliamentary agents, and much inconvenience and loss and delay resulted to those who were interested in Private Business before Parliament from the incompetency of some of those persons. In the year 1837 the other House made certain Rules respecting Parliamentary agents. They were to be personally responsible for the observance of the rules, orders, and practice of Parliament, and for the payment of all fees and charges; and no person was allowed to act as agent until he had subscribed a declaration to that effect; he might also be required to enter into a recognizance of £500 conditioned to observe this declaration; he was then registered in a book kept in the Private Bill Office, and was entitled to act as a Parliamentary agent. These rules gave some sort of security for the proper conduct of Parliamentary agents as regarded the other House, though there was none for their efficiency, which he hoped might be secured by proper rules to be adopted by both Houses on the recommendation from the Joint Committee he now sought to obtain. The noble Lord concluded by moving the appointment of a Select Committee, and the consequent Message to the Commons.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON expressed his concurrence in the Motion.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed to join with a Committee of the Commons to consider the expediency of making further regulations concerning the admission and practice of Parliamentary agents, and to report their opinion thereon:

The following Lords named members of the Committee:

M. Lansdowne.	L. Redesdale.
E. Doncaster.	L. Penrhyn.
E. Camperdown.

And a message sent to the Commons to acquaint them that this House has appointed a committee of five Lords to join with a committee of the Commons "To consider the expediency of making further regulations concerning the admission and practice of Parliamentary agents, and to report their opinion thereon;" and to request that the Commons will be pleased to appoint an equal number of members to be joined with the members of this House.

MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL—(No. 99.) (The Lord President.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that the object of the Bill, which had come up from the other House of Parliament after having been subjected to very careful consideration and amendment, was to provide additional security for the lives of our sailors from the avoidable risks which attended their calling. He was perfectly aware that in dealing with the matters embraced in this Bill—namely, the questions of unseaworthy ships and of overloading—the Government were only dealing with a part of a very large question; but that part was by no means an unimportant part, and they felt that it was better to confine themselves to it for the present rather than to extend the area and operation of the Bill to a large extent. Discipline, wages, advance notes, insurance, and other matters of a kindred character were branches of the question on which, no doubt, legislation was much needed; and he was far from saying that it would not be the duty of Her Majesty's Government to take them into consideration at a future time if they should be fortunate enough to carry through Parliament in the present Session the Bill which now stood before their Lordships for second reading. He was aware also that in the opinion of some persons it was advisable to consolidate all the Acts relating to Merchant Shipping; but he could not help thinking that a Bill by which that consolidation might be attempted—involving as it would the consideration of some 700 or 800 clauses—would open up many points on which great difference of opinion would be found to exist, and consequently that to embark in such an undertaking at present would be to seriously endanger the passing of any measure relating to the subject during the present Session. Their Lordships would bear in mind that though this Bill had been carried through the other House with all the despatch possible in so grave a matter, and on which there had been so many and such lengthened discussions, it was now the 23rd day of June when he was moving the second reading in their Lordships' House. Again, he thought he was quite justified in saying that no subject required greater caution in legislation than this of our Mercantile Marine, in which so many interests were mixed up, and which so concerned the trade and commerce of the country. Certain statistics would show their Lordships and the country the magnitude of the capital and labour embarked in our shipping trade. First as to the value of the Imports and Exports for the year:—In 1875 the total value of Imports and Exports into and from the United Kingdom was:—Imports—merchandise, £373,939,577; gold and silver, £33,264,789. Exports—merchandise, British and Irish produce, £223,465,963; Foreign and Colonial ditto, £58,146,360; gold and silver, £27,628,042. Total, £716,444,731. The total tonnage of shipping entered and cleared, with cargoes and in ballast at ports in the United Kingdom in the foreign trade and in the coasting trade was:—Foreign Trade—Entered, 19,039,928 tons cargo, 3,653,238 tons ballast—together, 22,693,163 tons; cleared, 20,413,739 tons cargo, 3,169,936 tons ballast—together, 23,583,675 tons. Coasting Trade—Entered, 22,944,265 tons cargo,

10,968,737 tons ballast — together, 33,913,002 tons; cleared, 20,674,934 tons cargo, 8,906,654 tons ballast— together, 29,581,588 tons. Total, 83,072,866 tons cargo, 26,698,562 tons ballast— together, 109,771,428 tons. The number of men in British ships in 1874, the date of the latest Return, was 203,606. This was exclusive of masters. If the frequency of the voyages made by some ships was taken into account, the number of men annually exposed to the dangers of the sea was very large indeed. He might remark that in 1872 the number of emigrants was 251,871; and, besides, there were the ordinary passengers not included in any of these Returns. Parliament possessed one great advantage in dealing with this subject arising from the fact that the question itself was entirely removed from the arena of Party conflicts, and they could approach it with a freedom of consideration which they were not always able to apply to questions which excited strong political feeling. It had long been a subject of legislation by every Party that had been in power. Commencing 40 years ago, successive Governments had introduced Shipping Bills. In 1836 a Committee was appointed to report on the cause of Wrecks, and in 1843 there was another Committee on the same subject, most of whose recommendations had been since carried out. In 1846 there was important legislation as to wreck and salvage, and as to the survey of steamers. In 1847 and 1848, and 1849 the Emigrants and Passenger Acts were amended. In 1849 the Navigation Laws were repealed; in 1850 the Marine Department of the Board of Trade was established; and in 1852 the Emigrants Acts were consolidated. In 1854 a most important measure of consolidation was brought in by the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Cardwell) and carried through both Houses. Subsequently, that Act was amended in consequence of the Report of Mr. Lindsay's Committee; in 1867 Mr. Milner Gibson brought in a Bill; and in 1867 the Board of Trade introduced a measure for providing crews with better accommodation on board ship. In 1868 he himself had a Consolidating Bill drawn and prepared, but the country was deprived of his services before he could carry it through. And here a sense of justice prompted him to bear testimony to the readiness with which the Permanent Secretary (Mr. Thomas Henry Farrer) and staff of the Board of Trade carried out as far as in them lay every effort in the direction of affording greater security to the lives exposed to sea risks. He did this because he had read most unjust charges of red-tapeism which were levelled against these gentlemen. Well, in 1871 the noble Lord opposite (Lord Carlingford) brought in and carried a small measure. In 1873 the publication of a remarkable book by Mr. Plimsoll on the Mercantile Marine and on Shipwrecks and other casualties by sea led to the issuing of a Royal Commission; but without waiting for the Report of that Commission the noble Lord brought in and carried a Bill, to which, had the feelings of the country not been excited on this subject, it might have been difficult for him to obtain the assent of Parliament. In 1874 the Royal Commission reported; but there was no time for any legislation in the Session of that year. He now came to 1875, when his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade brought in a measure which he was unable to carry in its entirety. That fact having been perceived in time, his right hon. Friend towards the close of the Session of 1875 introduced a smaller Bill—one dealing with some of the more important points on which legislation was required. That Bill passed into an Act; but the Act was only temporary in its character—it would expire on the 1st of October in the present year. The experience of its working had proved of great advantage to the Government in the preparation of the present Bill, which repealed the Act of 1875 and also repealed so much of the Acts of 1871 and 1873 as related to unseaworthy ships. The Bill now under their Lordships' consideration would contain the whole of the law relating to unseaworthy ships. Its first important clause was Clause 4, which re-enacted in a permanent form a provision of the Bill of 1875, and laid down the principle that it was a breach of the Criminal Law for any one to send or to attempt to send to sea a British ship in such unseaworthy condition that the life of any person was likely to be thereby endangered—to do so was declared a misdeemeanour. Although it might be true that there had not been a great number of convictions under that provision in the Act of 1875, the clause might have been very beneficial in its deterrent effects. Clause 5 provided for the obligation of the shipowner to the crew that he would use all reasonable means to insure the seaworthiness of the ship for the voyage contemplated:—it made that obligation a part of every contract, whether express or implied. The clause, consequently, gave the relatives of a lost crew a right to proceed under Lord Campbell's Act. Clause 6 gave the Board of Trade power to detain ships if, by reason of the defective condition of her hull, equipments, or machinery, or of improper loading, a ship was unfit to proceed to sea without danger to human life, and prescribed the mode of procedure in respect of detention. By Clause 7 a new Court, called a Court of Survey, would be constituted, to which the owner or master of a ship detained might promptly appeal against the action of the officers of the Board of Trade. The establishment of this Court would get rid of the delay which arose in getting certain cases heard by local Courts of Admiralty. Clause 10 would make the Board of Trade liable to the shipowners for damages and costs for unjustifiable detention of a ship. Clause 11 was an important one. Up to last year the only means by which seamen could raise the question of the unseaworthiness of a ship was by first deserting her. Clause 11 would enable them to make a complaint, and have the seaworthiness of the ship inquired into, without any such process; the complainant giving security for costs. Clause 13 remedied a wrong which had been sometimes experienced. By the Merchant Shipping Acts and the Passengers Acts, passenger or emigrant ships could not proceed to sea without certificates of the proper officers as to their sufficiency in every respect required by those Acts; and these certificates had sometimes been refused: this clause gave to the shipowner a right of appeal to the Court of Survey constituted by the Bill. Clause 14 empowered the Board of Trade to refer difficult cases, on appeal, to scientific referees. Clauses 15 to 18 contained special provisions in relation to passenger steamers and emigrant ships.

Clause 19 contained a provision respecting the stowage of grain cargoes similar to those contained in the Act of last year; and Clauses 20 and 21 contained provisions of considerable importance with regard to deck cargoes. Clause 20 provided that if any British or foreign other than home trade ships, as defined by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, carried as deck cargo, timber, stores, or other goods, all dues payable on the ship's tonnage should be payable as if there were added to the ship's registered tonnage the tonnage of the space occupied by such goods at the time at which such dues became payable. Clause 21, which imposed a penalty on ships carrying deck loads of timber in winter, was not in the Bill when first introduced in the other House. The point with which it dealt was one of considerable difficulty, and the Government were rather unwilling to touch it; but it was suggested that the difficulty might be overcome, and it was urged, and not unreasonably, that as the Canadian Legislature had found itself able to deal with it, Her Majesty's Government might deal with it in the same way. Accordingly, the Government framed a clause strictly in accordance with the Canadian precedent. In the Canadian clause an exception was made in favour of deck loads only 3 feet high and composed of light timber. The Government introduced that exception in Clause 21, and on one division maintained it: but on a subsequent division it was struck out by a majority of 18 or something like that: therefore, the Government were not responsible for the clause as it at present stood. Clauses 22, 23, and 24 provided that there should be deck and load lines; but, following the Report of the Royal Commission, they did not define what that line was to be—that was left to the shipowner. Clause 25, making the provisions of this Bill as to detention applicable to foreign ships, was inserted during the passage of the Bill through the House of Commons. It was resolved to put British ships and foreign ships loading in British ports under the same regulations as to over-loading. Accordingly, this was inserted; but a sub-section of the clause provided that when a foreign ship had been provisionally detained for over-loading a copy of the order or provisional order of detention should be served on the Consular officer of the State to which the ship belonged, who might appoint a person to inspect the ship in company with the officer of the Board of Trade. If they agreed the ship would be released or detained as the case might be; if they differed the action of the Board of Trade was sustained, but an appeal was given to the master or owner to the Court of Survey. Subsequent clauses appointed Wreck Commissioners for investigating shipping casualties, and gave powers for the summoning of assessors in cases where special knowledge was required; and laid down rules of procedure. The powers of the Commissioners were extended to inquiries into cases of stranded or missing ships. Among the "Miscellaneous" clauses he might mention two—the 33rd, which provided that if the Government of any foreign State was desirous that any of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1854 to 1876, should apply to the ships of that State, Her Majesty might by Order in Council direct that they should so apply:—and the 34th, by which the Act was declared not to apply to ships on inland waters of Canada. The principle of the measure was to provide, as far as possible, for the security of the ships engaged in the commerce of this country, without relieving the shipowner of the responsibility of seeing that his ship did not go to sea in an unseaworthy state. These were the principal enactments of the Bill. He did not wish to exaggerate the probable effects of this legislation; but he thought he was justified in hoping that as it was framed after the Government, Parliament, and the country had given such long and earnest attention to the question, it would considerably mitigate the avoidable dangers of the sea without doing injury to or unnecessarily interfering with the shipping trade and the commercial interests of this Kingdom.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord President.)

LORD CARLINGFORD said, there was little to be said about the Bill, important as it was, because, so far as it was directly intended to protect life at sea, it substantially embodied the provisions of the temporary Act of last year. When that Act was under consideration in their Lordships' House he took the liberty of expressing an opinion that there was no reason why it should not be a permanent measure. He was glad the Government had proceeded on the same lines as those on which that Act was framed, and had not proposed a general and compulsory survey of all ships. The Royal Commission went into the merit of the two systems, and gave its approbation to that adopted by the late Government. He agreed in the noble Duke's estimate of the value of certain improvements introduced by the Bill, especially that giving a ready and competent Court of Appeal, and that appointing Wreck Commissioners with enlarged powers of inquiry. With respect to the question of survey, he should like to call attention to the provisions as to costs and compensation in Clauses 10 and 11. As the Bill now stood, in a case in which it should be decided that a ship was, as a matter of fact, not in an unsafe state, the Board of Trade would be liable to all the costs and to compensation for detention. If he was not mistaken, that was not the form in which the clauses were originally introduced by the Government. It was obvious that it might be the duty of the Board to detain a ship for any reasonable and probable cause, and yet that the result of the inquiries might be that, as a matter of fact, the ship was not so unsafe as to warrant her detention under the Act; but it did not follow that the Department of the Executive which performed that duty should be bound to pay the whole cost and the whole compensation for that detention. He thought it a question whether that was not going too far, and whether it would not hamper the hands of the Board of Trade. Under Clause 11, relating to complaints made by sailors of the unseaworthiness and danger of their ship, if the complaint turned out to be inaccurate, and that the ship was not at the time of such complaint unsafe within the meaning of the Act, the complainant would be liable to pay to the Board of Trade all such costs and compensation as the Board had incurred. But he thought the sailors should not be liable to pay costs and compensation in a case where there was reasonable and probable cause for detention, although in the end it might turn out that the ship was not so unsafe as to warrant her detention. This was a more important matter under this measure

than it was under any former Act, because the newly-constructed Court of Appeal, if it were brought into operation, would inevitably create many causes of delay and large claims for compensation, which might be much greater than the costs of the proceeding. He thought the Government would do well to modify this part of the Bill by inserting that this liability should not be incurred except where the complaint was made and the ship detained "without reasonable and probable cause." He now wished to say a few words as to that part of the Bill which dealt with foreigners and with the Colonies. Foreigners were affected by the Bill in two ways—and he might say at once that, whether right or wrong, that was an extremely novel piece of legislation. As far as he knew, it was quite unknown to our law, and he thought it likely to raise many doubtful questions. The Government would probably admit that the clauses dealing with foreigners were not introduced into the Bill with the object of saving life on board foreign ships, because the Government could not feel responsible for the lives of foreign seamen. These clauses were introduced entirely for the sake of putting upon a foreign shipowner a weight similar to that which was put upon his British rival. A foreigner was affected by the Bill in two ways—first, when he attempted to leave a British port in a ship overloaded or improperly loaded; and, secondly, when he came into a British port with a deck load during certain months in the year, or exceeded the limits laid down by the Bill. The case of leaving a British port seemed to him to be less difficult than the others, but he could very well conceive that officials of the Board of Trade would find considerable difficulty in using the powers entrusted to them, and that international complications might arise. If we imagined what was likely to happen—namely, the detention of an American ship at Liverpool, while a British ship at that port was allowed to proceed on her voyage, he believed that international difficulties would arise, and he should like to know what view the Foreign Office and the noble Earl (Earl Derby) took of that matter. In the case of a foreign vessel arriving at a British port the difficulty would be still greater. There the offence created by the Bill was an offence committed in the foreign country where the ship was loaded. The date adopted, prohibiting deck loads between the 1st October and the 16th March, was particularly open to question. It was taken from the Canadian Act, and might be correct in relation to the Atlantic trade; but it certainly was not correct in regard to trade with Norway and other European countries. It was imagined by some persons that the Imperial Parliament had not still a legal right to legislate for the Colonies; but the result of the very able controversy which had been carried on in the public Press more than in Parliament, and which he presumed no one in that House would attempt to revive, had shown that it was illusory to suppose that the Imperial Parliament did not still possess a right to legislate for the Colonies. He doubted whether Canada wished to deprive her ships of the enormous advantages which they now possessed as British ships. But while the right of the Imperial Parliament to legislate for Canada was undoubted, the exercise of that right was a very different thing. It was a right which should be exercised only with the greatest caution. With regard to deck loading, the Canadian law, which till now we had looked up to with satisfaction and admiration, was satisfied with saying that deck cargoes from the 1st of October to the 16th of March should be prohibited, save and except deck loads not exceeding 3 feet high and consisting of light timber. That Act had been in operation for some time, and he was informed that ships built and loaded in accordance with its provisions were perfectly safe. This was the original provision of the clause; but in consequence of the defeat of the Government on this proposal, as mentioned by the noble Duke, the clause had assumed its present shape, and our law came into direct collision with the law of Canada on this matter. Such a conflict of laws should not be allowed to arise without such a necessity as he did not believe existed in the present case. He hoped the Government would amend the Bill in this particular. He wished to know how Clause 31, which authorized the detention of overladen ships, was to be enforced in foreign ports where no machinery for carrying its provisions into effect existed. The clause enabled certain officers to detain a ship, and if the master proceeded to sea in defiance of such intervention he was liable to a penalty of £100. How was a detention abroad to be followed by the same consequences that would arise at home? He did not see how the enactments could be made applicable in foreign ports. He also desired to point out that there were many vessels which sailed as British ships employed in foreign commerce which never touched at a British port at all, and which were chiefly manned by foreign seamen; and he failed to understand how the provisions of the Act were to be put into force with regard to vessels of that character. In his opinion the noble Duke had in no way exaggerated the importance of the questions which came either within or without the Bill; and while he by no means complained of the Government for not having found it possible to deal with the questions which were without the measure, and which were almost if not quite as vital to the safety of our ships as those which were within it, he was glad to hear that the Government had those questions, especially those that related to the character and the discipline of the crews, the system of marine insurance and of advance notes, under their consideration. He need not detain their Lordships longer than to express his great hope that the life-saving clauses of this Bill would be zealously administered by the officials of the Board of Trade, and that the Department would be sufficiently supplied with officers competent to discharge the duties cast upon them, which, if properly performed, would do much to diminish the cases of unseaworthiness and the loss of life which had sometimes thrown disgrace upon the general high character of the British Mercantile Marine.

LORD HAMPTON expressed his great satisfaction that the Government had introduced this Bill; and he earnestly hoped it would become law without delay. He agreed, however, that the clauses regarding deck loads would require very careful consideration. The clauses referring to deck load and load line were of great importance; but he thought that these also would in Committee require careful consideration. As they now stood he was afraid they would be of hardly any value.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET congratulated the Government upon having introduced this measure, and on having been able to bring it up to that House.

Lord Carlingford

He thought they had acted most wisely in leaving the questions of marine insurance and discipline for future consideration, because had they attempted to deal with such large subjects by the present measure they would have greatly complicated the matter and delayed the passing of the Bill. The provisions of the measure, if properly carried out, would undoubtedly do much to improve the seaworthiness of our ships; but, at the same time, he must state that he had received Petitions for presentation to that House from many of the leading steamship owners—very respectable men, possessing over 800,000 tons of shipping—in which they objected very strongly to the terms of the 4th clause, which made the sending unseaworthy ships to sea a misdemeanour. They objected that the clause introduced a novel and entirely objectionable principle into our laws, inasmuch as that by its terms a man might be held criminally responsible, notwithstanding he had been guilty of no personal negligence. He thought those gentlemen had fair ground for their complaint, because he had always understood it to be a grand principle of law that it was for the accuser to prove the guilt of the party charged with an offence, and not that the accused should be called upon to establish his innocence; and the Petitioners said that such exceptional legislation as to shipowners could only be justified by some very extreme necessity. It was admitted that the great body of shipowners were upright and just dealing men, who by their enterprize and intelligence had added much to the prosperity of the country. He trusted that when the Bill got into Committee it would be considerably modified in this respect, because as it now stood it certainly appeared to be very unfair. The provision relating to foreign ships, he thought, should have formed the subject of Treaties, or at least should not have been introduced into this measure without previous arrangements with foreign States. With regard to Canada, which had raised a strong objection to the application of the Bill to them, it was well known that the inhabitants of the Dominion possessed an enormous amount of shipping, and it was, therefore, of very great consequence that nothing should be done by the Imperial Parliament that could interfere unduly with the interests of Canadian shipowners. He did not deny the power of Parliament to legislate as it pleased on the subject, but he strongly deprecated the adoption of any course which could have the effect of compelling Canadian shipowners to transfer themselves and their capital to the United States of America. He could not help fearing that the clause in the Bill which dealt with this branch of the subject was drawn not so much with a view to save life as to gratify the jealousy of English shipowners in reference to the shipping business carried on from Canadian ports. The clause, which implied the application of the Bill to Canadian shipping other than that in inland waters, had been introduced somewhat hastily in the other House, and he hoped it would be carefully considered in Committee. His only desire was that the Bill should receive full and fair consideration in order to its being passed during the present Session. He should not, therefore, take up the time of the House on several points of detail which he thought deserved consideration. One of these points was the granting of advance notes—a system which he could not but regard as injurious and mischievous alike to shipowners and sailors; but, under all the circumstances, he thought it best to defer bringing the question before Parliament until some future time when the whole subject of discipline in the Navy might have to be discussed.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that nothing could be fairer than the way in which the Bill had been commented upon, and nothing could be more satisfactory than the general measure of approval with which it had been received by the noble Lords who had preceded him in debate. Several of the questions which had been raised by the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) would be better dealt with by the noble Lord upon the Woolsack than by himself; but he would draw attention to that very large Colonial question which had been touched upon by the noble Lord opposite and by the noble Duke. The noble Lord was perfectly right when he said that this Bill affected not only British ships, but those of Canada also; but whilst there were serious considerations in reference to humanity, there were also considerations almost as important on the other hand. The question that had been raised would affect the whole Dominion of Canada, with its 4,000,000 of population, and it was most difficult to bring to one's mind how large a stake the Dominion had in this matter. His noble Friend opposite who preceded him in the Colonial Office (the Earl of Kimberley) would remember perfectly well what the condition of Canada was in 1867 as compared with the state of things that existed now. Canada had since that time grown largely in wealth and power, and in everything that created national prosperity. It was now one of the largest shipowning countries in the world. It had about 1,200,000 tons of shipping, worth from £7,000,000 to £8,000,000; and there were also 1,000 shipmasters, 2,000 officers and not less than 20,000 seamen. These figures were also year by year steadily growing. Canada was a colony of whose commercial marine this country might be justly proud. He was also satisfied that, whether they looked to public men or to private individuals, the Canadians were equally proud of their connection with this country. He had watched with great satisfaction the course that had been taken in Canada with regard to this particular question. It had been his duty to read every word of the debates which had taken place in the Canadian House of Commons, and he could bear testimony not only to the ability, but also to the extremely good and loyal feeling which had been displayed. They were above all loyal. Though they felt that their interests had been injuriously affected by certain parts of this measure, there never had been the slightest doubt that the English Parliament and Government would accept every reasonable objection, and deal with the matter fairly and reasonably. The conduct of the Canadian Government also had been loyal in the highest degree; and when questions had been raised which it would have been undesirable to discuss they, with temperance and forbearance, put them aside for the time and dealt with Her Majesty's Government upon the best footing. He would not say that there were not difficulties connected with the question, but he was satisfied that with patience and forbearance on both sides, all those difficulties were susceptible of solution. Some misapprehension was, he thought, entertained as to the scope

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, the Amendment was proposed in order that the understanding arrived at on the previous night should be carried out. Reasons were given showing that £45 was too high for all classes, and it seemed to him desirable that the same qualification should be adopted throughout. He preferred £45, but there was a strong feeling the other way. The difference between £45 and £40, however, was not one of principle, but one on which hon. Members had as good means of arriving at a decision as he had himself.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he sympathized with his hon. Friend the Member for Carlow, and thought he was quite right in protesting against the attacks made upon him on account of the course he had thought it his duty to take respecting this Bill. It must be remembered that the hon. Member for Cork had delivered a long speech to show that the qualification ought to be reduced below £45, but he failed to convince the Committee, which had decided by a large majority against his proposal.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he did not think hon. Gentlemen opposite had any ground for feeling dissatisfaction, because dissatisfaction was equally felt on his own side of the House. They on his side did not wish for the £40 qualification. On the contrary, they wished that the law should remain as it was at present, at a qualification of £30. Never, he ventured to say, had a change of so great magnitude been proposed without more information being given as to the ground of the change. With regard to the reasons for adopting £40 instead of £50, the hon. Member for County Cork (Mr. Downing) gave figures and statistics which were irrefutable, and could not have failed to convince the majority of the House, had they waited to listen to the argument. No doubt a large majority had voted against that proposal; but many of the hon. Members composing it had voted without hearing the discussion, and had mostly given a Party vote in order to back up the Government in their proposals, and thus a large majority was made up against those who represented the Irish people. The qualification had been raised from £30 to £40 without any reason being adduced. Nothing was more grievous than that jurors should refuse to obey the law laid down by Judges either at quarter sessions or Assizes, but he could not agree with the hon. Gentleman opposite that, in disagreeing to a verdict in a doubtful case of murder, the Irish jury he referred to did not act properly.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, he had hoped the discussion on the subject had ended on the previous evening. He was sorry to hear the observations of the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen). The right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary thought it would be a fair compromise to accept £40 when he (Mr. Downing) moved to omit the five from £45. The hon. Gentleman the Chairman was under the impression it was challenged, and but for the mistake the whole would have been over in a short time. He was glad to find that those who supported the Government approved of what had been done, and admitted that the facts brought forward were not answered by the Government or by any one on their side of the House.

MR. HERMON protested against the statement that hon. Members on that side had voted on the question without understanding it. He for one had listened, as he always did, most attentively to the arguments of the Irish Members when speaking on the affairs of Ireland, and it was unjust to charge him with unfairness. He objected to being lectured by the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) merely because he had voted in accordance with his own convictions and had not been deferential to those of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. ASSHETON said, that he also had listened to the debate, and had arrived at the conclusion that either the Irish Members were wrong in fixing £40, or the House was wrong in fixing £45.

MR. BUTT thought the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hermon) should not have taken to himself the observations of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Henry), who did not accuse hon. Members opposite of refusing to listen to Irish Members, but simply stated the fact that a number of hon. Gentlemen did come into the House last night and vote upon the question who had not heard the debate.

MR. BIGGAR said, the practice to which the hon. Member for Galway (Mr.

referred was not confined to questions, but applied equally to and English Business. As a matter of fact there were at least 46 who voted in the majority last time, but he did not hear the arguments. He said he himself had often voted in favour of the Bill, not knowing anything of the substance of it, though it was not a very moral thing to do. He maintained that, whatever the faults of Lord O'Hagan's Bill, it was entitled to the highest consideration of his Jury Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill substituted.

MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH wished to make an unusual appeal in respect to the Bill. The law in Ireland relating to the election of jurors was of a temporary character, and would expire on the 1st of July. It was therefore essential that the Bill should come into operation on that day. It had yet to pass through the House of Lords, and in order to do so it would be a great assistance if the Bill would give a third reading in the House at the present moment.

MITCHELL HENRY: On condition that there should be full opportunity for considering the Procedure Bill.

MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH: Yes.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

BRUEN said, he was glad that necessity for the immediate passing of the Bill had given the advantage of giving them to discuss another Irish Bill at a reasonable time of day, and he wanted to ask the Government (for the Chief Secretary was not present) whether they could not give some good time on other Bills. Irish Scotch Members would be very busy if their business could be conducted at a time when they were not fully worked out. Shortness of time, he did doubt, much to do with the way in which the question was decided on the previous day. If more time had been given they would not have passed the Bill in the particular figure, and in the moment turned right-about-face and reversed the decision.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he would be glad to join in the application on behalf of the Scotch Members, provided that the Irish Members did not take the lion's share of the time. He hoped the Government would consider the proposition, and give as many Morning Sittings as possible to Scotch and Irish Business.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE (IRELAND) BILL.—[Lords.]—[BILL 161.]
(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

MR. BUTT, in moving, as an Amendment—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that in any Bill intended to constitute a Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland the rules of procedure should be settled and defined in the Act constituting the Court, in the same manner and to the same extent as they have been in the Acts constituting the English Court,"

MR. BUTT said, he was sorry to interpose at that stage of the Bill, as his Amendment might lead to some inconvenience and delay the Bill; but he felt it incumbent on him to bring the matter before the House. He must say he did not think that those who had had the framing of the Bill had given the whole question the thought and consideration which it required or deserved. Their purpose was apparently to assimilate the law of England and Ireland, but they had left out of this Irish Bill several of the clauses which were passed in the Supreme Court of Judicature (England) Bill. He did not think the different circumstances of the two countries, and the difference in the character of the tribunal, had been sufficiently considered and appreciated by the framers of the present measure. The English Act, the passing of which had been postponed for the purpose, laid down the most minute and particular rules in regard to almost all the matters requiring regulation, leaving merely a few insignificant matters of detail to be dealt with by the Judges. After the Act passed, no doubt, the Judges of the Supreme Court had power to make alterations in the rules. But making alterations in the rules embodied in an Act of Parliament was a very different thing from the power to make the rules themselves de novo. Now in this Irish Bill there was not a single rule laid down. Everything was left to the discretion of the Judges in a very different manner from what it was by the English Act. So great was the discretion left to them, that there would be nothing to prevent them, if they thought fit, from abolishing trial by jury. He asked why one rule should be applied to England and another to Ireland? Why was this Bill reduced to the merest skeleton, to be clothed with flesh and muscle in whatever town the Judge might think fit? Past experience, either in England or in Ireland, should not encourage them to leave so much power in the hands of the Bench, for it had been shown, in several instances, that it was not wisely exercised. They had now an instance of its abuse recently in 1869. A Bankruptcy Act was passed, intended to prevent any man availing himself of the protection of bankruptcy except at the instance of his creditors. The Act, however, gave power to the Judges to make rules of procedure, and they made rules which entirely defeated the main object of the Act, so that the present Government had now felt it necessary to introduce a new Bill on the subject. The Judges were really the worst legislators in the world in matters of this kind; and there was truth in the old axiom—that one of the elements of safety was to keep the judicial and the legislative functions separate. One reason why that separation should be made was, that he thought it very probable that the Judges would fall below the point, in many cases, to which the House of Commons would be inclined to go. There were most important differences at present between the English and Irish procedure, and they ought not to leave it to the Judges to say whether these differences should continue or not. In England a very large number of matters were disposed of by what was called summonses at Judge's Chambers, in which no counsel were required to appear, suitors being represented by solicitors or solicitor's clerks, which beside economizing judicial strength was a great convenience and saving to suitors, whereas in Ireland it was necessary for every application, however trivial, to be made to full Court by counsel. Now ought it to be left to the Irish Judges to say whether that system should be kept up? There were other questions involved in this discussion. There was a great demand for the reduction of the Irish Judicial Staff, and while giving no opinion as to whether or not the Staff was at present too large, he wished the House to consider the difficulty of coming to a decision on that point, until they knew what the rules of procedure were to be, and whether the motions were to continue to be disposed of in Court, with the time and expense involved through counsel being engaged, or whether they were to be disposed of in Chambers as in England. That would make all the difference. Another important question involved was that of venue. At present a large number of cases were brought to Dublin for trial, with which Dublin had nothing to do. Of all the cases tried there last term only one directly concerned the City of Dublin. Were they to allow the practice to continue in Ireland, destroying, to a great extent, the local administration of justice at the Assizes, the preservation of which he regarded as of the utmost importance? If they were to get rid of those foreign trials in Dublin it was perfectly obvious that the judicial duties in Dublin would not require the same number of Judges as now. All these matters had a bearing on the question of what number of Judges was necessary, and he was not one of those who wished to maintain a large number of Judges merely for the sake of giving patronage to the Irish Bar. He considered, on the contrary, that patronage had been a curse to the Bar. Not, however, until the Judges's rules were framed, and they knew what the Courts had to do, could they decide as to the number of Judges that ought to be kept up. He thought those matters and rules ought to be decided on in the House of Commons, instead of leaving them, as they were left, in this skeleton Bill to the Judges, who might be influenced too much by a regard for the interests of the Bar and the Bench. It was of very great importance to maintain an independent Bar, and these rules might vitally affect that question. The point to which they must look was the diminution of the large number of counsel now employed in some Irish cases. He repeated that the Bill proposed to leave too much to the Judges. It might either do nothing, or else a great deal more than was wanted. Parliament ought to settle the rules for Ireland as they did for England. He regretted having to refer to matters of detail, which, it might be said, ought to be dealt with in Committee; but if he were to undertake to propose in Committee all the rules he thought necessary, the Notices of Motion would be so numerous that he was afraid there would be little chance of their being discharged that Session. Even as it was, he would not bind himself not to propose those rules in Committee; but he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would avoid any such inconvenience by promising to introduce rules into the Bill. If he would promise that, he (Mr. Butt) would withdraw the Amendment. After all, what was the hurry for the Bill? Ireland did not want it; nobody asked for it. There were such measures as the Civil Bills Court Bill which were really pressing. Why not proceed with them? There was another strong reason for delay. Every day the English Bar, the Judges, and the public were complaining of the unsatisfactory character in many respects of the rules of the Supreme Court of Judicature, and he was told that the Judges had called a meeting to amend the rules. Why should not Ireland have the benefit of this revision, and the Bill be re-introduced next year? The effect of his Amendment was, that the Bill ought to be the work of Parliament itself, and not the work of the Irish Judges. He had as much respect for the Irish as for the English Bench, but declined to entrust to them the task of legislating, which belonged to Parliament itself. The Bill should not be a faint copy of the English clauses, many of which were inapplicable, while everything else was left to the Judges, and he hoped that on all these grounds the House would adopt the Amendment which he now submitted to their notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that in any Bill intended to constitute a Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland the rules of procedure should be settled and defined in the Act constituting the Court, in the same manner and to the same extent as they have been in the Acts constituting the English Court,"—(Mr. Butt,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, his hon. and learned Friend had as usual made a very able speech; but having heard it he could not but look forward with feelings of gloom to the difficulties of passing during this Session a measure, which was certainly desired very earnestly by large classes in Ireland, who wished to have the benefit of the same reforms in Judicial procedure as had been adopted in England. Knowing the power of obstruction possessed by his hon. and learned Friend in that House, he was afraid that if he continued to deal with the Bill in the same spirit as he did now, there was not a very brilliant prospect of passing it this year. He would, however, put it to his hon. and learned Friend that he should, at all events, allow the Government, in Committee, to explain the points to which he had taken objection as the Bill went along. It would then be seen that the difficulties and dangers he had conjured up were not substantial. His hon. and learned Friend complained that rules of procedure and practice were not introduced in a Schedule of the Bill, as was done in the English Acts, and he had spoken of those rules as if they were the product of the mind and wisdom of Parliament, and were, to a great extent, the result of debates in the House of Commons. Nothing could be more opposed to the fact. Some rules, no doubt, were introduced in the English Bill of 1873, and were adopted by the House of Commons; but they had been very carefully prepared beforehand mainly by the Judges—the very class of persons to whom it was now proposed to entrust the preparation of the rules for Ireland. What was done then? Again, in the English Acts, although the rules were inserted in them, power was given to the Judges to enlarge, modify, and alter them, subject only to the condition that any alterations or additions should be submitted to Parliament. His hon. and learned Friend, in dealing with this subject, was not quite so accurate as he usually was, for he overlooked the fact that the clauses in which it was proposed to give the Judges in Ireland the power to frame rules were almost exactly the same, word for word, as the corresponding provisions of the Act of 1873, and the Act of 1875. If his hon. and learned Friend compared this Bill, section by section, with the English Act, he would find that the words employed were for pages nothing more than a reproduction of the words of the latter. The whole frame of the Bill was a combination of the Acts of 1873 and 1875. Ireland would have the advantage of the precedent of the English Acts, the advantage of the rules which had been framed in England, and, what was no small matter, the advantage of the additional experience of six months which would elapse before the rules need be finally settled. Unless his hon. and learned Friend was enough of a Tory to hope to postpone an Irish Judicature Act until the English Judicature Act was repealed, the best thing was to have as soon as possible an exact unification of the two systems. His hon. and learned Friend feared the Judges might make rules which would deviate from the policy of the Bill, and prevent its being any good to the country; but he would remind him that the rules in the English Act were framed by the Judges, and passed through Parliament with little discussion. He was bound to say that if his hon. and learned Friend asked him to bring into the House of Commons a Schedule corresponding with that of the English Act of 1875, and carry it through the House of Commons, especially if he and other Irish Members had not much sympathy with the measure, he would not have a chance of passing it within any reasonable limits of time. They would soon have a revolt of the Scotch Members, not only against English, but Irish Business, if they were thus to proceed slowly to elaborate a system of rules in the House of Commons. The only conditions laid down when power was given to the Judges to frame rules were that those rules should be laid on the Table of the House if Parliament was sitting at the time, and, if not, within 40 days after the next meeting of Parliament, and that if an Address were presented to the Queen in opposition to any of the rules they might be annulled. That power would be a complete and sufficient safeguard against anything improper being done; but it was a very different thing from having the rules framed by the House. It seemed to him only reasonable to entrust the settling of the rules to the men who best understood the subject, reserving to Parliament the power of exercising supervision over what they did. He would not enter into other matters which his hon. and learned Friend had touched on, and which could be better dealt with in Committee. The Bill came down to them with considerable weight and sanction from "another place," and he desired to adhere to the lines there laid down; but he was not unprepared to consider in Committee the suggestions of learned and experienced Members on the other side. He therefore appealed to them not to approach the question with the intention of slaying the Bill by slow degrees, but to assist the Government, so that they might that Session pass an Act assimilating the Judicature laws of England and Ireland, and obtaining for their own country the benefits which had already been conferred upon England.

MR. MELDON said, he had heard with regret the determination of the Government not to yield to the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend. He desired to see a Judicature Bill passed for Ireland, not that he believed any improvement had been effected in England by the Judicature Act, or was likely to be effected in Ireland by a similar measure. He wished to see a Bill passed for Ireland merely on the ground that the systems in England and Ireland should be unified. The course taken by his hon. and learned Friend opposite deprived the country of the sole advantage which could be derived from the passing of the Bill. In England certain rules and a definite system were introduced into the Act. By this Bill it was left open to the Irish Judges to deviate as much as they pleased from the system in England. He thought they ought not to pass any Judicature Bill for Ireland unless it contained a full and complete system of rules of procedure and practice; and he hoped that they would have one perfect and harmonious scheme for the whole Kingdom. He admitted that in the case of England, as stated by his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland, the rules as framed by the Judges were very little changed by Parliament last Session; but he asserted, on the other hand, that those rules had been pushed through the House almost with indecent haste, and that they were not ultimately such as they would have been if they had undergone due discussion. He should support the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland that the time it would take to discuss those rules in the House would infallibly lead to the postponement of the Bill till next Session. The Government had given a pledge that it was intended as far as possible to assimilate the rules of procedure and practice in Ireland to those of England; and next Session, when the new Code prepared by the Irish Judges was laid on the Table of the House, if it was found to be divergent from the system established in England, the House would have an opportunity of remedying the matter. If this debate had arisen in March, instead of in June, he should have supported the Amendment, but a fusion of Law and Equity having taken place in England, he thought it very important to the interests, not of the Bar or of the Judges, but of the public in Ireland, that the assimilation, which must eventually take place, should take place as soon as possible, instead of everything being left in doubt and uncertainty with different and contradictory systems at work in the two countries. He admitted that it would have been better if the rules had been scheduled, but he was not disposed to imperil the Bill on account of that omission, believing that the Judges were not likely to make rules merely for the convenience of the Bar without consulting the requirements of the public. If they did the interference of Parliament could be invoked, and if it were not done by anybody else he should not hesitate to call attention to the subject. He could not vote with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Limerick.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he sympathized with the object of the Bill

—the unification of procedure and the fusion of Law and Equity—and for that reason he would support the objection of his hon. and learned Colleague, fearing the efficacy of the Bill in its present shape. The House was asked to cast on the Irish Judges the responsibility it had itself discharged on the English Bill. Now, though very desirous of seeing a Bill of that kind passed, he insisted that the rules of procedure should be provided on the responsibility of that House. The Irish Judges were, no doubt, competent to frame rules and orders; but they might be disposed to stand too much upon the ancient ways, and, at all events, they should perform such a task under a full responsibility to that House and the country. While that measure was still in embryo, an eminent Irish Judge whom he would name—Mr. Justice Barry—had long since imposed on him the necessity of embodying the rules in the Act and relieving the Judge from the responsibility. The Act of 1853 had failed in producing a simple system of pleading, and the proceedings between Lord Justice Christian and other members of the Bench as to the rules of the Act of 1867 had been of a most painful nature, and sensibly affected the position of the law in that country. In order to avoid a defeat of the objects of the Act, there being really no hurry, he would rather see the Bill postponed, in order to give Parliament an opportunity of superintending the preparation of rules. The principal thing was to produce a perfect code, and even if two or three years were occupied in doing so he should not complain. The County Courts Bill was of more importance, and deserved attention first, in order to make legal redress accessible to the masses. He complained that the Lords, who had abundance of time at their disposal, sent the Bill down without the rules, and, on the whole, so much neglect had been committed in the progress of the Bill so far that it was necessary to be cautious.

MR. LAW did not believe there was the slightest danger of the Irish Judges exhibiting any of the eccentricities which certain hon. Members seemed to apprehend. In a communication which they had made to the Lord Chancellor, or, at all events, officially, and which had just been laid upon the Table of the House, they expressed the opinion that, for many reasons, it was expedient as far as possible to have "identity of constitution, practice, and procedure in the superior Courts of England and Ireland." It was not too much then, he thought, to ask his hon. and learned Friend to place reliance on the Judges when they thus publicly express their opinions and determination to have a similar constitution and course of procedure in Ireland to that in England. It was provided, too, by the Bill, that the rules should be laid on the Table as soon as they were framed. What more was requisite? Surely this gave Parliament an adequate control over the Irish Judges. They must trust somebody. The House of Commons trusted to its legal Members, and it was not too much to ask the legal Members in turn to trust to this small extent the Judges, who were just as anxious as themselves to have identity of procedure. A good many of the other objections that had been made during the discussion were not of such a character as ought to interfere with the progress of the Bill. He hoped his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick would, in the interests of the people of Ireland, which were greatly involved in their having a cheap and uniform system of procedure, withdraw his Amendment, so that some progress might be made with the Bill in Committee. If not, he should feel it to be his duty to vote against him.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, it was unfortunate that the Bill should have been read a second time without discussion, because that course had necessitated a discussion at an inconvenient time. He thought, however, that both sides who had listened to the discussion would see that there was something of much greater importance involved than the mere question of a Schedule of rules and of procedure. It was surely a very striking circumstance that an hon. and learned Member who was, and he (Mr. Henry) said it without flattery, accepted throughout the United Kingdom as one of the first law authorities in the country, and who at the Irish Bar held, if not the very foremost place, yet held a foremost place in conjunction with only one or two others, that he should feel it his duty to come to the House and entreat the House of Commons to postpone the Bill, not on matters of detail, but on matters of vital principle. He hoped hon. Members on both sides would listen to the appeal. He believed there was in Ireland an amount of money paid in litigation which was out of all comparison with that spent in England and Scotland. That did not proceed from the magnitude of the fees paid to counsel, because he had more than once said that the fees paid to Irish counsel were inadequate, but it arose from the enormous cost to suitors, owing to the shocking condition of procedure. It was said that there were too many Irish Judges, and though his hon. and learned Friend had shrunk from stating that such was the case, he defied anyone who had listened to his speech not to draw that inference from it. He asked the House and the Government to lay down the principle that the English system of Chamber practice should be established in Ireland. There were an immense number of influences at work, but if they were to take away from the Courts Chamber cases, it would be found a very difficult thing to keep up the number of Judges, as those cases represented a great deal of business. He was of opinion that no one who had ever bought property in Ireland or made an investment there had failed to find that, by hook or by crook, he became involved in litigation. There was a great deal of speculative litigation in Ireland. He once bought some fisheries. They were not large ones, but the moment he was in possession of them a claim was set up which continued seven or eight years. It could not be got rid of. He would, with the permission of the House, narrate the story. He bought in the Landed Estates Court some fisheries. When he was comfortably in possession a gentleman disputed his right. The gentleman asked the Landed Estates Court for a judicial declaration. The case was heard in the Landed Estates Court after very great difficulty, and the House might be sure that great anxiety existed amongst the parties to the suit. The Judge made very light of the matter, and said he would make a declaration of title in favour of his (Mr. Henry's) adversary's right of several fisheries. He said to his counsel, "You do not seem to be attending to the case." The reply was—"Never mind, his decision is certain to be reversed, whatever it is." The case then went before the Judges in Appeal, and they did reverse the decision. In doing so they expressed themselves in strong language, and indicated that the judgment would not have been known in an English Court of Justice. They directed an issue should be tried before a jury. After innumerable difficulties it was so tried by a jury in the county, and the decision was in his favour. Of course there was an appeal. That appeal came before the Court of Exchequer in Ireland. It was heard repeatedly. Days were fixed on which the appeal was to take place, but on every occasion when he and other litigants went down they found the way barred by little cases, which ought to have been settled in Judges' Chambers. The case went on, he might confidently say, for three years. It was then finally argued out, and just as the decision was about to be given one of the Judges died. The Court then directed the matter to be argued all over again, in order that they might have the opinion of a newly-appointed Judge. It was accordingly argued over again, and one of the Judges discovered a mistake. Being a black letter lawyer he found that a particular word had been wrongly translated in a document, which did not, however, turn out to be of very great consequence. A new trial was directed, and the witnesses all collected at the Assizes, but he then found that it would be better to compromise the matter, and the other side was also willing to do the same. He consented to arbitration, and an arbitrator was appointed, who gave his decision, and he had to pay a great deal more than the whole fisheries had cost. The fisheries were bought for £1,400, and the expenses were not less than £8,000 or £9,000 for both sides. What happened then? A proposition from his opponent was communicated to him by his own attorney, and he replied by saying that he preferred everything should be settled by counsel, because he had no confidence in the attorney on the other side. His own attorney sent his letter to the opposite attorney, who thereupon brought an action against him (Mr. Henry) for libel, and laid the damages at £8,000. That was a very serious matter. He asked his own attorney if it was not a confidential communication, and the reply was—"Oh, yes; but I asked you if you had any objection to me tell him so." He had no objection, and therefore the communication was sent. The action was tried. It was a tremendous one. He (Mr. Henry) was not called to give evidence. He was defended by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, and the learned counsel on the other side was annoyed that he was not called. While he was sitting down quietly in Court, the counsel of the other side began to abuse him and make comments on his personal appearance, pointing at him with his fingers. This was not stopped by the learned Judge; it was permitted. The jury returned a verdict that there was publication of libel, under the express direction of the Judge, and the jury returned a verdict of a farthing damages. Of course, in a very few days he was called upon to pay several hundred pounds of costs, and he did so at once. Then he came over to London. He met the right hon. and learned Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loughlen), who said that that was an extraordinary decision in your case. He (Mr. Henry) passed an Act through Parliament a few years ago providing that in any case in which an action was brought the costs should follow the damages—that was to say, your opponent having a farthing damages you ought to pay a farthing costs. He (Mr. Henry) said that was a new revelation. He caused a new application to be made, but the Judges said—"We believe it is so, but it is too late to remedy it," and it was not remedied. He had since found that the Act of Parliament had been overruled by technical regulations of the Judges themselves. The Act was consequently of no use. He asked if the House was going to leave to the Judges in Ireland the making not merely of the rules and deciding as to the procedure, but the settling of great principles. He asked the House to determine that the Court rules and procedure in Ireland should be assimilated to the rules in England, and thus to protect in some measure the unfortunate suitors, of whom he was only one example out of many.

Dr. WARD complained that notwithstanding the introduction of the Civil Courts (Ireland) Bill, by which it was proposed to cut down nearly half the judicial business so far as it was transacted by the Judges, the present measure would fix upon that country the existing judicial staff, which everyone outside the Profession would admit was far too large for the work which it had to do. The real reason, he added, why there appeared to be so much legal business in Ireland was that a number of paltry, wretched cases came before the Courts there which in England were disposed of in Chambers. From the Returns it appeared that an ordinary English Judge sat on 205 days in the year between the hours of 10 and 4, whereas the average occupation of an Irish Judge was between 11 and 2 or half-past 2 o'clock, on 178 days in the year. The result of the Irish Judges having little to do and plenty of time to spare was that they were appointed to other posts and made Commissioners of Education, in which capacity their decisions were too often thought to be influenced by Party or religious considerations. At the time of the passing of the Church Act, for instance, Mr. Justice Lawson, who already received £3,500 as a Judge, was appointed a Church Temporalities Commissioner, with an additional salary of £2,000, and he was besides an Education Commissioner. As to the rules, they were the real essence of the Bill, but the framing of them had been left to the Irish Judges. With all due deference to the Irish Judges, he did not think they had so much reason to repose confidence in them and their public spirit and action as to trust the important matter of broad principle to them. There were, as he had said, too many Judges in Ireland. There were 20 Judges of First Instance against 24 in England; they were 12 Judges of Common Law against 18 in England. They had an Admiralty Judge and a Judge of the Court of Divorce. Practically they had two-thirds more Judges in Ireland—for doing what business? The total number of judgments in Ireland in 1872 was 4,481, whereas in England it was 23,554—exactly five times more. If they were to keep up such an enormous staff the Government would leave themselves open to the suspicion that they were keeping a great amount of patronage for unworthy motives, besides the system injured the Bar, and was prejudicial to the cause of public interest and public justice. He would urge the hon. and learned Member for Limerick to proceed with his opposition until he received some guarantee that the important power of framing the rules should not rest with the Judges.

MR. MACARTNEY believed that the Judges in Ireland administered the law as carefully, as wisely, as impartially, and in as effective a manner as the Judges in England, no matter what politics or what religion might have brought them to the Bench. Indeed, it often occurred that Roman Catholics preferred to be tried by a Protestant Judge, because they thought the Judge would lean to their side in order to show that religion did not influence his decision. It appeared from the announcement made by the Irish Judges themselves that they would frame their regulations as much as possible in accordance with those in force in this country, and if hon. Gentlemen opposite wished to see that effected, it appeared to him they were taking the worst possible course for the purpose.

MR. GIBSON supported the Bill. The argument of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick was not one really against going into Committee, and he therefore urged on the Government to press forward the matter without delay. The English Act of 1873 empowered the Judges to make rules which were, in fact, fully prepared when the amending Act of 1875 was introduced, and were embodied in its Schedule, because otherwise they would not have come into full operation until six months later. As, however, no previous Judicature Act had been introduced with regard to Ireland, it would be necessary to entrust the Judges with the duty and responsibility of framing rules. When Mr. Justice Barry said he hoped the rules would be as closely as possible after the English rules, and when they found a Petition from all the Irish Common Law Judges on the Table to the same effect, he thought there was very little fear that the rules when framed would not be entirely in accordance with English precedent and English procedure. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Henry) had given them an exceedingly interesting narrative. It was true he had been unfortunate; but there was, they all knew, something not unpleasant in the misfortunes of one's dearest friends. But many people had managed to live in Ireland without ever having being involved in any litigation. It was very unfortunate that almost immediately the hon. Member put his foot into Galway, that he should be involved in litigation. He must have bought a lawsuit. The moral to be adduced was, that a man should be very slow to buy a fishery in the county Galway. As for the Act, which laid down that the costs should not be higher than the damages, he might remark that it contained a clause enabling the Judge to certify that higher costs might be given; this power was exercised at the trial against the hon. Member for Galway, and the inference suggested was that the hon. and learned Member for Limerick did not look after the interests of his client. The statistics given by the hon. Member for Galway (Dr. Ward) had been often exposed, and did not throw any light on this subject. It was not fair to measure the work of the English Judges against the work of the Irish Judges, because the latter did all the work themselves, and were not helped like their English brethren by referees and arbitrators. Indeed, the Irish people would not be satisfied unless their cases were tried with the fullest sanction of publicity in open Courts. With regard to the administration of justice in Ireland by the Judges, he believed it was above all suspicion. It was true that the Judges there, before their elevation to the Bench, had held political views and belonged to political parties; but when the judicial ermine was assumed, they administered justice in a way that won the confidence of the public and of the members of their own Profession—fearlessly, without favour, and without affection.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH thought that, whatever might be the merits of the Bill, its passing was endangered as long as the Government withheld any overture in regard to the objections which had been raised. If the Government would only give a pledge to consider these objections next Session, he thought he could say for his own political friends that they would not interpose any more obstacles in the way of the present measure being proceeded with.

MR. SULLIVAN said, it was exceedingly unfortunate that they were hampered in discussing the question by the fact that there had been no adequate discussion of the Irish Judicature system at any previous stage. There were great questions underlying the Bill which had been kept out of sight. Where was the Civil Bill Courts Bill? They called for it. What had happened to that Bill? Why was it not brought forward before this measure? The English Judicature Bill was not passed until the English people had first secured to them a reformed County Court system. Why was not the same course followed with regard to Ireland? It was not until the basis of a County Court system was laid that the superstructure of a Supreme Court of Judicature could be built up. He could not understand the action of the Government in this matter, unless they were prepared to defend it on the principle of the Ulster Grand Jury a century ago, who having passed a presentment for a bridge, when told that there was no river at the place, said next year they would pass a presentment to give the bridge a river. There was no use in hiding the fact that there was a mutiny against Lord Cairns. When he attempted to deal with the Irish Judicial system, the hand of the Government was stopped, and the Civil Bill Courts Bill was put aside, not to satisfy public opinion in Ireland, but to placate certain powerful interests. Considerable dissatisfaction had been felt by the Irish Judges and Bar at Lord Cairns's proposals. He (Mr. Sullivan) was present at a public banquet, the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary was also there, and he advocated, not with bated breath and whispering humbleness, but with candour and honesty, certain reforms. He was dropped upon instantly, and he got a wiggling on the very spot by one of the Judges. His Lordship plainly hinted that the Judges did not want their preserves poached upon by any Government, Whig or Tory. It was a dangerous thing for any Government to deal with. Why? Because it was confessed that the whole legal system was an anomaly. It was out of joint with the times. A Conservative newspaper, The Belfast News Letter, said that two-thirds of the Bar were Conservatives, and, as they had been kept out in the cold for 25 years by their enemies, they ought not to be kept out in the cold for the rest of their lives by their friends. An hon. and learned Gentleman on the other side had said that while the Irish Judges did their duty, the English Judges did not. Well, he had heard the same thing said before;

but it was rather strange that the English people did not seem to know it.

MR. GIBSON said, he cast no such imputation on the English Judges. What he did say was that much of the work for which the English Judges were credited was in reality to be ascribed to others—referees, arbitrators, and so on.

MR. SULLIVAN said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman had certainly stated that the Irish people would never consent to have their business administered in the way that the English business was done. The Irish Judicial establishment, tried by every test, was either greatly over-manned, or the English Judicial establishment was wholly inadequate. Various excuses were offered for this state of things. It was said that the Irish people loved pomp; but this plea he derided. The next argument was that the Bar wanted promotion. There were, he affirmed, at the disposal of the Crown in Ireland, of places, great and small, two for every three barristers who really practised. Lord Cairns went bolder at the system than others, but he was told to hold his hand. He (Mr. Sullivan) wished to see the Bar regarding the faithful and zealous discharge of its duties as the goal of its ambition, rather than the attainment of some scrap of Government patronage, or hankering after the nod of some Castle official. Because he had dared to advocate Judicial reforms an argument in Ireland had been used against him, and in order to make him unpopular he had been assailed in the Press and by his friends, because—so it was said—that as a Nationalist and Home Ruler he was bound to get for his own country the greatest possible sum out of the Consolidated Fund. But whether money obtained from that source was a curse or a benefit to the people depended on the use to which it was applied. It might be employed for purposes of corruption and intrigue; and if it was bestowed without honest value being given in return for it, it was a bribe. The Irish people only asked for strict justice, and that they had never yet received in regard to their system of Judicature. As Sir John Davies had said, the Irish loved nothing better than justice, and laws would lose their efficacy if they were not invested with the respect of the people. There was not, he believed, a Judicature in Europe more worthy of respect than the Judges of Ireland on the whole were, both in their public and private character. But he nevertheless refused to trust them with the powers proposed to be given by that Bill, seeing that the House had not trusted the English Judges with those powers.

MR. M'LAREN said, that having lately moved for two Returns on the subject, it occurred to him that hon. Members might wish to know on what grounds he had taken that course. He complained that by the Bill the House would be required to vote at the expense of the inhabitants of the whole of the United Kingdom for the Irish Judges a sum very much in excess of that which was necessary. The Returns he moved for were to bring out that fact. He had had no doubt of the fact himself, but the Returns, he thought, would bring it before the House adequately, and in small compass—in such a way that there would be no misunderstanding it. The last of the two Returns showed that there were 22 Judges in Ireland, who under the present Bill would be paid £83,000; that there was a Receiver at a salary of £2,500, a Master at a salary of £1,200, another at a salary of £1,400, and a third at a salary of £1,200. One would suppose from what hon. Members on the Conservative side of the House had said, that the Judges in Ireland had no assistants; but there were four assistants, who received £6,300 a-year amongst them. Adding this amount to the sum received by the Judges, it appeared from the Returns which had been supplied to him that the Judicial expenses, apart from the small expenses attending the Courts, was £90,000 a-year. Now, no one who inquired into the extent of the business in Ireland could suppose that to impose such a charge upon the taxpayers of the United Kingdom was anything but an injustice. This would be apparent on reference to the statistics with regard to Scotland. To perform that which devolved on the 22 Irish Judges there were only 13 in Scotland, and the amount paid them was only £42,300. No doubt, there was what were called separate branches of law in Ireland—that there existed several Courts which were not to be found in Scotland. They had the Court of Exchequer, and there was not such a Court in Scotland. Scotland had possessed a Court of Exchequer, and that within his recollection; but it had been abolished, and the duties which were performed in it were thrown on the other Judges. In the same way the Court of Probate, the High Court of Admiralty, and the Jury Court had been abolished, and the work thrown on the remaining Judges. The House might think that just as they diminished the number of Courts in Scotland, they would have to increase the number of Judges in the Courts which were left, and that, therefore, there would be no saving. But was that really the case? By no means. After all these duties had been imposed upon the Court of Session in Scotland, instead of increasing the number of Judges, it was reduced by two. What they gave the Scotch Judges £42,300 for doing, by the present Bill they proposed to pay the Irish Judges £90,000 for performing. The expenditure was injudicious. The salaries of the Judges would only be increased slightly, he admitted, and he was not prepared to contend that the salaries of ordinary Judges were too large; on the contrary, he thought that the salaries which the Scotch Judges received—namely, £3,000 per annum—might very well be increased. That was not the question before the House, but it was that the Irish Courts were underworked, and if that were so, why should they not cut down the number of Judges before they increased the salaries? In Scotland there were a great many more mercantile cases heard than in Ireland, and the Judges were worked harder—having probably double the quantity of work to perform for less than one half of the pay—and it would, therefore, be unfair to carry out the proposal contained in the Bill.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that the proposals with reference to the rules were not substantially different from those adopted in the English Act. The hon. Member for Louth spoke at length upon what he considered the excessive number of the Irish Judicial staff, and objected to the mode of dealing with them in this Bill. Now, the proposals for reduction in this Bill were considerable. With regard to the Judges, the Bill proposed to reduce a Judge in the Court of Exchequer, one in the Court of Common Pleas, and one in the Admiralty Division, and an important legal official, the Receiver Master in Chancery. It moreover proposed measures by which considerable reduction might be effected in what he might call the excrescences which grew up around the Judicial Courts when they were divided into separate divisions, and which, when these Courts were amalgamated, it would no longer be necessary to retain. These would be substantial reforms, and, he confessed, it was strange to him that the hon. Member, and those who agreed in wishing for greater reforms, should obstruct the progress of a Bill which, at any rate, did something to effect their object, merely for the idea that it did not go far enough. That was the surest way of preventing all reforms whatever. The hon. Gentleman complained that the Government had not pressed forward the Civil Bill Courts Bill. That Bill was introduced at an early period of the Session in common with the Highways Bill and the Valuation Bill. It had hitherto failed from want of time to obtain the attention of the House; but he must say there had been other reasons why it had been found impossible as yet to proceed with it. Not the least of these was the fact that a right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) gave Notice of his intention to move that it should be read that day three months, thereby preventing any stage of the Bill being taken after half-past 12, and then absented himself in Ireland almost for the time he mentioned in the Notice of Motion. He hoped to have an early opportunity of proceeding with that Bill, of the importance of which he was fully conscious. He felt bound to say, however, that the enthusiastic support which it had received in the course of the debate from hon. Members opposite came somewhat late in the day. If such expressions of opinion had been heard earlier in the Session, they would have had their weight with the Government and the House, and the Bill would probably have made substantial progress. The Bill now before the House came down from the House of Lords. It had been carefully sifted by those competent to deal with this great question, and in the fusion of law and equity it was a necessary supplement of legislation already on the Statute Book with reference to England. In other matters it proposed a real and substantial reform in another many millions might be expended under the Bill, and it would be too late, and some might say unpatriotic, to raise any question on the subject when the formation had been completed, or on the eve of a campaign—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

CAPTAIN NOLAN proceeded. He did not wish to find fault with the scheme in its general aspect; on the contrary, he thought the idea an exceedingly good one, sketched out with great ability, but he objected to one or two important details. The two faults he found were, first, that the scheme was too expensive — not, for the present year, £40,000 being all that was taken for this year; but in regard to the expenditure which must be incurred at some future time, if ever the scheme should be put in force. The second fault he found with it was that, in the present advanced state of military science it rather looked as if they ignored some of the lessons of the Franco-German War. The leading features of the mobilization scheme were to allow an offensive Force to be sent abroad on an emergency and also to retain a Force for the general defence of the country, and therefore, as only Regular Troops were liable for service abroad, there would be two corps made up practically entirely of Regular Troops. There were to be eight field corps, but the Volunteers would be excluded. One feature was, that a large number of Militia regiments were to be sent long distances from their homes. Now he thought this idea of sending troops great distances from their homes had been overdone. He approved to a certain extent of the Government scheme, but he found fault with it as likely to be too expensive in future. The units or brigades into which the Forces were divided were too small, involving increased expense in the staff of officers and in the cost of administration. It was obvious that the larger the divisions the fewer in proportion would be the non-combatant expenses. All the great Continental countries — Russia, France, Germany, Austria, and Italy—had very large divisions compared with ours, for while we had only 3,000 in a brigade, and 7,000 infantry in division, they had at least 6,000 men in a brigade, and 14,000 or 15,000 in a division. At the same time a corps d'armées was not so much smaller in England than in other countries, for we put three divisions, while other countries put only two in a corps d'armées. As far as he could make out, the total cost of the Staff pay of the eight corps d'armées would be about £500,000, and that was only the beginning of the expense. He calculated that the present system of organization would be more expensive by one-third than the organization of the Continental Armies as far as the Staff officers were concerned. The system had also military as well as financial defects. If in time of war two corps d'armées were sent abroad they would be found difficult to manage. All military authorities were opposed to dividing an Army into two equal or unequal divisions, as it would probably lead to a conflict of authority between the generals in command of the two fractions when either was ordered by the Commander-in-Chief to detach aid to the other. In his opinion the best course to adopt in time of war would be to divide the two corps d'armées into three corps d'armées of two divisions, and he believed that whoever devised this scheme contemplated something of that kind; but still, this, though the best course, would be but a weak expedient. He asked the Secretary of State to tell the House the reasons why these small units or brigades had been adopted? He could suggest two reasons for the adoption of that system—one being that during peace manœuvres there was an advantage in having small divisions, because it enabled a large number of Staff and general officers to be trained, and afforded a good opportunity for making a number of appointments to well-paid posts; and the other being that it was intended to mitigate the evil of our regimental system, which had for its base a single battalion per regiment, instead of the three battalions per regiment used in Continental Armies. The point on which he wished to get an answer from the Government, however, was not with regard to the regimental system, but with reference to the new mobilization scheme, and as to why the brigades and divisions were made so small and were so expensive, not only in the Staff pay of the officers, but also in the administrative service, and in many other respects. These errors were no mere fancies of his own. He had only pointed out what all the Continental powers were doing in that direction. They had long since by experience discovered that small brigades were more expensive, because they required more officers, more Artillery, and more Cavalry in proportion. No doubt, it was more convenient for manœuvres in time of peace to have small divisions; but as the mobilization scheme was ostensibly devised for a time of war, it ought not to be based upon considerations only applicable to a time of peace. In foreign military states the administrative unit was 3,000 or 4,000 men, and the fighting unit about 1,000, and he should like to know why a different and more expensive system had been adopted in this country, by confining our regiments to practically a single battalion? He thought that the Government had done very good work in publishing a scheme for mobilization in The Army List, as now one had something definite to look to; and no doubt any scheme which the Government could have put forward would have been subjected to criticism, but he wished to point out that this scheme, although in many respects a good one, would entail much future expense, and he asked that the Government should give a reason for it, trusting that they would not fall back upon the answer that they had merely acted on the advice of the military authorities. If such an answer were the only one given, it must be remembered that on the other side there were such military authorities as Moltke, Blumenthal, and MacMahon; and he trusted that the Government would be able to give some reason why the mobilization scheme was specially applicable to England.

MR. J. HOLMS said, he entirely agreed with the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) in thinking that the mobilization scheme was a very expensive one, and that it entirely ignored the lessons of the Franco-German War. He thought the forthcoming mobilization of two Army Corps would prove the unsoundness of the present military system of this country. Whether the English public did or did not take an interest in the changes going on in our Army, the fact remained that every country in Europe would give critical attention to them, and unless he was much mistaken, the military authorities of such countries would discover in our so-called mobilization much that fell but little short of the grotesque. The scheme ought to have been submitted to Parliament before being adopted. It would almost entirely undo the localization scheme, which was adopted by the House at the instance of Mr. Cardwell a few years ago. A still greater objection was that it adhered to principles of organization and administration which had been condemned, and justly condemned, by all other military Powers in Europe. With respect more particularly to the scheme itself, the force indicated by its authors must either be required or not, and he could not believe that the Government would publish to all the world that they required a great many more men and horses for their Army, unless they were absolutely required. And at a time when every one knew that the country was not actually in the position to supply the number of men, guns, and horses which the War Office said was requisite. The statement of the War Office was that for eight Army Corps they required of Regulars 102,636 men, and for garrison duty in all 21,566; for the Militia they would require 221,469 men. The number of horses required would be 85,866, and the number of guns 720. But the Government had only—deducting the number of men in prisons and hospitals—in round numbers 93,000 Regulars, or 71,000 if the number required for garrison duty was deducted. The Militia numbered 100,000, of which number 34,000 was required for garrison purposes. The horses at the disposal of the Government were only 15,000, very far below the number said to be required, and of the 720 guns we had only 342. In other words, we had only enough of Regular troops to supply three Army Corps: our Militia would only be sufficient for four Army Corps; we had only horses for one and a-half Army Corps, and only enough guns for four Army Corps. Well, that being so, we had only men and guns for four out of eight Army Corps, and he was anxious to know what was to become of the other four Army Corps? Why, if matters remained as sketched out in the scheme, four out of the eight would be composed simply of 32 generals and 292 officers of the Staff. He asked the Government whether they intended or did not intend to carry out their scheme. If they did, how were they to procure the men, guns, and horses? If they did not, why did they not reduce the number of corps d'Armée to the number of the men they intended to maintain? He protested against the scheme altogether. It would simply result in an increased expenditure, and would entail the appointment of 96 generals and 644 officers of the Staff.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. J. HOLMS proceeded: If the scheme were carried out in its integrity, the Army would be short by the number of 70,000 horses, 378 field-guns, 120,000 Militia, and 30,000 Regulars. He must therefore again ask if the Government really intended to give effect to the scheme? If they did, it would involve in the first year a charge of £8,280,000, of which sum £3,260,000 would be a capital charge incurred for horses and guns alone to supply the existing deficiencies, and each succeeding year there would be an addition to our present Army Estimates of £5,000,000 for the supply of the requisite number of men to bring up our Forces to the standard prescribed by the scheme. Mr. Cobden once told the House that he had been assured by high military authority that our Army organization was the most extravagant in Europe. Mr. Cobden was right in discussing that organization, for upon sound organization efficiency and economy entirely depended. A sound formation of an Army Corps system would be the very keystone of improvement in our military system; but the composition of the proposed Army Corps did not comply with the requirements of a sound system. They would, as he said, have the military attachés of every European Court criticizing our Army system next month, and he could not believe that their verdict would be altogether satisfactory. He believed that the ruin of the French Army was the scrambling for appointments which took place, and he was afraid that something very similar was going on in our own case. He could not understand how the military authorities should have selected for the command of one of the Army Corps an officer, however capable, who was over 72 years of age, and had been out of the Army for years, and this when making a trial for the first time of a new system. Look at the composition of the 2nd Army Corps which was about to meet at Godalming. So far from the men being close to their own homes, the Army Corps was to be composed, as far as the Militia were concerned, of men mainly drawn from the most distant portions of the Kingdom. How was it possible that such men could have been trained together? The General knew nothing of them, and they knew nothing of their General. Why, again, should the War Office draw men from Scotland and Ireland to the South of England for the purpose? Would it not be much more reasonable to have an Army Corps in the Southern counties drawn from the young men of that part of England? Tilbury Fort, which 200 years ago was the scene of a Dutch invasion, was to have its defence provided for by the Militia of Argyllshire, Bute, Ireland, and Northumberland, when surely there were enough men in Middlesex to defend it. In the event of invasion our Yeomanry would be called upon to discharge the duties performed by the Uhlans in the Franco-German War, which they were incapable of doing. Two conditions of efficiency they were supposed to possess—first, that the Yeomanry should own their horses, and, secondly, that they should understand their own county. From a recent Return it would be seen that the Yeomanry in many cases were not all provided with their own horses, and by this scheme they would be quartered, not in their own counties, but in different parts of the country, of which they knew nothing whatever. He should like to know whether the Militia and Yeomanry attached to the 5th Army Corps were to appear at head-quarters at all, or whether it was true, as he had heard, that, being short of equipment, they were to assemble and then return to their own homes? He trusted the House would receive some clear assurance of the intentions of the Government as to whether this mobilization scheme was really to be carried out or not, and whether they would re-arrange the Army Corps which at present appeared in The Army List, or remove it from that publication altogether.

Mr. J. Holms

MR. STANLEY said, some of the criticisms which had been made upon the scheme of mobilization would almost justify a retort like that of the horse dealer, when some one pointed out what he deemed to be a fault in an animal with many excellent points—"Do you really think it is a fault? For my part I think it is the best thing about the animal." Many of the so-called points of weakness in the scheme were deliberate departures from the rules which had guided the formation of large armies in foreign countries, and were intelligent applications of the same principles to the different circumstances under which we lived. There appeared to be a very considerable amount of misapprehension prevailing as to the precise objects and merits of this scheme. It did not aim at any very large increase of the Forces, nor at any extensive alterations of the mode in which they were arranged; but from the first it had purported to be an intelligent and intelligible scheme, marking out, as in a time table, the precise places where, until further orders, particular troops would rendezvous under given contingencies. From the very nature of it, therefore, there could be no finality about it. It was clearly shown, even from the mode in which the Army Corps were mobilized this year, that the intentions of his right hon. Friend was to test the orders for mobilization that had been established, and to test them openly before the public with all their merits and all their defects, and the last speaker seemed to have misapprehended the real state of things in that respect. To prove that he need only refer to the second Article. If it had been thought desirable to bolster up fictitious strength nothing would have been easier, for instance, than to attach to the 5th Army Corps, from places where they could be well spared, a sufficient number of batteries to complete the Artillery to the normal establishment, which would complete the Artillery of the corps d'armées. So far, however, from that having been done, many batteries were wanting, and one corps d'armées, appeared with an Artillery force of six guns only, instead of 90. Comments had been made about the Forces not being entirely composed of Regular troops; and he might explain that arrangement arose from the wish of the military authorities not to make a great disturbance in the present military arrangements of the country, but to provide for the concentration of troops where they might be required. There was one point which it was impossible to leave out as a factor in these calculations. That was that although our frontier was penetrable at many places, it was not penetrable without a certain expenditure of time, and he was fairly entitled to use that fact when asked how regiments could be transmitted in time from one part of the country to another. Criticisms had been made as to the number of officers, the small units, and the number of divisions. Undoubtedly, if he were prepared to go into arguments which he thought more fitted for the United Service Institution than the House of Commons, he should have something to say about the different opinions existing between many competent authorities as to the exact composition of divisions and brigades. But he would only say at present, that there appeared to be an immense advantage in having a large number of small divisions. He would ask the House to separate this scheme from some others on which criticisms had been passed. This scheme was nothing more nor less than what it purported to be—a scheme for the mobilization of the military Forces of this country. It was wholly in its nature a defensive scheme, and on its merits and demerits as a defensive scheme he was prepared to meet any arguments that might be adduced. As to the supposition of the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Captain Nolan) that if it were proposed to send two Army Corps abroad, the two commanders from jealousy would do all they could to disorganize the Army, it was too late in the day to be guided by such minor considerations in devising any scheme. Under such circumstances, when large bodies of men were to be moved, was it not to be expected that some intelligible plan of action would be drawn out beforehand, subject to modification by the senior officer; and if there was any risk that two commanding officers might neutralize it, was it meant to be implied that there ought to be a third, so that a majority might settle differences? That would be something new in military matters. Then with respect to the Forces at home and the scheme of defence, he wished to point out that the scheme laid down where certain troops were to be placed, in case of necessity, upon the basis of there being eight Army Corps. Before this scheme was brought forward a Committee on Organization was sitting at the War Office, and they laid down what was the plan that would be most effective for the right concentration of these Army Corps, excluding the troops that were to be set apart for the defence of certain fortifications, the rest being available for this special Army Corps. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) talked about the enormous cost of the scheme, but it involved a mere distribution of the Force now existing, and the cost had not been increased by the addition of one officer or man. Supposing also that the Force when distributed was found to be weak in one place or unnecessarily strong in another, there was nothing to prevent any troops from being detached from one place and attached to another by the simple process of a General Order. The hon. Member had also commented upon the mode in which the Force was to be moved from one place to another, but the difficulty of dealing with Forces was not so great when they got them together, as before they got them together and before they were organized. What they had to consider was how they might best meet that difficulty. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Holms) had also spoken of the anomalies of bringing battalions from Scotland to serve in England, and sending battalions from the South to serve in the North. All these arguments as to interchange had met with intelligent consideration, and all he could say was that the changes themselves had not been in any way guided simply by local considerations. If the Northern portion of England was most open to attack, he should have thought that the highest honour was conferred upon those who were called upon to take part in repelling such a demonstration. In the Waterloo campaign the Brigade of England, Scotland, and Ireland earned for itself the distinction of being the Union Brigade, and well maintained its position in the history of that campaign. In case of hostilities, given a strategical point, lines of communication must be kept open, and taking the great lines of railway as the arteries of commerce, it was desirable to interfere as little as possible with the peaceful traffic of the country, and it was desirable that a particular corps d'armée should be able to concentrate at a particular point and by the rolling stock of one line. Special management would be required in such a case, and that must be regarded as having no small influence on the question they were discussing. There were other considerations which had not and could not be put on paper. He would not follow the hon. and gallant Member (Captain Nolan) into a discussion upon Army organization further than to say that considerations connected with colonial, foreign, and Indian service had influenced the decision of these questions, and that in the nature of things there could be no finality about these measures; they must watch what was going on elsewhere, and from time to time adapt the military organization of this country to the most approved systems. The hon. Member for Hackney said that when Lord Cardwell brought forward his scheme for the re-organization of the Army he invited the consideration of the House to the whole question, and offered very full explanations of all the points of his scheme, and probably by implication the hon. Gentleman complained that the Secretary for War was not doing the same thing on this occasion. But the circumstances were diametrically opposite. Lord Cardwell's scheme involved very considerable alterations in the internal arrangements of the Army, and an essential change in our military organization; and the estimated cost of the scheme was £3,500,000. Naturally, therefore, on such an occasion, the House had a right to call upon the Minister for a full explanation of the conclusions at which he had arrived. In this case, however, the outlay involved was no more than for ordinary manoeuvres, and, so far as the Votes of the present year were concerned, the cost was not so much as that of the ordinary Autumn Manoeuvres. The Government only proposed a re-arrangement of existing troops. They did not propose to bring up the battalions immediately to a war strength. He thought the arguments put forward by the hon. Member for Hackney in relation to these Army Corps must be taken as fallacies. He could not but think that the hon. Gentleman had, in his calculations, taken the theoretical strength as it might be on a war establishment, instead of that which was the fact under the existing scheme; but the filling up the Army Corps to a war strength would only be thought of in case of the most urgent necessity. The hon. Gentleman spoke of the enormous cost that would be incurred; but there would be no additional cost, except that of concentration and the ordinary allowances to troops who were under canvas. What his right hon. Friend wished was to see, in the first place, how these Regulations, put into operation in time of peace, would be likely to act in time of war; secondly, not only to see whether he would be enabled to call out a portion of the Reserves, but to test a matter as to which some persons had expressed considerable doubt—namely, whether the men would be forthcoming, and, if forthcoming, what they would be worth; and, thirdly, to ascertain how far the calling out of these men might cause a disturbance of civil employment throughout the country. These were points which should go a long way in recommending the scheme to the House. The hon. Member for Hackney had erred in mixing up two questions which were very distinct in their character—namely, the mobilization of the forces as shown in The Army List, and the localization scheme of the late Secretary of State for War; and he seemed to have thought that the former would completely upset the latter, but the two things had no necessary connection with one another. It was quite true that his hon. Friend, who had studied the interesting question on the spot, had come home from Germany very much impressed with the ideal of the German Army Corps. His hon. Friend said that the men of the German Corps were localized together, that they came from the same districts, and that they knew their Generals and their General knew them. But these were conditions which could not apply to the Army Corps system in this country, and if his hon. Friend looked at the first Report of the Localization Committee of Lord Cardwell, he would find a very intelligible account of the way in which our Reserve Forces must differ from those abroad. Here the men would enlist at a particular dépôt to which they probably might never return until they were discharged. In our mobilization of troops the unit had been taken not of the battalion, but of the barrack in which the battalion was placed. The battalion might belong to a Norfolk dépôt, whilst it was placed in a garrison far away from there. Therefore our localization scheme must be worked on a different system from the German; and if the late Secretary of State for War were now in this House he would give the hon. Gentleman very nearly the same explanation of the localization scheme as had now been given. To carry out rigid localization would be to do that which caused so much difficulty in the French war; but this would be avoided by adopting the barrack as the basis. It had been said that the Yeomanry were no longer mounted on their own horses, but the Committee of last year brought that point to light, and a Regulation had been issued that no one should be accounted efficient as a member of the Yeomanry unless he fulfilled the condition of riding his own horse. As to the men being well acquainted with the country, troops in these days travelled over so much ground that a man must have a versatile talent and wide information if he knew the inns and outs of all the locality which he had to act in from personal knowledge, and he must rather trust to that derived from maps and other topographical information. He might say, in conclusion, that this scheme had not been taken up lightly or carelessly. It was not announced with any great flourish of trumpets. The sounds which heralded its approach did not partake of that inspired character which had been attributed to them, though the subject had evidently been handled in the Press by those who thoroughly understood the question. No extra cost beyond that of the manœuvring of former years had been incurred in connection with it. Not one single officer had been added to The Army List in consequence of this scheme. The only expenditure was that of the Parliamentary Vote in the usual Estimates. The scheme laid down as clearly as it was desirable to lay down, the mode in which, until other Orders were issued, troops might be concentrated at such particular points as the occasion of their being called together might render necessary. That had been done to avoid complicated routes and other complications. All this had been placed in an intelligible and practical form before the military authorities, and military matters at the War Office as to the various parts of this scheme, and he should continue to consult them upon matters of this character. The hon. Member for Hackney seemed to be so enamoured of the system under which corps d'armée were formed on the Continent that he wished it to be adopted in this country; but as had been pointed out it was not thought necessary to go to the expense in this country that was incurred in the construction and maintenance of Continental Armies, and they were based upon a different foundation. The hon. Member for Hackney had spoken of the possible invasion of the country. He (Mr. Hardy) was one of those who did not share in the fear of a probable invasion, nor had the noble Duke to whose speech reference had been made spoken of immediate invasion, but of the necessity of putting the Army on a good footing in order to be prepared should it come. If it did he did not hesitate to say that the country would provide, and promptly provide, for any such emergency. It would not grudge the cost; on the contrary, he believed they would go further, and be ready to bear the expense of increasing as well as of filling up the battalions and brigades. He regretted that the hon. Member for Hackney had spoken in terms of disparagement of a gallant officer who had been appointed to the command of an Army Corps. General Sir William Codrington was one of the few officers who had commanded an Army in the field; and though he had not recently been on active service, he had, nevertheless, kept up his interest in the profession to which he belonged, and his appointment had his (Mr. Hardy's) hearty approbation.

MR. J. HOLMS disclaimed any wish or intention to cast a slur upon the character of Sir William Codrington.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY thought when the hon. Member spoke of that distinguished general as being too old for the Service, that was speaking of him in disparaging terms. General Codrington having the misfortune to be out of employment had yet continued his military studies, and evinced his interest in military affairs, and he (Mr. Hardy) thought it most unfair to speak of him in such disparaging terms. He, however, did not wish to dwell on so ungracious a subject. He would only say, in conclusion, that he had arranged to call out these two Army Corps, in order to put what had been done to a practical test. One thing he could promise—that there should be no concealment as to what occurred. It would be seen whether the men would come and how they acted when they were brought together. He should have no hesitation in telling the House the number of men engaged in these operations. His object was not to deceive the country by a show of force which was illusory, but to let the country see how far it had forces which could be relied upon.

RIVERS POLLUTION COMMISSION— THE REPORT.—QUESTION.

MR. A. BROWN rose to call attention to the final Report of the River Pollution Commission as regards the supply of water for domestic purposes in rural districts, and to ask the President of the Local Government Board what further steps he proposes to take to remedy the existing evils?

QUESTIONS. OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, I rise to ask a Question, of which I have given private Notice, to the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. Had I known earlier of the circumstances to which my Question refers I should have given my noble Friend public Notice of it. It may be known to some, though possibly not to all, the Members of your Lordships' House that three days ago there appeared in one of the morning papers—The Daily News—a letter from Constantinople, giving in detail, and apparently in a very circumstantial form, an account of some alleged barbarities, massacres, and outrages upon Christian subjects of the Porte, committed partly by Bashi-Bazouks and partly by regular troops of the Turkish Government. If this communication of the Correspondent had been made in the form of vague rumours or something of that kind, I should not have called the attention of my noble Friend to them; but there is this peculiarity about the communication—that in respect of some of the towns and villages the names are given, the number of the persons massacred is given, and the name of the Turkish officer who commanded the troops is also given. I shall not, however, harrow the feelings of the House by relating the whole of the details of the correspondence. I shall simply summarize its statements; which are, first of all, that there had been an indiscriminate slaughter of old men, women, and children, in something like 100 villages in Central Bulgaria—a province in which, as far as I know, there is not now, and never has been, a state of insurrection. The names of 37 of these villages are actually given; and in the case of one town, the name of which also is given, it is stated that 1,500 persons—mostly women and children—were massacred. This town was a place of some 400 houses, all the inhabitants being Bulgarians.

"No charge of disloyalty, still less any charge of open rebellion, had been brought against it. Its one offence was that it was Christian, and in consequence, as compared with a Turkish village, rich. For this reason alone the armed Moslem rabble were let loose against it and its unoffending inhabitants. The village was surrounded and the inhabitants fired upon. Of course, the latter, surprised though they were, defended themselves, remaining, however, in their houses. A portion of the Christians even now consented to give up their arms, on being assured that they would not be injured, and a body of them unarmed, with women and children, and headed by two priests, went out to make submission. The two priests advanced to kiss the hem of the Turkish chief's robe, and was killed on the spot for his submission; the other was wounded in the head, but managed to escape. The unarmed inhabitants were attacked. Some of them fled; others took refuge in the two churches of the village. On the 11th of May Raschid Pacha arrived with a body of troops. He ordered the Christians to surrender their arms. They naturally requested to be allowed to retain them until the Bashi-Bazouks had withdrawn, fearing the fate of those who, having disarmed themselves, had submitted, and had found how utterly untrustworthy are the promises of a Turk. Raschid at once took the part of the Turks, and ordered the villagers to give up their arms. He thereupon made an attack upon the church, and old men, women, and children were indiscriminately slaughtered. Every house in the village was burnt, and on the 14th of May not a house existed. A certain number of the women and children escaped, and are now refugees in Philippopoli, but a number of women were carried off as legitimate prizes by the Bashi-Bazouks."

In calling attention to this matter I have no wish to break through what has been called the "patriotic reserve" which we have all maintained with regard to the Eastern Question and the general policy of Her Majesty's Government in respect to it. I simply wish to know whether my noble Friend has received from our Minister at Constantinople any kind of allusion to those alleged horrible massacres in Bulgaria; and, if he has not, whether he has addressed or will address any inquiries to him on this subject?

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I saw the other day in the correspondence of The Daily News that very startling series of statements as to the alleged massacres and other acts of violence said to have been committed in Bulgaria by the Turkish troops to which my noble Friend has called attention. I need not tell your Lordships of the reputation of the paper from which the noble Duke has quoted, and I am bound to say, also, that those statements are given in great detail, and in a manner which would seem to establish some foundation for them; but your Lordships can readily understand that, however desirous they may be to do so, journalists at home cannot possibly verify the statements which reach them from Correspondents at such a distance and writing under such circumstances. My Lords, though, from the nature of the case, it is impossible for me to prove a negative, I can state that the reports which I have received certainly do not bear out in any degree the statements which the noble Duke has quoted, and, in the absence of any such official confirmation, I think we should be slow to believe those statements. We have heard, no doubt, of acts of cruelty committed on both sides, but upon nothing like the scale spoken of by the Correspondent in question. It is quite true that Bashi-Bazouks have been employed in the suppression of the Bulgarian Insurrection; that the Regular troops have been supplemented by irregular troops; and that, in consequence of reports as to the conduct of these troops, a representation was made to the Porte by Sir Henry Elliot on the subject. The answer to that representation was that the employment of those Circassian troops had been discontinued. That is all the information which, as at present advised, I am able to give in the matter. There have been excesses committed on both sides—in some cases by the insurgents and in other cases by the Turkish troops; but I have not received official information of anything that will come up to the atrocity of the acts referred to in the statement quoted by the noble Duke. I do not ask your Lordships to prejudge the case; but I think we are bound to reserve our judgment, and not assume too hastily that statements of the kind are true. I have a lively recollection of the extraordinary and sensational circumstances which reached us day by day and week by week nine years ago, during the insurrection in Crete; I ventured then to express some doubts at their accuracy; and I make bold to say that nine-tenths of those reports turned out to be untrue. As the noble Duke has thought the evidence in this matter sufficient to justify him in bringing the subject before the House, I will not fail to make further inquiry from our Minister at Constantinople.

EARL DE LA WARR: I beg to ask my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whether he is able to give the House any information of the reports of the critical position of affairs in Serbia?

THE EARL OF DERBY: The Question of my noble Friend is vague, and one which it is not altogether easy to answer. The state of affairs in Serbia is critical in one sense, inasmuch as we all know that great military preparations have been made in that country; the Militia and, as I understand, the Reserves, have been called out, and every preparation has been made which could be made for immediate entrance upon a campaign. No doubt in that way affairs in Serbia may justly be described as in a critical state; but if my noble Friend asks me whether I think it is the intention of the Servian Government to make war, that is a question which it is beyond my power to answer. It is open for that Government, in answer to any inquiries as to those preparations, to reply that in the unsettled condition of affairs around them they do not consider those preparations more than are necessary for the maintenance of peace.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSIONERS. MOTION FOR RETURNS.

EARL FORTESCUE, on rising to move for Returns respecting the Endowed Schools, read extracts from the Report of the Royal Commission appointed some years ago to inquire into the Endowed Schools. He regarded the legislation which had been based on that Report as miserably incomplete, and falling, in essential particulars, far short of the recommendations of those Commissioners. They spoke of dealing with schools in groups as a necessity, and said that that necessity seemed plainly to imply the corresponding necessity of local provincial boards to deal with them. Indeed, in the words of the Endowed Schools Commission upon their establishment the system proposed in that Report "mainly rested." But in spite of his remonstrances in that House, provincial boards for dealing with endowed schools were omitted from the Bill of 1869. And as that Report had warned them, the result had shown that under the centralizing system neither the late Endowed Schools Commissioners nor the present Charity Commissioners could deal in a satisfactory manner with those foundations. He was far from saying this was the fault of either set of Commissioners. They entertained an enlightened view of their duties. And here he must be permitted to pay, on public and private grounds, a passing tribute to the memory of the lamented Lord Lyttelton. But by their own avowal in their Report of 1872, they were unable to deal systematically and satisfactorily with the endowments placed under their control for want of proper legislation. One of their great difficulties was to keep down the number of first grade schools. For all masters and very many trustees were anxious that their school should enjoy the dignity of being of the first grade, while there was a far greater need for schools of the third grade—schools for the children of persons just above the wage-class. The Commission of Inquiry stated in its Report that the schools of the third grade would require to be as numerous as those of the first and second grades taken together; but what was the fact? He found that while under the schemes hitherto sanctioned there were 27 first grade and 55 second grade, there were only 56 third grade schools. Owing, however, to the fact that the Commissioners had been unable to deal with the schools in groups, there was reason to hope that there were few districts which had not still endowments available. Indeed, about three-fifths still remained untouched. There was, therefore, time if the matter was taken in hand at once to prevent very much harm; though as much good could not be done as might have been effected if the admirable scheme of the Schools Inquiry Commission had been taken up and acted upon in all its integrity. But if the Government left not “well” but “ill” alone, no benefit would result to the country from the valuable labours of that statesmanlike Commission, from its comprehensive and practical recommendations, founded upon full, protracted and exhaustive inquiry. Indeed, in some respects the previous condition of those endowments then of an aggregate value of some £20,000,000 sterling, their scandalous disuse, misuse, and abuse, was less to be deprecated, because much less hopeless of improvement, than would be the permanent respectable misapplication of them unavoidably carried on by successive Commissioners under the centralizing legislation of which he complained.

Moved, That there be laid before the House,

Return made out county by county, with in each case a proximate estimate of the annual value of the endowments, of (1) the number of schemes finally approved and in force in England and Wales under the Endowed Schools Act of 1869; of (2) the number of schemes published by the Endowed Schools Commissioners and the Charity Commissioners but not yet finally approved; and (3) educational endowments not included in Nos. 1 and 2 but within the provisions of the said Act, distinguishing those to which section 3 of the Endowed Schools Act, 1873, applies, in continuation of the Return ordered the 22nd of June 1875.—(The Earl Fortescue.)

THE BISHOP OF EXETER concurred with the noble Earl (Earl Fortescue) in thinking that if the present system was pursued there was great danger that the educational resources of the country would not be made available to the extent that was desirable. He hoped efficient steps would be taken to extend the operations of the Commissioners over the Endowed Schools of the Kingdom. The Endowed Schools Inquiry Commission came to the conclusion that a large number of these schools were not doing good, but, on the contrary, were doing harm. There were two causes for that state of things. One was, that the trustees were so hampered by obsolete provisions, intended to have a different effect from that which in reality they had in these days, that it was impossible for them to make improvement—and that without legislation it was hopeless to expect that the Endowed Schools of the country could be put on a satisfactory footing. The second cause was that the schools were in no sort of relation with each other, but in mischievous competition; there being in some districts schools much in excess of the educational wants of those districts. It appeared to the Commission of Inquiry, of which he was a member, that it was necessary, first, to provide for a complete review of legislation as regarded individual schools; and, secondly, that the schools should be put in healthier and more harmonious order as regarded relation to each other. In reference to the latter of these purposes, the legislation following on the Report of the Commission was very unsatisfactory. He was not prepared to contend that the machinery devised by the Commission for the carrying out of small extent increased. He was far from saying that their salaries should not, if it was feasible, be further increased; but, in his opinion, to allow them a commission on school books was not the most satisfactory mode of doing that.

Motion withdrawn:—Then

Return of the amount of commission allowed to teachers of national schools in Ireland on the purchase of books and requisites in each of the years 1873-74, 1874-75, and 1875-76.—(The Viscount Gough,) agreed to.

TURKEY—THE BERLIN MEMORANDUM.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD CAMPBELL: My Lords, I came into the House, like every one else, unprepared for the question which a noble Duke upon the front bench beneath has brought on as to Bulgaria. But having received to-day some information through a British correspondent at Rustchuk, as the subject is entirely connected with my Notice, it may be well, perhaps, to mention at the outset that it does not at all confirm, to their full extent, the statements of which the noble Duke desires to test the authenticity. The fact is that the Sublime Porte assailed by insurrections from without, at very different points in an extended territory, is reduced to the employment of those auxiliary forces in which discipline can hardly be maintained. My Lords, as the Notice is in some degree to call attention to a volume of despatches, I wish to say a few words on its contents. The most interesting documents which meet us are the the letters of Consul Holmes, whose post at Bosna Serai brought him into contact with the insurrection at its origin. Nothing can be more clear or valuable than the light he throws upon it. From him we learn that the undue liberality of the Porte was the immediate cause of the explosion. Some inhabitants of Herzegovina had of their accord transferred themselves to Montenegro. They unhappily obtained permission to return, which the Governor General of the Vilayet counselled the refusal of. They very soon diffused the incendiary lessons they had lately been acquiring. In none of his expressions does Consul Holmes admit the insurrection to be genuine. His language naturally merits a great deal more attention than I can now devote to it. The next interesting document is a long pamphlet, which professes to give the view of the insurgents as to mal-administration and abuses. It certainly is able, vivid, and minute—it might make an impression on anyone who read it. But it is traced to no authority whatever. Consul Holmes himself transmitted it to the noble Earl the Secretary of State, without any clue to the workshop it proceeds from. Soon afterwards we travel on to the well-known Circular of Count Andrassy. The House may judge its scope by one recommendation—it is that all the revenue derivable from general taxation in a Province should be spent exclusively upon it, and never find its way into the Exchequer of the Porte; as if it were suggested that the produce of the income tax in Yorkshire or any other county were by an Act of Parliament devoted to its prisons and its roads. No wonder that grave men like the Duc Decazes and the noble Earl the Secretary of State accepted with some reserve a proposition so astounding. They might indeed have asked themselves what strange interpretation of the 9th Article in the Treaty of March 30th, 1856, had possibly suggested it, that Article which stipulates against all interference on the part of foreign Powers between the Sultan and his people. Soon after we arrive at an elaborate despatch from the noble Earl the Secretary of State, in which, with manifest reluctance, he conforms as far as he is able to the line of Count Andrassy. But as it has long ago been stated that his concurrence was only granted at the suggestion of the Porte, who viewed the Austrian Note with horror, but thought that such participation would make it less oppressive, I need not dwell on that stage of the transaction—here the Blue Book ends. It is only about 100 pages, but it is not unimportant as it enables Consul Holmes to give that interpretation of an event which in its consequences agitates the world, for which every Capital in Europe ought to be indebted to him. My Lords, as to the Correspondence which I move for, I am anxious as far as possible to spare the Government embarrassment. It is not my aim to draw from them prematurely what has been termed the Berlin Memorandum, or any answer they have made to it: nor is it with a view to those documents that I employ the term of recent Correspondence. I allude to any Correspondence with Berlin which has taken place during the current year; and there is an obvious reason for demanding it at present. It was generally felt at the beginning of the Session, by those who had the nearest opportunities of watching the position at Constantinople or elsewhere, that the line of safety would be found in bringing the influence of Berlin to bear on those Powers which more or less upheld the insurrection. Having endeavoured to maintain that view at the beginning of the Session, for whole months I never troubled the noble Earl with any proposition or inquiry, but waited to see how far, and if at all with what results, it had been acted on. At last, during the course of May, the public learnt, with little satisfaction, that the authorities of Berlin had sanctioned a proposal which the noble Earl declined to approve. In order to gain a just impression of how we stand with Germany at present, in order to decide how far the Government have done their utmost to avert a situation much to be regretted, at least some portion of the Correspondence is essential. It is open, no doubt, for the noble Earl to say that none has taken place in the sense I have referred to; but he will hardly make such an admission. In every other case I venture to maintain the Motion ought to be acceded to, giving as it does a perfect latitude as to what shall be produced and as to the moment of producing it. My Lords, I have now said all that is strictly indispensable as connected with the Notice: and as no man can possibly predict whether the subject will again come before the House before the Session closes, any further observations I may hazard ought to be brief and hurried over. It is useless to dilate on a series of grandiose and tragical occurrences which the journalists of the day have had so many opportunities of painting. It is useless to point out at length the immense advantage which our policy derives from a revolution which at once propitiates and staggers the insurgents, checks superfluous expenditure, limits arbitrary power, secures to the best minds at Constantinople the ascendancy they wanted. Nor do I think it altogether necessary—a few days ago it seemed to be so—to contend that danger is very far from being exhausted and that until the Bosnian insurrection closes altogether, we cannot see what obligations our country might be called on to fulfil. The disposition to rather premature repose has been in some degree corrected by the attitude of Servia, of which we heard something from the other side to-night. On that point I wish to make an observation to your Lordships. Not long ago a Question was put to the Government as to the Treaty of April 15th, 1856, to which I have more than once directed the attention of the House. The noble Earl the Secretary of State did a considerable service in re-affirming its validity, which the Conference of 1871 had certainly obscured, although it did not actually impair it. The noble Earl went on to add that it was not framed in order to defend the Porte against its Vassal Principalities. I think with him that such was not the object primarily contemplated by it. But if through the medium of a Vassal Principality a foreign Power should endanger the integrity of the Porte; if a Vassal Principality invades the Porte with foreign gold to aid and foreign officers to lead it, then I should contend that the Treaty of April 15th entitles you to an influence upon the Vassal Principality you could not otherwise have aimed at. But setting aside completely the Treaty of April 15th, there is a special ground of interference as to Servia, which at a time so critical as this ought not to be forgotten. Certain Governments, not many years ago, induced the Sultan to evacuate the fortress of Belgrade, which he was at liberty to hold by the Conventions which existed. They thus became responsible to him for any future risks the measure might occasion. In 1863, when the question was much canvassed, Lord Palmerston declined to sanction that evacuation; and I am not sure whether he ever gave a greater proof of his sagacity. It took place, however, a few years after his death, with the concurrence of the Foreign Office. It involved Great Britain in an obligation to counteract as far as possible the evils which are flowing from it. It is not to be supposed that we intended to place a weapon in the hands of Servia to be employed against the Ottoman integrity we are bound by Treaty to defend, to be employed, in other words, against our objects and ourselves, without a title to control or remonstrate. It is fortunate we have at Belgrade now, in Mr. White, a Representative whom long experience at Warsaw has familiarized with great events together with their passions and vicissitudes. Supported by the noble Earl, I have no doubt he will not be found unequal to the crisis he is traversing. My Lords, with a view to salutary influence, whether at Belgrade or Bucharest, or in the regions which are more disturbed, or even in Constantinople and St. Petersburg, the measure which I venture to suggest for more consideration is that both Houses of Parliament before the Session finishes should, by a well-considered Resolution, indicate their general adherence to the Treaties of 1856. The recent language of the Government, perhaps their recent conduct, on their part has proclaimed such fidelity. But so many voices in such various directions, either by violence or ambiguity or discord, have led the European world to doubt whether Parliament is more inclined to guard or to abandon the whole position the Crimean War attained, that re-assurance seems to be essential. Had Parliament been less reserved, or better understood in 1853—it is very easy to demonstrate now that such a war would not have been imposed upon us. My Lords, one cannot leave this topic without adverting for a moment to the kind of re-establishment which the public mind has lately undergone upon it. It is now seen more clearly than it was, that the interests of Great Britain on the Bosphorus continue, whether the administration of the Porte is good or bad among its subjects. Men observe, at the same time, that the fall of the late Sultan has removed the cause of many evils which were formerly deplored and paves the way for many changes to which the throne was formerly an obstacle. They know that a force sometimes aggressive, sometimes undermining, always vigilant and subtle, has been near a final triumph on the Bosphorus. They have resolved that, come what may, that triumph shall not be effected. Among the classes of society who influence events, the spirit which existed 20 years ago appears to have revived. Its revival may be deemed among the best securities for peace, because it is among the firmest barriers against attempts by which that peace would be endangered.

Lord Campbell

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for extracts of any recent correspondence which has taken place between Her Majesty's Government and that of Berlin on the subject of the insurrection in European Turkey.—(The Lord Stratheden and Campbell.)

LORD HAMMOND: My Lords, I certainly do not rise to press Her Majesty's Government to accede to the Motion of the noble Lord, for I think nothing could be more inconvenient and embarrassing than that your Lordships should have before you a fragment of correspondence with one Power in regard to a matter in which several other Powers are engaged. But with your Lordships' permission I would wish to make some observations in regard to Turkish affairs generally. Whatever exception may be taken to the course adopted by Her Majesty's Government, and I think if they had adopted a different course, the complications in which we are involved might have been in a great measure averted, the course which Her Majesty's Government have since adopted entitles them, I would submit, to your Lordships' approval and that of the country at large; and it is satisfactory to observe that such would also seem to be the view taken of it by the Press of foreign countries in general, although a soreness, it is to be hoped only transitory, has been shown in a certain quarter. When I say that I think Her Majesty's Government would have done better by adopting a different course in the outset, I allude to the forbearance which they showed in allowing the Three Powers to assume to themselves a right to interfere in Turkish affairs to the exclusion of those countries which equally with themselves were parties to the Treaty of 1856. If this country had been admitted to their deliberations, the duration of them would have been shortened, time would not have been given for the spread of the insurrection, and an impression would not have been produced that England had become indifferent to the fate of Turkey. I have no other objection to offer to the course taken by Her Majesty's Government, so far as we are authentically informed of it. They could not have ignored the Andrassy Note when it came before them, however irregularly, for that would have been to show temper; they could not have identified themselves with it, for they had no share in drawing it up; but they rested on the ti Hamaïoum of 1856, and on the recent Declarations of the Porte in regard to improvement in its internal administration, which had, indeed, been promulgated before the Note which was forwarded to recommend it was finally issued. Her Majesty's Government, judging from what we gather from ordinary sources of information, have acted wisely in declining to take part in the other proposals of the Powers, whether direct or merely shadowed forth for the future; and also in reinforcing the British Fleet in the waters of the Archipelago, proving thereby that England was not, as had been alleged, indifferent to the maintenance of the independence and integrity of Turkey as an essential element of the balance of power in Europe. It has been the fashion to assume that the dissolution of the Turkish Empire was at hand; and in confirmation of this assumption reference has been made to the insurrection which has broken out in two remote Provinces of European Turkey, to the recent outbreak of fanaticism at Salonica, and to the pecuniary difficulties of Turkey. Much may be said in regard to the last; but it is sufficient for my present purpose to observe that those who have suffered by the insurrection would look in vain for indemnification to the dissolution of the Turkish Empire. It is not to be supposed that either the insurgents or any foreign Powers were to be substituted for it, and that the Empire would adopt its pecuniary liabilities. The outbreak at Salonica was but only one of the signs of the approaching dissolution of the Empire. My Lords, there is more vitality in Turkey than she is generally credited with. In the course of my official life I have seen her survive in difficulties which seemed to demand her immediate destruction; but she has overcome them all by her own unaided means, as she would have long overcome the present insurrection, had she only been left unfettered by the interference of foreign Powers. But in the event of the dissolution of the Turkish Empire, what would be the effect of an attempt to substitute Christian for Mussolman rule in the provinces of European Turkey. In Servia and Roumania there is, so to say, no Mussulman population, with the exception perhaps of about 5,000 in the former. I fear there is too much reason to suppose that Servia has been encouraged from other quarters to assume her present aggressive attitude; but Servia and Roumania both find in their connection with the Porte security for the autonomy which they enjoy, as included in the general guarantee of the independence and integrity of the Turkish Empire contained in the Treaty of 1856. Once deprived of this security, they would be open to occupation by foreign Powers, they would lose the autonomy which they possess, would become subject to laws which they knew not of, liable to fiscal burdens from which they are now exempt, to military service beyond their own frontier, and to the rule of foreign Governors, instead of that of their native Princes and of their present cherished Constitutional administration. With regard to the other Provinces of European Turkey, where the Mussulmans constitute about two-fifths of the whole population, it is not to be supposed that with all the material strength which they possess, they would submit without a struggle to be expelled from their homes and their possessions and give place to others whom they have hitherto considered subject to them; and we cannot but look with dismay on the desolation, ruin, and bloodshed which would be involved in such a struggle, in which fanaticism on either side would form a prominent feature. A solitude would be made, though it might be called peace. Of the conduct of the insurgents Mr. Consul Holmes, than whom no public servant that I know is more deserving of consideration for his calm and deliberate judgment, thus speaks in his despatch of the 28th of September—

"The revolt was assuredly arranged by Servian agitators and accomplished by force. The mass of the inhabitants, unarmed, had no choice. Their homes were devastated, and their lives threatened, and they were ordered to follow their leaders. And now the ruin is such that those who wish to submit cannot. They have no homes to go to, and the armed bands threaten all those who breathe or whisper of submission. These bands are all formed of a mixture of people from different parts of the country, and all mutually watch each other, to prevent any combination to submit. The ruin and devastation in the plain of Nevassine and ment should be allowed to settle their own affairs without intervention on the part of the European Powers. If, moreover, Her Majesty's Government had protested against the separate action of the Three Powers at an earlier period, they might have exposed themselves to a rebuff on the part of those Powers, and it was not desirable that a Great Power should frequently tender advice that was not accepted, or offer protests which were disregarded. He preferred to look at the policy of Her Majesty's Government from a more general point of view, and he would ask whether the Government generally, during later years, had not taken such steps and enforced such resolutions as tended to re-establish the ascendancy of England in the councils of Europe, and enabled the Government to exercise a paramount influence in the solution of great questions? He thought the policy of Her Majesty's Government in relation to Russia and the East had been of a firm, honourable, and dignified character. He might first refer to the refusal of the Government to go to St. Petersburg for the proposed discussion of the rights of belligerents—a discussion which would have been conducted under influences and upon a scene decidedly favourable to the great military States of Europe, and unfavourable to the rights and claims of the secondary Powers, and especially to those of the maritime nations. That refusal of the Government to discuss the question of belligerent rights in Russia had redounded more to the honour and credit of this country with foreign nations than had been generally acknowledged. He would next point out as honourable to the Government that great act,—the purchase of shares in the Suez Canal. No step taken by the British Government had reflected greater honour upon this country abroad and in the minds of foreign Cabinets and nations than that act. The resolution and the address that had been exhibited in the conduct of the transaction and the confidence shown in the Ministers of this country by the subjects of the Queen when they undertook this great responsibility without the knowledge of Parliament and without consulting the Legislature, were attended with excellent results in foreign countries. It was regarded as a great proof of that community of patriotic action which animated all classes and parties of our countrymen when the interests of England were at stake. By purchasing an interest in the Suez Canal the Government had given a signal and conspicuous proof that in no circumstances would they hesitate to maintain the paramount influence and interests of this country in the East. Moreover, the favourable impression which this policy had created abroad had been confirmed by the refusal of the Government to assent to the Berlin Memorandum. The Government by that act showed that they regarded their obligations to Turkey as serious, and that they were determined to respect the rights and independence of the Turkish Government. This favourable impression had been further confirmed by the despatch of the British naval force to the Mediterranean. It might be contended that this measure was not necessary, because the contingencies which might call the forces of England into action had not actually occurred, and that there was no probability that those contingencies would arise. It was true that no overt attack on the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire had been made, and he did not think that any had been intended. On the other hand, the action of England was not required in the case of mere internal disturbances in the Ottoman Empire. It was possible to imagine a rising in Roumania, or Turkestan, or Mesopotamia, in which no European interests were involved, and which might be left to be dealt with by the parties concerned. There might even be insurrections nearer Europe, or the revolt of a Greek island, with which it would not be the duty of the English Government to interfere; and there might be a revolt of Turkish provinces which might not bring our guarantees into action at all. Between, however, the overt attacks of a foreign Power and the simple insurrection of a Turkish province there might be another description of agitation of a very obvious and mixed character which might evoke a serious discussion as to whether our responsibilities and guarantees were involved, and whether our intervention might not be necessary on the ground of national policy. This was not the first time that questions of intervention by European Powers in the affairs of Turkey had arisen. When an insurrection broke out in the Turkish dominions that seemed to Russia to be prejudicial and hostile to her interests, she made no difficulty in interfering by force of arms. When Syria was seriously invaded by the Egyptian army, and Turkey itself was threatened, the Russian Government sent an Ambassador to Constantinople, and signed the Treaty of Unkius Skelessi. The same thing occurred in 1840, when an invasion of Turkey was threatened by the Ruler of Egypt, and when the British Government made no difficulty in securing, by an alliance of the Three Powers, the restoration of tranquillity and peace in the Turkish dominions. We could not say there might not be such an insurrection in the dominions of the Sultan, stimulated and aided by foreign sympathy and foreign support, that it might not be the policy of this country, as it had already been, to interfere even by force of arms, in combination with its allies, for the authority of the Sultan. And it was not only on the score of feeling that such a necessity might arise. The Levant had always been the scene of unexpected and unforeseen catastrophes and surprises. He need only ask their Lordships to remember Navarino, the great defection of the Turkish fleet in 1839, the massacre of Sinope, and the rupture of the Black Sea Treaty by Russia in 1870. Might not unforeseen occurrences and emergencies again arise? In the prospect of such emergencies he did not think they ought to withhold their meed of approval from the Government for rapidly concentrating our naval forces in the waters of the Levant—for we could not see at what moment aid might not be required either for the assistance of our allies, or the defence of national interests which were to us of the highest importance. No doubt some might say the conduct of the Government was justifiable with reference to our engagements while they lasted, but that it would be desirable, so far as it was consistent with national engagements and honour, to withdraw from our position with reference to Turkey, lest it should be found not only an impossible, but also an unjust one. If he believed the interests of religious toleration, the cause of general human progress and improvement, the cause of political and commercial freedom were identical with the action of the Christian insurgents in Turkey, and of the Christian races generally in Turkey; and if he believed that the Turkish Government was hopelessly antagonistic to those interests, he should be the last to argue in favour of the maintenance of our present policy. But he thought exactly the contrary was the case at the present moment. He entirely agreed with what had been said by his noble Friend near him (Lord Hammond); and as one of the few survivors of the period of diplomatic intervention, through the Embassy at Constantinople, he would remind their Lordships that at no period had our Government or our Embassy been really indifferent to the cause of Christian improvement. As one who had served at the Embassy he was conversant with the course pursued by it and the Embassies of other Powers, and our Government had always taken the lead in aid of Christian interests and in the rights of religious toleration and equality, and had sometimes been the only advocate of them. In illustration of this the noble Lord quoted a passage from an interesting letter written by an eminent Russian diplomatist, in which he sketched the policies of different Ambassadors and described the leading feature of English policy as solicitude for the interests and improvement of the Turkish people. He could not admit that the principle of religious toleration was to be sought for on the side of the Christian population. On the contrary, he believed if they were prematurely admitted to exclusive power, it would be exercised in the most intolerant and oppressive manner. An indication of this probability had been furnished by the treatment of the Turkish population in Greece; and he feared that if the Christians became dominant in Roumania, Bulgaria, and other European States their ascendancy would be marked by persecution exceeding any that had accompanied Turkish rule. Whereas every step taken by the Turkish Government under the influence of European Powers would be a step towards toleration and respect for the rights of others, Christian ascendancy would probably produce government of a different character and tendency. Nor did he think that free trade or general improvement would be promoted more by Oriental Christians than under Musulman rule. The trade of England with Persia and Central Asia, the maintenance of our communication with India, and the British capital invested in public works in India, were considerations which testified to our great interest in the maintenance of the independence and integrity of the Turkish Empire, coupled with the adoption of those improvements which he believed the Turkish Government was able and willing to make in its administration. Therefore he trusted the Government would not commit themselves too positively to the affirmation of the principle that under no circumstances could it become the policy of England to interfere for the restoration of tranquillity within the dominions of the Sultan; and he trusted they would continue to recognize, as the true policy of England, perseverance in that course which was so energetically and ably laid down in times past by Lord Palmerston as the course that ought to be pursued by England in the East.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I certainly cannot find any fault with my noble Friend who has raised this discussion, for having, in the exercise of his discretion brought before your Lordships the general state of Eastern Affairs. There is no doubt that they are exciting deep and general interest not only in England, but throughout Europe; and while, on the part of the Government, I acknowledge—as I am bound to do—with gratitude “the prudent and patriotic reticence and reserve,” to quote a phrase used by the Prime Minister, which Parliament has observed, I have no right to object, and I do not object, when any noble Lord chooses to take the opportunity of expressing his views as to what the Government ought to do or to leave undone in the present position of affairs. I should be extremely ungrateful if I made any objection of the kind on the present occasion, because, almost without exception, every remark which has fallen from the three noble Lords who have spoken has been in a sense friendly and complimentary to the policy of Her Majesty’s Government. On the other hand, I hope I shall not be charged with disrespect to this House or discourtesy to any Member of it, if I do not, in my turn, take the opportunity of explaining and justifying in detail the policy which we have pursued. Everyone who has watched the course of foreign affairs must have observed how very much more is made of the words of persons in official position than those words really implied; and how often it happens that a word casually dropped in debate—perhaps elicited by something which has passed in the course of discussion—has some significance attached to it, some construction put upon it, which was never intended by the speaker; and how often a phrase, used with a very simple and innocent meaning, is construed as implying something which it is not at all convenient to have imputed to the Representative of any Government. There is another reason why a full discussion is not at present possible—it would require as a preliminary that the Papers relating to what has passed should be before your Lordships, and that your Lordships should have had time to consider them. The production of these Papers, which has often been promised, has been unavoidably delayed; but they shall be laid before Parliament during the present Session, and in time for a full discussion of them, if such a discussion be thought desirable. But to lay them at the present moment on the Table would be premature and inconvenient; and, moreover, they could only be produced in a very fragmentary form. I cannot, therefore, assent to the Motion of my noble Friend (Lord Campbell). That Motion, I think, was only made for the purpose of exciting a discussion, and it is the less necessary that I should follow my noble Friend through his review of the past state of affairs, because I think that generally what he said was in favour of the course which has been pursued. My noble Friend adverted to three points—he spoke of the movement in the Herzegovina having been to a great extent directed from outside the Turkish Empire. That is a matter on which I do not care to differ with him. Next he said that the Austrian intervention was not to be justified according to the terms of the Treaty of 1856. Well, that intervention has come and gone, and the question whether it was or was not strictly within the limits of the Treaty of 1856 is now mainly an historical one. As to the third point—namely, the course which ought to be adopted towards the Government of Turkey in certain contingencies which my noble Friend defined beforehand, that may be an interesting question for him to raise, but he would hardly expect that either I or any person holding my office should enter upon a discussion of what ought to be done in the hypothetical case which he put. But there was one suggestion of a practical character that he threw out. If I rightly understood him, he recommended that a Resolution should be passed by both Houses of Parliament asserting the maintenance of the policy of the Crimean War. I am quite aware that in making that recommendation my noble Friend intends only to strengthen and support Her Majesty's Government, and I am grateful to him for that intention; but I think that, upon reflection, he will see that the course which he proposes is one that would be open to considerable inconvenience of a practical kind. In the first place, I do not think that the course he suggested could be adopted by the Government without raising considerable discussion and great difference of opinion; and I am afraid it would follow that the difference of opinion that would be so manifested would create an appearance of even greater division than actually exists. Further, the state of things in 1856 was not the same as it is in 1876. An abstract Resolution, founded on an historical question, is not a convenient mode of dealing with events as they really occur; and if a Resolution such as he proposed were not couched in language so vague and general as to be almost unmeaning, it would tie the hands of the Government in an inconvenient degree. I am not called upon to comment on the speech of my noble Friend who spoke second in the debate (Lord Hammond), to whom I listened with the greatest possible interest, remembering as I do that he was my earliest instructor in matters of foreign policy, of which I have grateful recollections. He, as far as I could follow him, threw out some suggestions as to our conduct which I heard with attention and respect. As regards the past, I do not think my noble Friend found any fault with what we had done except that he thought that instead of allowing the Three Powers in a recent transaction to formulate their ideas and place them before us, and then expressing our dissent, it would have been better if we had insisted on having a voice in the deliberations in the first instance. I do not, however, think that if we had done that it would have practically altered the course of events. Let it not be supposed that the influence of this country in European affairs was not felt. No one could think that really was the case who witnessed the extreme anxiety shown by all parties when the Austrian proposition of January was still in doubt. The noble Lord (Lord Napier and Ettrick) who succeeded my noble Friend has left me nothing to reply to. But I do not think I should be acting with courtesy to your Lordships if I sat down without making a very brief statement of the present position of Eastern matters as far as Her Majesty's Government are concerned. I need not go back to the time of the Austrian Note, to which we gave our assent, although not very sanguine as to its producing the effect expected from it; nor is it necessary to do more than allude to that Memorandum or Minute agreed upon at Berlin between Austria, Russia, and Germany, and which subsequently received the assent of France and Italy. We thought the propositions which it embodied open to objection, we stated our objections, and we declined to take part in it. For a time, therefore, we were in a position of isolation from the rest of Europe. The events which followed have in a great measure altered our position in that respect. When, by a bloodless revolution, the late Sultan had been deposed and his successor placed on the Throne, every one felt that in the case of a country where so much depends on the personal character and will of the Sovereign, it was a matter of course that time should be allowed to the new Sultan and his advisers to consider their position, and to take the initiative in passing such reforms and concessions as they might think likely to bring about a pacification. That was the view taken by all the Powers; and the Note which had been drawn up, founded on the Berlin agreement, was accordingly not presented. I do not know that it has been formally abandoned, but its presentation has been indefinitely adjourned—which is much the same thing. The cause of disunion between England and the other Powers is therefore removed, and we are all free, if we think fit, to enter into fresh attempts at mediation, either collectively or separately. We are not yet informed what the propositions of the Porte for a reform of the internal administration of Turkey are likely to be, and considering the enormous difficulty of the work, I do not think we ought to be impatient. It is too early to say what we have to expect from a new reign, but I will not hesitate to state my conviction that the transfer of power from the late to the present Sultan, though an act not in any way in the slightest degree due to foreign advice or influence, was an act justified by the presence of a great public danger, and by the proved impossibility of hoping for any real reform in administration under the late reign. It has been put about that the revolution which has been accomplished is a triumph of the fanatical or anti-Christian party. Such, in my belief, is the very reverse of the truth. The late Sultan caused universal discontent, not by concessions to the Christian population, but by bankruptcy, by maladministration, and by the abuses of every kind which were allowed to grow up; and, according to my information, the change has been as popular among the Christian as among the Turkish populations of the Empire. The situation, then, is this. The Porte has been encouraged to negotiate directly with the Insurgents. The result of those negotiations is not and cannot yet be known. They may succeed, or they may fail. If they succeed, there is nothing more to be said or done by the Powers. If they fail, and hostilities begin again, we are free to interpose our mediation if, or when, we think it likely to be useful, or to abstain for the time altogether if we see no reasonable prospect of success. That any advice which we give will be disinterested it is hardly necessary to say. I cannot, of course, affirm that it will be taken—but I think it will be listened to by the Porte as the advice of a friendly Power, and by Europe as the opinion of a Power which wants nothing except the maintenance of peace. My Lords, I do not know whether any words of mine are likely to have weight, but I would deprecate if I might all hasty and hostile criticism of the conduct of foreign Powers. The situation is very complicated. Even in countries not possessing Parliamentary Government, public opinion is a force which must be taken into account; and, for my part, I see no reason to doubt that all the great Powers, without exception, would be glad to bring about the end of a quarrel which has in it so many elements of danger, not to Turkey alone, but to other States. For us, our general line of action is clear. We would gladly reconcile, if we could, the Porte and its insurgent provinces; but we have, as I conceive, no right and no wish to take part with one against the other in a purely internal quarrel. That is the rule on which we have acted, in times not remote and in the case of civil wars far more extensive and more sanguinary. I do not wish to lay down that rule as absolutely and universally binding. Human affairs are too complex and too changeable to be regulated by any formula, but it is our general principle of action, and, I think, a sound one. We feel bound, as I have said, to leave to the Porte the initiative in its own affairs; but we have been and are in communication both with the Porte and with other Powers with a view to offer such counsels as seem to us likely to be useful. I have heard it suggested that we are supposed to be thinking too much of the interest of the Turks, and too little of that of the non-Mahomedan races. I am utterly unaware of any foundation for that charge. No one supposes that the maintenance of the Ottoman Empire in any form within Europe is possible if there is to be permanent disaffection and discontent among the Christian races. They are in European Turkey a majority too numerous and too powerful by intelligence and wealth to be kept down by mere force. That is as well understood by every person who has any claim to be called a statesman at Constantinople as it is here. The problem to be solved is how to reconcile their reasonable wishes and claims with the maintenance of that general system to which all Europe is pledged, and which cannot be overthrown without a general convulsion extending far beyond European limits, and leading to many complications which we can hardly foresee. It is one thing to say at any given moment—"We will not try to mediate, because our interposition would probably do no good," and it is quite another to lay down as a general rule that we have nothing to do with the matter, and will let events take their course. The former course may be one dictated by reason and prudence.

the latter is the language, as it seems to me, not of statesmanship, but of mere indolence and despair.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) must be perfectly aware that there was great anxiety on this question in the public mind, and that it was therefore very desirable that information should be given on the subject; but after the statement of the noble Earl that, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, it was not desirable to give further information than they had given, and after the promise made in that and the other House of Parliament that information would be given at no very distant period, he had not the slightest wish to press Her Majesty's Government on that point. With regard to their policy, even if he wished to refrain from blaming Her Majesty's Government he had this difficulty—he did not know exactly what they were doing or what their policy was. A noble Lord (Lord Napier) had referred to a matter which was only indirectly connected with the subject of the insurrection in the Turkish Provinces—namely, the purchase by Her Majesty's Government of Suez Canal shares. He (Earl Granville) was not a great admirer of that transaction, and up to the present moment he had not seen the great political results which might have been expected from it. With regard to the question of the Berlin Memorandum, he thought Her Majesty's Government were right in not adhering to that Memorandum. He was, indeed, in ignorance at that moment what that Memorandum was, and he must reserve his opinion upon it till he had further information. With regard to the sending of a Fleet to Besika Bay, we did not know whether that course was adopted at the suggestion of any other Power, or what was the motive which influenced Her Majesty's Government in taking that course; and therefore, until he was aware of all the circumstances of the case, he thought their Lordships would agree that he was right in reserving his opinion on that subject. Those who sat on that side of the House were not in the slightest degree negligent of the important interests which Great Britain had in the settlement of the question. On the other hand, it should be understood that they would not refuse to co-operate in any course which might clearly lead to the most efficacious means of maintaining peace, and of arriving at a satisfactory settlement of this question. But above all it should be understood that those on that side of the House were not unmindful of the obligations which Turkey took upon itself by the Treaty of 1856 with regard to its Christian subjects. He was very glad to hear the assurance given by the noble Earl that Her Majesty's Government would use their influence derived from that Treaty in seeing that justice was administered by the Turkish Government with regard to the Christian population.

LORD CAMPBELL said, that after the statement of the noble Earl the Secretary of State he would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

REGISTRY OF DEEDS OFFICE (IRELAND)—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce, this Session, a Bill effecting alterations in the working of the Registry of Deeds Office (Ireland); and, if so, whether inducements will be held out to the officials in this and other public departments where the recommendations of the Playfair Commission are not in operation, to retire on pension; and, whether the Treasury is at present prepared to entertain applications for retirement on pension from those officials?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, that the Government intended, if possible, to bring in a Bill that Session in regard to the working of the Registry of Deeds Office (Ireland), and, if not, early next Session. If the legislation took the form of a reduction of the Staff, the ordinary rules applicable to the public service would be applied to the Office in question.

SCOTLAND—FATAL FIRE IN AYR. QUESTION.

LORD LINDSAY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the unfortunate fire which occurred in a cotton mill in Ayr, by which a large number of lives have been lost; and, if he is rendering such assistance as is necessary to enable the inspector and the jury to ascertain the reason why these work-people were unable to make their escape?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that immediately after the occurrence of the fire the Procurator Fiscal made a searching inquiry into the origin of the fire, and of the causes which led to so great a loss of life. On account of the great difficulty of approaching the ruins, and of recovering the bodies, the inquiry had not yet been completed. Every assistance was being given by the town authorities, and if it should appear that there had been any neglect of the provisions of the Factory Act by the proprietors of the mill, the Inspector would be at once communicated with; but, so far as the inquiry had gone, there did not appear to be any ground for such a suspicion. The Lord Advocate had put himself in communication with the Procurator Fiscal on the subject, and it would receive the utmost attention.

ARMY—THE MONCRIEFF SYSTEM OF ARTILLERY.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BERESFORD asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will lay upon the Table of the House a communication, dated July 8th, 1875, giving Major Moncrieff reasons for recommending the further development of his system of artillery, and requesting inquiry?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: It is not the custom to publish ex parte statements of gentlemen who communicate with the Public Offices without the publication (which would be manifestly improper) of confidential replies made to them by the officers of the Department.

INDIA—MADRAS IRRIGATION COM- PANY.—QUESTION.

MR. SMOLLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether interest has been paid upon the debenture debt due to Government by the Madras Irrigation Company for the years 1874 and 1875, a period during which repayments of the principal sums due have been postponed as a matter of grace and favour by the Secretary of State, or whether any interest on this debenture debt has ever been paid since 1866; whether it be true that the sums needed for the working of the navigation and irrigation canals of this Company have been defrayed for some years by the Government of India, less the receipts from the works; and, if so, why this charge is met by the Indian Exchequer while the undertaking is in the possession of private parties; whether there is any present intention on the part of the Secretary of State for India to receive a transfer of these works from the existing shareholders, and to guarantee payment of the private debenture debts, understood to be very considerable; and, whether he will undertake, before the works are acquired, to place upon the Table of the House a Return showing distinctly the actual indebtedness of this undertaking?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, no interest has been paid by the Madras Irrigation Company upon the debenture debt due to the Government, which debt was contracted upon an Act of Parliament. The receipts from the irrigation do not equal the working expenses, and the sum necessary to meet the deficiency has been advanced out of the revenues of India; but the Company has been informed that no further advances will be made on this account. In any negotiations which may be entered into, the main object of the Government will be to reduce the annual burden which has been imposed upon the Indian Treasury by the agreements which have been entered into with the Company. If the hon. Gentleman wishes for further information as to the income and indebtedness of the Company, and will move for such a Return, we shall be glad to give him any information which it may be in our power to grant.

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS (IRELAND)—CASE OF MICHAEL MOYNA.

QUESTION.

MR. W. JOHNSTON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the Petition of Michael Moyna, formerly teacher of Three Mile House National School, county Monaghan, presented to this House on the 28th April last; and, whether he will cause an inquiry into the whole circumstances connected with his leaving Ireland, with a view to his restoration to his former position as a teacher under the National Board?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH: Yes, Sir, my attention has been called to the Petition in question. The teacher, Michael Moyna, was dismissed not only for infringing the regulations of the National Board on Education by taking active part in the election of Poor Law Guardians in his district, but also for breaking the law by signing to voting papers the names of voters who were dead, and witnessing them in his own name. After his dismissal he left Ireland for America, of course, at his own option; and under all the circumstances I do not think it would be advisable that he should be restored to his position in the employment of the National Board of Education.

ARMY — THE GRENADIER GUARDS—DEATH OF COLOUR-SERGEANT BROWN.

QUESTION.

MR. J. HOLMS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that Sergeant Brown, of the 3rd Battalion of Grenadier Guards, on returning from exercise at Wormwood Scrubs on or about the 12th instant, was suddenly taken ill, and died in hospital; and, whether he will state if an inquest has been held; and, if not, why not?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, Colour-Sergeant Brown, 3rd Battalion Grenadier Guards, was taken ill on parade immediately after return of the battalion from Wormwood Scrubs; he was admitted to hospital, and died about 4½ hours after admission from apoplexy. As he had been treated in the hospital, and as his death was from natural causes, the surgeon major of the battalion did not consider that there was anything to justify him in applying for a coroner's inquest.

INLAND REVENUE—OUT-DOOR EXCISE ESTABLISHMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. MONK asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reference to the Recommendations of the Civil Service Commissioners, dated the 23rd day of July 1875, as to the Out-door Excise Establishment, and of the Treasury Minute relating thereto, dated the 15th day of March last, When the alterations decided upon will take effect?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he trusted the hon. Gentleman would not think him wanting in courtesy if he declined to answer the Question. The recommendations dated July, 1875, were in the hands of the House; but in regard to the Treasury Minute, it had never been made public, and there was very great inconvenience in Questions being publicly put on matters involving large interests in relation to the Civil Service.

NAVY—THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION — THE ADMIRALTY INSTRUCTIONS. QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House the Admiralty instructions to Captain Nares, and also those given to Mr. Allen Young, for whom a sum of £8,000 is to be taken in Vote 14 of the Navy Estimates, under the head of "Communication with the Arctic Expeditions by Mr. Allen Young?"

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, that the Instructions had already been laid on the Table.

QUESTION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been drawn to the case of Henry Jacobs and John Scott, two seamen, who were reported to have jumped overboard in the Thames from the ship "Cullmon" rather than go to sea when they found to whom the ship belonged, and are now undergoing six months' imprisonment for so doing; and, whether he will direct that the shipping master before whom the men sign articles should make the men acquainted with the names of the owners before they sign articles?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, my attention has been called to the case of Henry Jacobs and John Scott, who jumped into the river at Gravesend to get into a boat to desert from the Cal-lirrhoe, not Cullmon, as the ship is named in the Question. They were pursued and taken before the Mayor and sentenced to six weeks imprisonment — not six months as stated by the hon. Gentleman. They could not have truly pleaded that they had not known the owner of the ship, as, before they signed the articles at Tower Hill, they were, as is always done, fully informed of the owner's and master's name. For the same reason I cannot direct shipping masters to give such information generally, as they are bound to give it always, and in fact always do give it. This case, among many others, involving great loss to the ship and the fraud besides of making off with advance notes, shows the necessity of stringent punishment for desertion. The Mayor of Gravesend, who tried the case, expressed his opinion that these men had joined with the purpose of desertion, to get their advance notes, and repeat the trick.

METROPOLIS—PAVING, CLEANSING, AND LIGHTING.—QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether, under the Metropolis Local Management Act, powers were given to the Metropolitan Board of Works not only for the purposes of sewerage and drainage, but also in respect of the paving, cleansing, and lighting of the Metropolis; and, if so, whether his attention has been drawn to the state of the streets in some parts of the Metropolis, especially in the Knightsbridge district; and, whether some better arrangement cannot be made for cleansing and purifying the great thoroughfares?

SIR JAMES HOGG: Sir, in answer to the Question of my hon. Friend, I have to inform him that under the Metropolis Local Management Acts the powers as to paving, watering, and lighting streets were expressly placed under the control and management of the Vestries and District Boards, and not of the Metropolitan Board of Works; and that in every Act extending the powers of the Metropolitan Board as to making new streets, the obligation has been put on the last-named Board to give up the streets when completed to the Vestries and District Boards, to be managed by them as to paving, watering, and lighting. I should state that as regards two of the Thames Embankment roadways these provisions originally inserted in the Acts have been altered by Parliament, and they have been placed under the control of the Metropolitan Board for all purposes.

TURKEY—ALLEGED MASSACRE IN BULGARIA.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The House will, I trust, allow me to make a few observations in explanation of the Question which I wish to ask the Prime Minister, and of which I have given him Notice, respecting the atrocities alleged to have been committed by the Turkish troops in Bulgaria, and especially described in a letter printed in The Daily News of last Friday. Many hon. Members will have read that letter, but for the information of those who have not, I may state that it described with much detail the total destruction of many villages and the massacre of their inhabitants, men, women, and children, by Turkish troops. Those troops are stated to have been generally irregulars, but the name of a Turkish Pasha is given as implicated in the outrages, and it would not appear that the inhabitants of these villages were actually in rebellion. As a rule I should not think of asking the Government a Question either with regard to the treatment by a foreign Government of its subjects or as regards the correctness of anonymous statements in any newspaper, however respectable and influential; but it seems to me important, in forming an opinion on affairs in Turkey, in which we appear just now to be unfortunately much involved, that if allegations such as I have stated are true we should be aware of them, and that if false we should not be misled by them. I should not be acting fairly to the House if I did not add that since last Friday I have received information, not from the office of The Daily News, but from a quarter which is certainly not prejudiced against the Turkish Government, which information appears to me to confirm the substantial truth of these distressing statements. This, however, only makes me the more anxious to know whether the Government have obtained from official sources any contradiction or confirmation, and I, therefore, beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether he can give the House any information with regard to the truth of the statements which have recently appeared in the public papers, and especially in the "Daily News" of June 23rd, respecting the cruelties alleged to have been committed by the Turkish troops in the suppression of the insurrection in Bulgaria?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, we have no information in our possession which justifies the statements to which the right hon. Gentleman refers. Some time ago, when troubles first commenced in Bulgaria, they appear to have begun by strangers entering the country and burning the villages without reference to religion or race. The Turkish Government at that time had no Regular troops in Bulgaria, and the inhabitants, of course, were obliged to defend themselves. The persons who are called Bashi-Bazouks and Circassians are persons who had settled in the country and had a stake in it. I have not the slightest doubt myself that the war, if you can call it a war, between the invaders and the Bashi-Bazouks and Circassians was carried on with great ferocity. One can easily understand, under the circumstances under which these outrages occurred, and with such populations, that that might happen. I am told that no quarter was given, and no doubt scenes took place which we must all entirely deplore. But in the month of May the attention of Sir Henry Elliot was called to this state of things from some information which reached him, and he immediately communicated with the Porte, who at once ordered some Regular troops to repair to Bulgaria, and steps to be taken by which the action of the Bashi-Bazouks and Circassians might be arrested. Very shortly after, the disturbances in Bulgaria seem to have ceased. That is all the information I have to give the right hon. Gentleman on the subject, and I will merely repeat that the information which we have at various times received does not justify the statements made in the journal which he has named.

ARMY MEDICAL OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

DR. WARD asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is true that Medical Officers who were appointed by His Royal Highness the Commander in Chief to the medical charge of regiments for five years, prior to the issue of the last new Warrant of April 1876, are to be removed from those regiments and sent on Foreign Service before the completion of said period of five years?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Yes, Sir, they are; as by the recent medical Warrant of the 28th of April, 1876, the Department has become unified, and the paragraph attaching medical officers to regiments for five years, as a rule, under the Warrant of 1873, has been abolished. All medical officers, whether formerly attached to regiments or depôt brigades, or not, are now placed on one general roster, according to their service at home, sending abroad first those who have served at home longest. I may mention that the first of these has not served out of this country for 15 years.

INDIA—ACTS OF THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House, Copies of the Acts passed by the Indian Legislature, either from time to time or periodically?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, until 1858 it was the practice to lay Acts of the Legislative Council of India upon the Table of the House, and I do not know why the practice was discontinued. There will be no objection to lay in future, upon the Table of the House Indian Acts after they have received the sanction of the Secretary of State for India.

TURKEY—THE PLAGUE IN BAGDAD.
QUESTION.

MR. TWELLS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If his attention has been directed to the alarming reports circulated of the existence of plague in Bagdad, and to state what reports concerning the disease and mortality Her Majesty's Government has received from Her Majesty's Consul General at Bagdad, and the present sanitary condition of that city and the neighbourhood; and, further, to inquire if the stringent quarantine restrictions imposed by the Turkish and Egyptian authorities against ships arriving in the Red Sea from the Persian Gulf have been strictly in accordance with duly notified regulations, and if British shipping and shipping of all other nations have alike been impartially subjected to them?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that the attention of the Government had some time ago been called to the subject of the hon. Gentleman's Question, and that reports had been received from Her Majesty's Consul at Bagdad with respect to it. The first disease which broke out did not appear to have been the plague, but some other form of epidemic; a report, however, had been lately received which stated that it had turned into that very dreadful disease. The last Report on the subject was received yesterday, and it was dated at Bagdad the day before. According to that, it appeared that the disease might be said to be to a great extent worn out. It was to this effect—"No deaths in Bagdad from plague during last three days. Health generally good." The number of deaths in February, and in March, he might add, was 259, in April 1,717, in May 1,550, while in June they were only 143, making a total of 3,669. According to Dr. Coiville, the resident doctor at Bagdad, he said it was the real plague, and that it had been brought into the city from the low country lying between the Tigris and Euphrates, but he did not consider quarantine to be necessary in the case of passengers, although it might be with regard to the sending of wool. As to the restrictions on shipping, complaints had been made by the British Consul at Jeddo to the Turkish and Egyptian authorities, that British shipping was subjected to vexatious quarantine regulations which were not imposed on the vessels of other nations, and a correspondence on the point had for some time been going on with the Turkish Government. He need hardly assure his hon. Friend that the Government would use every exertion to obtain for British shipping the favourable treatment to which it was entitled.

CHANNEL ISLANDS—THE JERSEY STATES.—QUESTION.

MR. LOCKE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is competent for the Jersey States to criticize the enactments of the Imperial Legislature, and question the propriety of Orders in Council legally and regularly made; if not, whether steps will be taken to protect the privileges and dignity of Parliament?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he could only refer the hon. and learned Gentleman to the Report of the Royal Commission which inquired into the laws of Jersey in 1847. From that Report it appeared that the Jersey States had legislative power, and that the form which this authority now assumed was that of Orders of Her Majesty in Council. The Orders were registered in the Royal Court, and were not binding in law until such registration was effected. This was settled by the Code of 1771. It was, however, declared by the same Code that it was competent for the Royal Court, in any case where the Order in Council appeared to be contrary to the charters or privileges of the Jersey States to suspend the registration until the pleasure of the Crown was further taken; although, if the Crown did not withdraw the Order, it must be registered.

THE "MISTLETOE"—FURTHER INQUIRY.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will consult with the Law Officers of the Crown as to applying to the Gosport Coroner's Jury on the "Mistletoe" disaster the precedent that has just been successfully adopted in the Balham case, and move for a writ ad melius inquirendum, so as to institute a complete inquiry under a new Commission?

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he thought the hon. Member would see on reflection that there was no analogy between the two cases. In the case of the Balham inquiry the Court had quashed the inquisition and ordered the coroner to hold a second inquiry into the circumstances of the case; whereas in the case of the Mistletoe a second inquiry had already been held by another Court.

CRAB AND LOBSTER FISHERIES (NORFOLK) BILL.—QUESTION.

Mr. MELDON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in the event of the Motion to refer the Crab and Lobster Fisheries (Norfolk) Bill to a Select Committee being withdrawn, the Government are prepared to advise the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the necessity for legislation with the view of protecting the Crab and Lobster Fisheries throughout the United Kingdom?

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the Crab and Lobster Fisheries (Norfolk) Bill was founded on an inquiry made by the Fishery Inspectors. It had the unanimous approval of the fishermen and of the owners of fisheries, and therefore he should like to have it passed, if possible, this Session. He was perfectly willing, however, that in the Recess an inquiry should be instituted by the Inspectors for the whole Kingdom, so that next year a Bill not limited to Norfolk, but operating throughout the United Kingdom, might be introduced.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I believe that the course of the Business of this House for the present week was stated to this House on Friday last by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I have no Question therefore, to ask on the subject. I wish, however, to ask the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government a Question with reference to a Notice which has been placed on the Table by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), relating to the Papers on the subject of the Extradition correspondence with the United States. The Question I wish to ask is, Whether it will be in the power of the right hon. Gentleman to give any facilities to my hon. and learned Friend to bring on that discussion? My hon. and learned Friend will, of course, if necessary, take his own chance of bringing forward that discussion, but I wish to point out that my hon. and learned Friend could have no opportunity of doing so for a month at least, and it is very likely that he might fail altogether. Looking to the importance of the subject and the desirability of having a discussion on it, I consider that neither of these contingencies would be desirable. I also wish to ask whether, now that the last set of Papers relating to Egyptian affairs has been laid on the Table, the right hon. Gentleman will name a day on which he proposes to take the discussion on the Vote for the expenses of Mr. Cave's mission? I have also been requested by many of my Friends to ask, whether it will be in the power of the right hon. Gentleman to make a statement as to the intentions of the Government respecting the University Bills? I know that in the arrangements of the Government for this week those Bills are not included. I do not ask the Government to state precisely on what day they will bring them forward; but it may be in the power of the right hon. Gentleman to say, in the event of the Business set down for this week being disposed of, what is the next important Business which it is the intention of the Government to take up?

Mr. DISRAELI: Sir, I propose to place the Cambridge Bill on the Paper as the First Order of the Day for Thursday, the 6th of July. With reference to the noble Lord's inquiry respecting the Extradition Papers and the Motion contemplated by the hon. and learned Gentleman, I would observe that those Papers are not yet completed. We ought, before discussing the question, to have before us the despatch of Mr. Secretary Fish, and also the answer of Her Majesty's Government. The answer of Her Majesty's Government to that despatch is written, but has not yet been sent, though, probably, it will be sent immediately. With regard to giving facilities to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford, I may say it is always my duty and pleasure to assist the course of Public Business; but I should hardly like to fix any day for the discussion of the subject until I have seen the terms of the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman. He has only given Notice of a Motion without stating what the Motion is to be, and, of course, at this period of the Session, I must weigh the circumstances which may influence me in advancing other measures before I can indulge myself in the pleasure of obliging the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite. Of course, when I see the Motion, I will state the course which the Government may think it their duty to take with respect to it. Under the circumstances, I think it is desirable that before the House consider the question they should be in possession of two of the most important documents which the issue had produced—namely, the statement of the case of the United States Foreign Minister and the answer of Her Majesty's Government. With reference to the third inquiry of the noble Lord respecting the discussion on the question of the Suez Canal and the mission of Mr. Cave, I would also remark that, although the Papers connected immediately with the purchase of the Canal are complete and are in the possession of the House, yet a great many other Papers will be presented which are immediately connected with the surtax question and also with the administration of the Canal, and which I think it desirable that the House should possess before we enter into any discussion. Therefore, I will only say at present that I will take care ample Notice is given to the noble Lord and his Friends before we ask for a Vote.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

MR. DISRAELI: I have now to move that this House do immediately resolve itself into a Committee of Supply. It is a formal Motion made in consequence of Supply being a dropped Order from the House terminating its sitting rather abruptly on Friday. I mention this because a misapprehension has existed in some quarters as to the nature of this Motion as if it were an invasion of the privileges of hon. Members. Every privilege of hon. Members may be exercised as usual on the Question being put from the Chair.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Disraeli

Resolved, That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply.—(Mr. Disraeli.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ADMINISTRATION OF THE NAVY.

MOTION FOR A ROYAL COMMISSION.

CAPTAIN PIM rose to move—

"That, considering the present administration of the Admiralty is practically that introduced and adopted by this House in 1833, on the recommendation of Sir James Graham, and considering the advance made in Naval armaments and the unsatisfactory condition of the personnel and materiel of Her Majesty's Navy, it is desirable that a Royal Commission be appointed to inquire and report whether the present system under which the Navy is administered is the most efficient and most economical, and what improvements or amendments, if any, it would be desirable should be introduced."

The hon. and gallant Member said, that the wretched state of our Navy was every day becoming more notorious, and people began to understand that never before were our ships so indifferent and our officers and men so little cared for, and consequently so discontented. The House voted plenty of money to give the country a splendid Navy and the command of the seas; but under the present system this money was to a great extent wasted. When, in 1833, Sir James Graham, then at the head of the Admiralty, re-organized the administration and civil departments of the Admiralty in a fluctuating Board of Admiralty, personal responsibility as well as every check to extravagance came to an end. The effect of this change was anticipated at the time by every one experienced in the administration of naval affairs. Mr. John Wilson Croker, speaking on an experience at the Admiralty of 22 years, denounced the proposed change in strong terms, and said—

"That if such a system were adopted he knew what must happen—the subordinate or executive chief of the Department must obey without remonstrance, and they could be subject to no responsibility. What with despotic command on the one hand, and servile subordination on the other, all checks would be at an end, and responsibility nowhere exist."

And similar opinions were expressed by such men as Mr. Goulburn, Admiral Sir Byam Martin, Sir George Cockburn, and other eminent persons. Well, what had been the result of the re-organization of the Admiralty by Sir James Graham? The consequence had been that our naval expenditure had increased from £4,500,000 in 1833, to an expenditure, on an average of 10 years, of £11,000,000 a-year. No doubt, the amount voted was of secondary importance, if only the Navy were kept in really efficient order; but the degree of inefficiency to which we had arrived only too clearly indicated the waste of this money. As to the personnel of the Navy, he deeply regretted to say there was not a single class in the Service without just cause of complaint. He had in his hands statements printed and circulated by nearly every class of executive officers, describing the grievances under which they lay. Such a course had never been known when he was young in the Service. From the cadet to the Admiral there was room for reform. The masters, engineers, surgeons, and Paymasters had all injustice and inequalities to complain of as respected pay, position, and promotion. The case of the masters was a disgrace to the Service; they were the very backbone of the Royal Navy—the best seamen and navigators in the Fleet, and without any substitute for them he could not conceive how they could afford to abolish them. The navigating officers were the most useful men in the Service. The treatment of the Warrant officers was such as to give the idea that it was the object of the Admiralty to get rid of them altogether. The policy adopted towards the Royal Marines was simply suicidal—they were a magnificent body of men, absolutely unequalled under arms—in fact, our men-of-war could not be manned without them. Yet their memorial set forth that the 22 senior lieutenants of the corps were not in the 16th year of their service; and such was the stagnation in the higher ranks that it amounted to an absolute block to promotion; 1,108 captains in the Army and several majors were actually junior in the Service to these lieutenants. With regard to the seamen the case was still more serious. The number of bond fide seamen (including pensioners) who had left the Service from all causes during the year 1872-3, the last printed Return, appeared to have been, according to the Return, as follows:—By purchase, 48; invalided, 647; died, 124; deserted, 800; disgraced, 6; pensioned for long service, 310; objectionable, 42; coast-guard on shore, 265; other causes, 165; total, 2,847. Of this number, no less than 800 deserted in 1873. Last year no less than 1,100 men deserted; so that the discontent was steadily increasing. The men would not remain a moment longer on board a man-of-war than they could help. One glance at the youthful appearance of the crews proved that. They no longer saw the weather-beaten, grisly petty officers, prime seamen, the heart and soul of the ship's company, the natural leaders of the men in any emergency, whether of storm or battle. The men would not stop, and the House would be astonished at the number of commitments to prison, and other punishments inflicted, to keep up the very ordinary discipline of the present day in the Fleet. Take the case of the Challenger. That ship, as hon. Members were aware, had returned from an exceptionally pleasant cruise, where the men were well treated, no doubt, and more or less picked men; but out of a crew of 240, some 60 deserted during the cruise of the ship—say 25 per cent of her ship's company. As to the Royal Naval Reserve, it was thoroughly unreliable, not to say useless. This year Parliament had voted a sum of £240,000 to provide for 20,000 men; but he ventured to say that on an emergency not 1,000 men could be obtained even by pressing. In war time they could not take one single man from their Merchant Service; they must have food, and their merchant ships must bring in that food constantly, or they would starve, as the island never had more than two months' provisions in stock at the same time. Their so-called Naval Reserve was useless, and they were worse than wasteful in spending their money upon it. He now came to the matériel of the Navy. Our iron-clad ships were of so heterogeneous a description that it would be impossible to classify them; but he would take a few typical examples, sufficient to show how little they were to be relied on in the hour of need. The hon. and gallant Member proceeded, at great length, to read Reports on the efficiency of various iron-clad ships. The Research, he said, had proved such a bad sea boat that in a coasting voyage, in moderate weather, her captain was nearly washed overboard from the central battery; the Vixen and the Waterwitch rolled and pitched to such a degree that the crews went aft in a body, and protested against being sent to sea in such unseaworthy vessels. The Pallas was built expressly for speed, yet the Pallas and Research were the only two vessels that could not keep company with the squadron. The Bellorophon was to have surpassed every other iron-clad, but what was her practical performance? Admiral Yelverton reported of her that she ranked below the Lord Clyde, and on a par with the Caledonian and the Ocean—these last being wooden line-of-battle ships converted into iron-clads to meet an emergency. The Vanguard class was to be weighed by the result of the trial trip of the Invincible, when that ship on her return had the appearance of being on her beam-ends. She was actually heeling over 17 to 18 degrees, and the greatest anxiety prevailed on shore for the safety of the ship. The Audacions, Iron Duke, Triumph, and Swiftsure were equally bad, and on an average 400 tons of ballast had to be placed on board of each of these vessels. Then as to our coast defenders, the Devastation and Thunderer class, Admiral Sir Thomas Symonds said—

“I should be afraid to go at any great speed at sea with them (the Devastation class); I have seen very heavy seas, and I know no limit to their power. If steaming, you are obliged to go at a certain speed, or you drown yourself. All I know is, that so far as I am myself concerned, I should be very sorry to be in those vessels.”

He (Captain Pim) could hardly speak with patience of huge mastless iron-clads as coast defenders. Coast defenders, indeed! Why, putting on one side the unseaworthiness of these vessels altogether, what did they want, he asked, with such coast defenders? The first thing they must do in war was to blockade any enemy's ports—shut them up—fancy one Alabama only amongst their commerce! What they wanted was a vessel capable of keeping the sea under sail in any weather. He should like to ask hon. Members if it was possible for the Devastation to keep the sea off the Elbe in a gale of wind! Why, she would be smothered. What they wanted was a cloud of gunboats able to carry sail in all weathers, and to claw off a lee shore under sail; they should have a crew of above 25 men, one heavy gun, full brig or schooner rig, and steam power for action; with four of these vessels the finest iron-clad ever built in the world could be easily destroyed. In short, every one asserted in unmistakable language that their unwieldy, unmanageable iron-clads—

“were not safe when near land or one another, at sea, at anchor, or in bad weather, without steam power.”

The gallant Sir George Sartorius, Admiral of the Fleet, said—

“They are equally unfit for the exigencies of coast or distant warfare; and for the blockading of an enemy's ports, impracticable.”

The Report, 1872, of the Scientific Committee appointed by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to examine the designs of ships recently built, was to the effect that diligent research throughout the Royal Navy was in vain to discover even one type of ship as desirable to reproduce. He repeated that nothing could be more unsatisfactory than the present state of the Royal Navy. And nothing was more easy than to remedy it. The nation and the Navy united as one man in pointing to the Admiralty as responsible. And how could the country expect anything but mismanagement and misrule from a Department so curiously constituted? In less than 50 years there had been more than 20 changes in the First Lord of the Admiralty, whose tenure of office had, on an average, been about two years. The hon. and gallant Member then quoted from the Report of the Select Committee on Navy, Army, and Ordnance Estimates of 1858 numerous instances of waste and extravagance which had resulted from the bad constitution of the Admiralty—

“In 27 cases investigated, the Admiralty bought back the old copper from the purchaser of a ship at a greater price than that for which they sold the ship itself, including the copper, costly engines, and other valuable stores.”

Some instances were stated of fortunate purchasers of a ship receiving back from the Admiralty (for the old copper returned) two, three, four, and even five times over the original price they had paid for the ship, &c.

MR. E. J. REED wanted to know whether the hon. and gallant Gentleman was quoting now from the Report of the Committee, or the Report of the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely), which was rejected by the Committee?

CAPTAIN PTM said, the hon. Gentleman would find it in the Library. He had found it there himself. He found that of the ships valued by the Dockyard authorities for breaking up, some were sold at about one-half the estimated value of the old materials. The Report went on to assert—

"If the cost of all the iron-clads built in Her Majesty's Yards between 1858 and 1865 bears the same proportion to the cost, as that of Achilles to the Black Prince and Warrior, the excess cost of Admiralty-built iron-clads during these years has been £1,663,000 on an expenditure of £3,500,000."

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose stated in that House—

"That the country was paying for stores and material at rates 20, 30, 60 per cent above the market value, and that a system of bribery by contractors had been established within the walls of the Admiralty."

The cost of the Admiralty was somewhat startling, as would be seen by the following:—Sir James Graham's scheme of naval re-organization was to effect a saving in salaries under the head of Commissioners, secretaries, superior officials, inferior officers, and clerks, of no less a sum than £49,059 per annum, and—

"He hoped still further to reduce the professional and clerical staff of the Admiralty Office (Vote 3) from 70 in number to 40."

That was in 1832. In 1872 Mr. Corry told that House—

"That the Admiralty staff numbered 432 individuals in 1869, and the personnel has increased since to 537 clerks and writers."

Could any system of administration be good when the Board itself was radically wrong, both in its constitution and in its distribution of duties? Let them look for a moment at the opinions of those most competent to pass judgment on this subject. The Earl of Malmesbury said—

"My impression and conviction are, that if such a change took place—if the administration of the patronage of the army were assimilated to that of the navy, it would become the same hotbed of jobbing and trickery which has been, unfortunately, for many years a reproach to the Admiralty of this country."—[3 Hansard, cxxxvi. 1360.]

[Mr. HUNT: What is the time of that speech.] In 1855. Sir James Graham would not hear of a Board for the War Department. He said—

"Having been six years at the Admiralty, he knew what a Board was. The machinery of a Board is known to be cumbrous and uncertain in its operation. It only works well when the head of the Board acts as if he were alone responsible. A Board, therefore, would be a retrograde measure, which your Committee cannot recommend."

He might be told that in 1869 this state of things was rectified by the alleged reforms inaugurated by the right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers). He would not trouble the House with the merits or demerits of those reforms, but what were the results—had our naval expenditure been diminished, or did they find the state and condition of the Navy in any respect improved? And as to responsibility, to quote the words of the right hon. Member for Pontefract, "has that been sheeted home?" He need only mention three notorious cases—the capsizing of the Captain, the loss of the Megara, and the foundering of the Vanguard, to prove that such was not the case. Admiral Sir Spencer Robinson, late Controller of the Navy, in September 1873, said—

"As to the Navy, its management was simply deplorable."

And further thus expressed himself—

"Is it wonderful with such an organization the working of the Dockyards is not satisfactory? If there were not waste, if there were not mismanagement, it would be a miracle."

England at the present moment stood in a very precarious condition, her Navy being quite inadequate to protect either her coasts or her commerce; the personnel of the Navy was in a deplorable condition; the matériel was equally bad; and the Administration was notoriously inefficient. The hon. and gallant Member concluded—Sir, I am no alarmist; I firmly believe that if our seamen and Marines have anything that will float to fight upon they will give a good account of their enemy, but the nation must not expect a miracle in its favour in the hour of need. That the Navy has been, and always must be, the real strength and bulwark of England is acknowledged on all hands, and especially by this House in the Preamble to the Naval Discipline Act, 29 & 30 Vic., cap. 109, which runs thus—

"The Navy.—Whereon, under the good Providence of God, the wealth, safety, and strength of the Kingdom depend."

Sir, it is because I am deeply anxious that the wealth, strength, and safety of this Kingdom should still be maintained that I ask the House for a Royal Commission, and I therefore now beg to move for it.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "considering the present administration of the Admiralty is practically that introduced and adopted by this House in 1833, on the recommendation of Sir James Graham; and, considering the advance made in Naval armaments and the unsatisfactory condition of the personnel and matériel of Her Majesty's Navy, it is desirable that a Royal Commission be appointed to inquire and report whether the present system under which the Navy is administered is the most efficient and most economical, and what improvements or amendments, if any, it would be desirable should be introduced,"—

—instead thereof.

MR. HUNT said, his hon. and gallant Friend had brought a very serious charge against not only the Admiralty of the present day, but against almost every Admiralty in his recollection, and he had attributed the faults he found with their acts and omissions to the constitution of the Board. He (Mr. Hunt), however, hardly thought he had made out his case in that respect. He was quite aware that a difference of opinion prevailed, and he believed always would prevail, as to the constitution of the Admiralty. At one time they had a Board with a Lord High Admiral at its head, and at other times a civilian with a Naval Council; but he did not know that the results had been very different from what they were now. The change would be only one of name, and the work would be found to have been done very much as it was done at present. There might be a difference of opinion on that subject, but he did not think the proof which had been brought forward would support the conclusions his hon. and gallant Friend had arrived at, or that he would induce the House, instead of going into Committee of Supply on the Navy Estimates for the current year, to appoint a Royal Commission on the constitution of the Admiralty. His hon. and gallant Friend had found fault with the personnel and matériel of the Navy, and urged that it was necessary that the Admiralty should be differently constituted, saying that there was not a single branch of the Service which was not dissatisfied. A great many, however, of the complaints which his hon. and gallant Friend mentioned had already been removed. He asked his hon. and gallant Friend, when referring to the case of the Warrant officers, the date of the pamphlet he quoted, and the answer he received was 1874. His hon. and gallant Friend did not seem to be aware that since then a new Warrant had been issued, improving the position of the Warrant officers, and since then he had heard no complaint. With regard to the executive officers, he had not asked the date of the pamphlet quoted; but last year a new Warrant was issued, improving the flow of promotion as regarded the executive officers. It had effected a great improvement in their position, and gave a reasonable flow of promotion. In this case also he understood the complaint was dated before the issue of the new Warrant. He must protest against grievances which had been met being again brought up as if nothing had been done to remedy them. [Captain Pim: The men are just as discontented now as they were before.] His information was not to the same effect. He knew how difficult it was to satisfy every one in the public Service; a certain number would always be dissatisfied. Within the last few years they had had to deal with the Civil Service, and the other day with the officials of the London Custom House; but he was not aware that, because some of those officers might be dissatisfied, any hon. Member had thought proper to move that a Royal Commission should be appointed to inquire into the constitution of the Treasury. His hon. and gallant Friend had also referred to the medical officers; but either last year or the year before there was a new Warrant improving the condition of the medical officers. Again, he spoke of the engineers. Well, nothing had been done yet as regarded the engineers, but a Committee had been appointed by the Admiralty which had gone into the case of the engineers and how the service could be improved, and that Report was under the consideration of the Admiralty. The complaints of his hon. and gallant Friend had, therefore, to a great extent been already met or were under the consideration of the Admiralty. He spoke of the number of desertions as showing that the Service was unpopular. That subject had been discussed some few weeks ago, and he thought he then showed that the Service was not unpopular, and the places where desertion took place showed, not the unpopularity of the Service, but the great attractions of some foreign ports, where wages were high and land cheap, to which the men, unfortunately, yielded. He alluded specially to the desertions from the Challenger; but the Challenger had been over nearly all the world, and therefore the crew had been exposed to greater temptation than almost any other ship ever sent out from this country, because they had the attraction presented to them of the whole world except the Arctic regions. His hon. and gallant Friend had also referred to the iron-clad Navy. No doubt, after it was determined to turn our wooden Navy into an iron-clad Navy some mistakes were made. That was to be expected; but when mistakes were discovered, they did not continue to build ships on the same design. The Devastation had been referred to, and he was not surprised that great doubts should have been entertained regarding that ship. He himself, when he first spoke on the subject, had great doubts as to her sea-going qualities, but he did not entertain them now; with the experience he now had on the subject he had no hesitation in passing her as a sea-going ship. He had sailed in her company for some hours, and, although the sea was very heavy for the ship he was in, he was very much surprised at the way in which the Devastation behaved. He knew the opinion of naval authorities had very much changed in regard to the Devastation, and he believed she was commanding very great respect where she now lay in Besika Bay. One of the best proofs of the superiority of their designs was this—that whenever a new design of a ship was adopted almost the whole world followed it. All the naval Powers of Europe looked to the English Admiralty for new designs of ships. The other day he was in a German port, and there he found a ship just laid down on the same design the Admiralty had previously adopted. He did not pretend to say that there were no defects of administration at the Admiralty. Indeed, he was desirous that all shortcomings should be pointed out with a view to being remedied; but he hardly thought that, either as regarded the matériel or the personnel of the Navy, his hon. and gallant Friend had made out a case for a Commission. He therefore trusted they might be permitted to go into Committee to vote the supplies for the year.

Mr. E. J. REED said, the House would remember that the hon. and gallant Member for Gravesend (Captain Pim) read some passages strongly condemnatory of the administration of the Admiralty from what the House probably understood to be the Report of a Committee of Inquiry. He (Mr. Reed) asked the hon. and gallant Gentleman at the time whether he was reading from an actual Report, or only from a draft Report which the Committee had distinctly rejected, and the hon. and gallant Gentleman, with all his honour and gallantry, did not give him a candid reply, but referred him to the Library to discover the truth. Well, he (Mr. Reed) had consulted the Library, and he had to inform the House that the hon. and gallant Member's quotations were not from the Committee's actual Report, but from a draft Report which they had decidedly refused to adopt. Some of the other statements of the hon. and gallant Gentleman had been presented to the House with a similar amount of candour. He had read at considerable length Reports or extracts from Reports on ships. But most, if not all of them, were of old date, and referred to the ships in question at a period when they were entirely novel, and when, consequently, it was only natural that they would be exposed to no small amount of misconception and misrepresentation. Adverse opinions with regard to a novel type of ship were always to be looked for, and he might say he should despair of naval architecture altogether, if naval architects had to inspire every admiral with a favourable idea of the qualities of the ships he commanded. He believed that in the progress of naval architecture there would always be found, especially on the part of the senior officers, a tendency to take objection to great novelties, though such objections frequently disappeared as experience was gained.

emergencies or for going into action, so long should we be unprovided with a Navy which could defend the honour and interests of this country. There had been a great naval demonstration in the Mediterranean recently, but pending that demonstration he contended that our coasts were denuded of ships for defensive purposes. [Mr. HUNT: I say, no.] He quite understood what his right hon. Friend said; still he denied the existence of an efficient fleet at home. There was no use in mincing matters. We had no fleet now fit for home defence. If he was mistaken, the House and the country would be very much obliged to his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty if he would show that, independent of that naval demonstration in the Mediterranean, we had at home an adequate fleet for the defence of our coasts. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to inform the country where the fleet was to be found that could be depended upon for home defence in case of invasion. He quite agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend that there was an enormous amount of waste going on in the Navy, and that money was thrown away in a manner prejudicial to the financial interests of the country. It was the old story—a Board was responsible. The whole subject of the Motion amounted to a renewal of the Motion which he (Mr. Bentinck) brought forward a few months ago. He admired the abilities of his right hon. Friend the First Lord as much as anybody; all he regretted was that those abilities were entirely misplaced. He entirely and fully endorsed all the hon. and gallant Member for Gravesend had said upon the subject; but he did not suppose that the House would be disposed to grant the Commission asked for, because it was a remarkable feature in that House that to all matters relating to naval questions there was an utter and an entire indifference, and both sides of the House had an interest in suppressing all inquiries into naval affairs. He contended that placing at the head of the Admiralty a gentleman who knew nothing about naval matters was a rank and glaring absurdity. If his hon. and gallant Friend divided the House on his Motion he should gladly go into the Lobby with him.

Mr. HUNT: After the statement of my hon. Friend, I wish to ask the indulgence of the House while I say a few words with regard to the question of our security. In the present state of affairs I hope that exceptional allowance will be made, and that I shall be permitted to state that my hon. Friend is not warranted in saying that the naval demonstration in the Mediterranean has denuded us of ships for the protection of our coasts. I beg to tell him that there are at this moment nine iron-clads in commission either at home or in the immediate neighbourhood of home, besides those which have gone to the Mediterranean; that in a month or five weeks I could commission two more, one of them the Thunderer, which would then be the most powerful ship afloat; and that in the course of a very short time, if need be, several more ships could be put in commission, not speaking of all the special defence ships which now are in commission and in Reserve, and the gunboats which are laid up at Haslar awaiting any emergency that may arise. I wish, therefore, without entering into details, to give the most positive contradiction to the statement that this country is denuded of naval defence.

Mr. GOSCHEN: I rose at the same time as the right hon. Gentleman simply to assure him that I felt certain that both this House and the country would accept his simple disclaimer that he had not denuded the shores of this country of the ships necessary to defend them, and that the country would be perfectly satisfied if even, without giving any particulars, the right hon. Gentleman simply stated that the insinuation of the hon. Member for West Norfolk was not based upon fact. The right hon. Gentleman and his Friends know that we on this side of the House have been most anxious throughout all these anxious times to let no single word fall from our lips that would in any way embarrass them, or that would add to those great anxieties which we know must be laid upon them. For my own part, I came down to the House prepared to debate the Estimates without any reference, if it were possible to avoid it, to matters that might embarrass the Government, or might call upon them to make any explanations which in the present state of affairs might have been inconvenient to them. We must, therefore, all the more regret the question, but for the satisfactory declaration which the right hon.

Mr. Bentinck

Gentleman has been able to make. It was not necessary even for him to have given the numbers in the statement that he made, because the country and the House would be assured that no Board of Admiralty would venture upon such a proceeding as that which the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) seemed to think them capable of—namely, that of sending its forces into the Mediterranean without considering what were its needs at home. The right hon. Gentleman has very properly alluded to the fact that during the last four or five years special means have been taken to secure the coast defence, quite irrespective of sea-going iron-clads, and that when the moment should come, in consequence of this provision, it would be possible to make a demonstration such as had been made by the right hon. Gentleman. The House and the country will remember that there have been most powerful gunboats constructed, carrying each an 18-ton gun; that these have been laid up and are ready at any moment for any duty that they may be called upon to perform; and that there is also a class of vessel like the Hecate and the Cyclops which the right hon. Gentleman did not allude to. [Mr. HUNT: I did allude to them. I spoke of them as special ships.] There are four of these ships, and a ship like the Glatton. These ships are specially designed for the service, and the right hon. Gentleman has now been able to give effect to that policy which it has always been said it would be possible to adopt—namely, that by building these coast-defence ships he would be more free to handle the sea-going iron-clads. It was for that purpose that these coast-defence ships were constructed, and it shows the advance that has been made in the naval power of this country that they have enabled the Admiralty to take a step which otherwise it would have been unable to take.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD said, he could assure the House that Her Majesty's Navy was not in the sad state of inefficiency that the hon. and gallant Member for Gravesend (Captain Pim) and the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) imagined. During the last six months he had—in company with His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales—made a voyage to India, in the course of which he had had ample opportunity of seeing two-thirds of the Navy, including the Channel Fleet, the Mediterranean Fleet, the Flying Squadron, and the East India Squadron; he had been on board most of the vessels, and he asserted most distinctly that the Navy was not in the state of inefficiency that had been represented to the House. With the exception of the engineers and the Marines, respecting whose requirements a Commission of Inquiry had been granted, all branches of the Service were, he believed, perfectly contented. The hon. and gallant Member for Gravesend abused the men for being young, that was a thing one very often got abused for; but he (Lord Charles Beresford) thought these young men were better men than some of the grizzled old men who grumbled at them. They were taken in young that they might be the better trained. As to flogging deterring men from joining the Navy, he repeated what he had already said, that the men would like to see more of it. For a fine plucky fellow with lots of "go" in him who would always come out when he was wanted, was very often the man who would give his officer some "cheek" and be insubordinate. Well, under the old system, they could give him two dozen and "whitewash" him, and a week afterwards could make him a petty officer; but now they put his name down at the bottom of the list, and also in a book which went to the Admiralty, the consequence of which was that it might be brought against him for the next seven years as a bar to promotion. He wondered if he would have ever got his commission as a captain if there had been such a record kept of his delinquencies while he was a midshipman. He agreed with the hon. Member for Pembroke as to the Research and the Bellerophon, having served seven months in one and a year in the other of those vessels. The Research was a very bad vessel, but she was never intended to be anything else. The Bellerophon was an exceptionally fine vessel. The contention of the hon. and gallant Member for Gravesend that the Admiralty were to blame for the loss of the Vanguard was a most extraordinary one; the hon. and gallant Gentleman might just as well say that he (Lord Charles Beresford) was to blame because the favourite did not win the Derby. The Navy was not in the dreadful state imputed to it; on the con-chase Commission, with which they had nothing whatever to do, had not reported. But hon. Members would recollect the well-known line — Rusticus expectat, dum defluat amnis, and they were thoroughly worn out with long and vain expectation. Their case proved that the administration of the Admiralty was not exactly what it should be. But he would proceed to another matter, to which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley) had referred — namely, the rapidly increasing strength of the Russian and German Navies in the Baltic and North Sea. That increase showed the necessity of making better provision for the safety of our North-east Coast and the security of our trade and shipping in those seas, as it was now well known that so far from our sea-coast defences being what they ought to be, there was not a single harbour to which our ships of war could resort, or where they could lie secure in tempestuous weather, from the mouth of the Thames to the Frith of Forth, or any batteries whatever by which they could be protected if overwhelmed by a superior force.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Baronet was out of Order in referring to a subject in reference to which he had a Motion upon the Paper.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he would at once bow to the decision of the Chair. He should not have alluded to the subject but for the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland, who had introduced the subject of the immense increase of the Navies of two great Continental powers. He must further observe that he had not felt quite satisfied with the refusal of the Admiralty to grant an inquiry into the accusation made lately against that Department by a private individual, who publicly challenged in every possible way the official conduct of Members of the Naval Administration, and asked that the charges he made might be made the subject of a public investigation. He confessed he had not felt satisfied with the reasons given by the First Lord why such an inquiry should not take place. It had been said in that House that it did not consist of naval architects, and they were not to be called upon to decide between rival claims. But his reply to that was they were English gentlemen, and if one of their body was thus publicly assailed by charges which were without foundation, they should render him every assistance in their power to scatter and overthrow them; indeed, he felt astonished when his hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke——

MR. SPEAKER said, he must again remind the hon. Baronet he was out of Order, as he was not speaking to the Motion before the House, but to the subject of a late debate.

MR. D. JENKINS said, he had some knowledge of engineers and engineering, and believed the case of those employed in the Royal Navy to be exceptionally unjust and unfair. Even as regarded their retiring pensions the engineers in the American Navy had a better allowance. He hoped their case would be fully inquired into by the Committee now sitting on Naval Administration. He hoped the Admiralty would not listen to the complaints which were made in that House by Members representing dock-yard boroughs. He believed there was no difficulty in securing the services of competent certificated engineers, because he knew that for every vacancy that occurred in the Merchant Service there were 20 applicants.

MR. DILLWYN protested against the House being brought down to attend Morning Sittings, when so much time was wasted in discussions of that kind.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £109,194, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expenses of the several Scientific Departments of the Navy, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877."

MR. RYLANDS, in rising to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £2,000, said, that when in 1872 he gave his support to the changes in Greenwich Hospital, he should have felt some hesitation had he foreseen the expenses they were now asked to vote. In alluding to the different items of expenditure he called attention to the office of President. This was held by a gentleman—a vice admiral—who, in addition to his half-pay of £600, received a salary of £1,600 a-year, together with residence, fuel, and gas. That was nearly double the amount paid to the Astronomer Royal. Next to the President came an official—a retired captain of the Royal Navy, who, with his half-pay, received an income of £800. Below these came the Director of Studies with £1,200 a-year: so that these three gentlemen received together £4,200, which seemed to him a large amount for the executive of the administration of a College of that character. Following these, there came a very large Staff, at high salaries, and the general expenditure, which amounted to £13,291, he considered exceptionally large, when it was remembered there were only 231 students at the College. Upon this number there were 110 servants to wait, and the gas bill was £3,000, or more than for Devonport Dockyard, including Keyham, and in various other items there was proof of an extravagant management. If we came to ask what we got in return for all that he was sure the answer would not be satisfactory. We expected an intellectual and scientific education, together with that technical training that would be required in the duties these young gentlemen would afterwards be called upon to perform. So far from that being carried out, he was given to understand—and he believed his information was reliable—that these young students lived in a most extravagant style, and their training was not such as would be likely to fit them for the habits and pursuits that awaited them on shipboard. He found from reports of recent examinations that out of 11 students eight of the number were plucked. Such a result was not very satisfactory to the educational Staff, for he found it was not so much owing to want of ability as from want of attention to those branches of study in which they were examined. His attention had been called to a paragraph in The Army and Navy Gazette of April 27th in reference to the College, in which it was mentioned that the students gave a performance in the gymnasium, which was attended by a distinguished audience, and met with much success. The pieces selected were The Ladies' Battle and Raising the Wind, and the performance was stated to have been equal to any that could be witnessed at the metropolitan theatres. It was clear, therefore, among the number there must be some who could give attention to some branches of study. There was one of the pieces selected with great judgment. He thought, considering the training and experience they were going through, "raising the wind" was a performance which might not be unnecessary. His objection to the Vote was not on the ground that a Vote of the kind was not necessary; but his object was to call attention to the subject, for he felt sure that the expenditure required examination, and while he was anxious for efficiency with economy, he objected to inefficiency and extravagance, believing the two often went together. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the reduction of the Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Sub-head, £38,051, Royal Naval College, Greenwich, be reduced by the sum of £2,000."—(Mr. Rylands.)

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, he had anticipated, when he heard of the Amendment, that the hon. Gentleman was going to bring forward a real grievance; but the hon. Gentleman must know, that to secure the efficient working of such an institution, great expenses were necessary. He must be aware that the expenses of all the officers he had referred to were fixed when the College was first established. The only increase since had been in the wages of servants, and that he was prepared to justify. The late President of the College complained that the allowance of 8d. a-day for boys was not enough to enable him to secure a good class, and so inefficient were they that 58 out of 69 had been discharged. Since then the Admiralty having raised the pay from 8d. to 1s., on the recommendation of the President, the result was, that they were now able to obtain the services of a better class of boys, and the complaints at present did not amount to one-half what they were formerly. When the hon. Member put his Motion on the Paper, he (Sir Massey Lopes) thought he was referring to the sum of £2,000, which was the amount taken for gas. That no doubt was a large sum, but it had been caused by the necessity of keeping gas lighted in the rooms occupied by the sub-lieutenants, which had been found to be so damp, that many of those officers were laid up by rheumatism and other affections. He maintained that the College was not conducted in an extravagant or wasteful manner. The object in establishing it was to give our naval officers a very high scientific education, and to do that they must be provided with the best instructors and all the necessary facilities for acquiring the requisite knowledge.

MR. GOSCHEN wished to remind hon. Members that they must not look upon this College simply as a training institution. His hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) spoke as if the young men educated in the College were a set of midshipmen who had not been at sea. Now this establishment, though partly designed for the training of young officers, was a great scientific institution for engineers, shipwrights, and scientific men connected with the training of the Navy. They had rendered necessary a considerable expenditure in laboratories and chemical apparatus; in fact, all the appliances were provided which they used to enjoy at South Kensington. The Vote ought not, therefore, to be scrutinized too closely, and he hoped his hon. Friend would not press the Amendment.

MR. HANBURY - TRACY trusted that nothing would be done to limit the resources of the Naval College. On the contrary, he would suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should rather endeavour to increase its efficiency. He regretted that the number of senior officers was so small, but one reason was that when they were married they could not afford to go to the College and keep up an establishment elsewhere. It might be desirable therefore to give increased pay, so that officers desiring it might be enabled to go to the College. If the increased pay were given, it should be on condition of their passing in a certain standard at examination. The sum charged for gas at the College—£2,000 a-year—seemed very large, as also did the charge of £1,500 a-year for police.

MR. BRUCE drew attention to the fact that the College had only to pay £100 for buildings to the Hospital, though they were worth far more than that per year.

MR. WHITWELL suggested there should be a little more detail in the various items. There was an item of £632 for scholarships and competitions, and he should like to know how that amount was appropriated.

MR. GORST thought that, in justice to the Hospital, the College should pay a proper rent.

MR. CHILDERS said, that the Greenwich Hospital Act did not require rent being paid; and it was perhaps unfortunate that any nominal payment in the nature of rent should be made, as it would be followed by a claim for far more. The Greenwich Hospital Fund was not in the nature of an ordinary charity, nine-tenths of it having really been created by public charges. If the fund required additional charges on it in order to give increased inducements to men to enter the Navy, he would be the last to object; but this should be done on public grounds. If the reason was merely technical, of course the Admiralty were the best judges. He was also desirous to ask for explanation as to the heavy charge for police. As to the vote generally he was inclined to think that it would not bear much greater increase, for in time of peace it was necessary to set aside at least £10,000 a-year to augment the capital, and this certainly was not being done at present.

MR. HUNT said, that the £100 a-year was a mere acknowledgment, in the nature of a peppercorn rent, and that the buildings were not Admiralty property. Although there was an increase for the pay of police in the Vote there was a reduction under that in another.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked how it was that as much as £1,800 a-year was required for clerks at the College?

MR. BENTINCK asked for information with reference to the system of examinations at the College, observing that he had heard they were of so abstruse a character that several officers had, after many years' service, been discharged because they could not answer questions on subjects with which it was not deemed necessary to be acquainted when they entered the Profession. It had also been mentioned to him that no fewer than eight young officers had been

ed within a short time for a reason.

HUNT repeated what he had said on a previous occasion—that any of ordinary abilities and industry sent to Greenwich College might pass the examinations which he was required to undergo, and that good rather than the contrary was to be obtained by weeding it of men who showed that they took very little interest in it by not attending to their studies. The only reason why gentlemen did not pass it was because they did not study.

GOSCHEN also was of opinion that it was of the utmost advantage to the country that a proper standard of examination should be maintained at the College, and that those who went there should not regard it as a place at which they might spend a short time pleasantly. He therefore hoped the right hon. Member would not give way in the ANDERSON pointed out that salaries paid to Professors who taught the abstract and abstruse sciences were as high as £600 or £700 a-year, whereas those paid to the teachers of naval architecture and marine engineering, two important and practical subjects, were only £147 or £180 a-year.

HUNT said, he supposed the reason why this was the case was that teachers could be got for these salaries. He agreed with his right hon. Member (Mr. Childers) that the cost of the College should be carefully looked into in detail, and the suggestions of the hon. Member for Glasgow were under consideration. He thought that by the appointment of a small committee of practical men would be the best course to take, with the view of getting down any redundancies, or of remedying any deficiencies. Such an inquiry would not occupy very long, and he hoped, by next Session, to submit a scheme of management free from the objections which had been urged by various hon. Members that RYLANDS said, he heard that the Commission was proceeding with great satisfaction. The appointment of such a Committee was the most desirable, and he would suggest that a Report should be annually laid on the Table of the House as to the work done in the College. He should be glad to withdraw his Amendment for the reduction of the Vote.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE asked what was to be done with the Challenger collection? It was reported to have been sent to Edinburgh. He hoped the interests of the British Museum in respect to it would not be overlooked.

MR. HUNT said, that the head of the scientific staff on board the Challenger was an Edinburgh Professor, and as the collection which had been formed was going to be put into proper shape under that gentleman's direction, it had been sent to Edinburgh in the first instance. How it would be ultimately divided he could not at present say, but he might remark that the interests of the British Museum were in good hands and would probably not be neglected.

MR. E. J. REED said, that Sir Wyville Thomson informed him that the collection was going to Edinburgh solely for the convenience of classification and arrangement.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

MR. RYLANDS, in moving to reduce the amount of the Vote by £250,000, said, he was led to move the Amendment by finding that the increase of expenditure upon Dockyards and Stores since 1871 amounted to £2,000,000. Of course, he was prepared to hear repeated what had been said before, that the Stores were so much reduced, and the Dockyard expenditure so cut down by the late Administration, that Her Majesty's Government were compelled to go to an enormous expense to put things upon a satisfactory footing. He thought the right hon. Gentleman who held the office of First Lord of the Admiralty prior to the present Administration ought to meet that charge, and he was glad to give him an opportunity of doing so. During the years 1870 and 1871, the cost of iron and other materials was much higher than it was at present, and there were other circumstances which would tend to reduce the cost of management, yet, notwithstanding that there was an increase since 1871 of nearly £2,000,000. The Vote for the Dockyards alone in 1871 was £817,315, in 1876 it was £1,323,750. He had no doubt in his own mind that under the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London, the Admiralty was ably administered, wise economies were made, and reforms were carried out that increased the efficiency of the Service. The change which was introduced by the right hon. Member for Pontefract in the Royal Naval Hospital, by which that institution was put under the management of a surgeon instead of a captain of the Royal Navy, and the change in the control of the Victualling department were instances of this, but some of the reforms suggested by the right hon. Gentleman had not been fully carried out. He recollected that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) had remarked upon the great number of officials in the Dockyards, and said that it prevented any feeling of responsibility, and the same thing came out at the Megara inquiry. He was not aware that any change had been made, and he believed that the Dockyards remained in much the same state as they were in five years ago, or if changed at all, for the worse. He contended that Dockyards were manufacturing establishments, and should be treated in the same way as establishments of the kind carried on by hon. Members of the House and others. It seemed to him that the proper person to place at the head of such an establishment would be a man of business habits and great technical knowledge and experience. That we did not do. In fact we placed at the head a man quite unused to anything of the kind—an Admiral Superintendent—without scientific knowledge, and with none of the necessary experience. He was allowed to remain in charge of the establishment for five years, and when after that time he began to get an inkling of his duties he was removed and another Admiral Superintendent was appointed who went through the same process. It seemed to him that no course would be less likely to lead to efficiency or economy. There were two branches of the establishment, that of design for construction and of building and management, and he ventured to say that the Admiralty was not exactly competent to carry out either of those two branches. In the management of our Dockyards he believed there was great cause for complaint. He found that while the wages for artizans amounted to £1,072,334 in a year, no less a sum than £382,644 was spent in salaries for superintendence, and in pensions, and for police. It would appear that for every £20 paid in wages, £4 was paid in pensions. He had had great experience of the working classes, having employed thousands, and he did not hesitate to say that if he went into the market to purchase labour, and offered 30s. weekly to a man, without any allowance, and 28s. to a man with the promise of a small pension after a number of years, the man for 30s. would be the better man of the two. The effect of offering pensions was that we got a number of slovenly, worthless people. He objected to the system of giving lower wages with a pension; it was far better to give the full market value, and trust to men's own management and thrift for the future, and to make their own provision for old age. From evidence it appeared that the cost of our iron-clads built in Dockyards was far greater than if built in private yards. The hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. Brassey) a short time ago stated in The Times that if we had had our iron-clad fleet built by private firms, we should have 10 more vessels to show for the money. That as coming from a man of such experience and so well known, was worthy of careful consideration. But not only were they keeping up these large manufacturing establishments, but they were spending money in costly mistakes; building vessels that in a short time become obsolete. From Returns on the Table of the House the number of vessels of that kind would be seen, and hon. Members would be surprised to find them so numerous. At that moment foreign nations were putting their trust in torpedoes and rams, and that was a very serious question affecting the construction of ships of war, and he contended that with all our resources and appliances we should not rush at once into building a vessel because another country had a type of which we did not possess an example, and which, as in the case of the Inconstant, might prove to be a costly blunder. He would refer to a suggestion which had been made by the hon. Member for Hastings as a very valuable one. It was that merchant vessels should protect themselves by torpedoes. That would make ordinary vessels independent of the protection of war vessels; each would be able to carry her own sting, and would render unnecessary the costly plan of keeping our foreign squadrons scattered over the globe. In conclusion, he protested against the heavy expenditure in the direction to which he alluded, as not justified at the present time, and moved the reduction of the Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,073,750, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expenses of the Dockyards and Naval Yards at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877."—(Mr. Rylands.)

MR. CHILDERS said, that during the time he was at the Admiralty it had been his constant effort to keep down expenditure, and hence it might be assumed that he sympathized with his hon. Friend in his Motion to reduce the Vote by £250,000; but he would remind him that a reduction of that particular Vote by that amount, meant practically a reduction of £250,000 in the Vote for the Wages of Artificers in the Dockyards; and a reduction of that sum upon the Wages Vote meant a reduction of 4,000 men during the whole year—that was to say, between 5,000 and 6,000 men for so much of the year as remained. It would be perfectly impossible for anyone in a responsible position consistently to make such a reduction, or even to dream of making it; and, further, it was a course which it was impossible to sanction in the present state of our relations with foreign powers. Besides, a reduction of that kind required to be carried out with foresight, and spread over as long a period as possible; and, for himself, he had always been of opinion that both increases and reductions should be made with very great caution indeed, not by leaps and bounds. Therefore, in the spirit which actuated the Opposition, and which rendered them disinclined to say or do anything that might hamper the Government in the present state of the Eastern question, he hoped his hon. Friend would not press his Motion to a division, because, if acted upon, it might do considerable mischief. He did not deny that our Dockyard system was capable of great improvement; that it was desirable to strengthen the civil element in its administration, and to deal consistently with the pension question, but the present was not the time for forcing such questions on the attention of Parliament. So, again, there could be no doubt that the annual cost of repairs had risen to an alarming figure. So far as he could collect from the present Estimates, it amounted to from £1,100,000 to £1,200,000 a-year, and that certainly was a most serious question. A searching inquiry ought to be made into this question of repairs, but that was not the time to do so, and he should therefore recommend his hon. Friend to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. A. EGERTON said, that Vote 6 and Vote 10, Section 1, were governed by the programme of shipbuilding for the year, and that to attack them as the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had done was to challenge the whole policy of the Admiralty, which had been substantially accepted by the House. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty, in introducing the Estimates, stated distinctly what his Programme was, and he thought, therefore, that the hon. Member for Burnley, before proceeding to reduce the Vote, should have given some indication of the mode in which he proposed to deal with that Programme which was, he contended, conceived in a proper spirit, and did no less than the country required of the Admiralty at the present moment. Complaints had been made that the expense of management bore an excess proportion to the wages of the men, and this proportion had been estimated as high as 30 per cent. It appeared, however, that the proportion had been decreasing, and that while in 1869-70 it was 13·63 per cent, in 1876-7 it was only 9·86 per cent. This showed that the charges for management had been of late years steadily diminishing. The civil management of the Dockyards was a large question, which required almost a night to itself, but upon the whole he had come to the conclusion that it was better to have a naval officer at the head of our Dockyards. Having had some previous experience in regard to boat and ship building, when he came to the Admiralty he tried to make some comparison as to the cost of building Her Majesty's ships in the Royal Dockyards and in private yards. It was difficult to come to an exact conclusion on account of the dead weight and establishment charges; but, upon the whole, taking the whole number of ships he had convinced himself that the cost of building in Her Majesty's Dockyards was slightly cheaper than in private yards, while there was much greater certainty of good work in public than in private yards. He should, therefore, be sorry to see the amount of work now done in the Royal Dockyards decreased to any great extent by sending it to private yards. The question of pensions and of "established" and "non-established" men was under the serious serious consideration of the Admiralty. The hon. Member for Burnley, who had had experience as a manufacturer, thought he got better men by paying a little more and not giving pensions. He (Mr. Egerton) had also had considerable experience as an employer of labour in large collieries where the men were pensioned. The result was, that there had been no strikes for a long period, and they were on better terms with their men than other employers. They had, in fact, a greater hold upon the men, and this he attributed to some extent to the system of granting pensions. He believed the same principle held good in Government establishments.

MR. SAMUDA opposed the proposed reduction, on the ground that under the Vote only 13,000 tons would be provided for, and if the number of tons to be built under Vote 10 were added the total would not amount to the 20,000 tons which his right hon. Friends below him considered necessary to make up for the annual waste from various causes arising in our Navy. As a private ship-builder of some experience he believed that no one in the Kingdom got work done so cheaply as the Government; and that arose from there being pensions allowed in old age, and from the dependence that existed upon the continuance of work in the public Dockyards. These things give the Government a command over labour that the private yards had not. The work could not be done better there than it was in the private yards, because the system of inspection there was carried to such an extent. But if the present Dockyard system was to be maintained, regularity of work and regularity as to the number of men employed were absolutely necessary.

MR. GORST was sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House would support the Government in any expenditure which might be necessary to maintain the efficiency of the Navy and the honour of the country. The charge of undue extravagance made against the Government must mean either that the Government were spending too much money on shipbuilding, or that the money voted for that purpose was not economically spent. The Committee would not be anxious at present to enter into the discussion of the first alternative, for, as he had said, every one would be inclined to support Ministers in necessary naval expenditure. Then came the question whether the money granted was spent in the most effectual manner. He should like to discuss that point on some future occasion, and much might be said in reference to it, but he thought that was not the moment to discuss in detail the question of Dockyard management, or the grievances that might be urged in connection with those employed in the Government establishments. Whatever the grievances of the Dockyard employees might be, he was authorized to say that they did not wish to press them at the present juncture, when it might be embarrassing to the Government. The men were desirous that the superannuation system should be kept up. It gave the Government a constant supply of steady men, who turned out very good work.

MR. E. J. REED considered that his hon. Friend had entirely failed to make out a case. He did not believe that this was the item on which they could best discuss the question of reduction in the Navy. Many of his hon. Friends about him spoke of the waste in Her Majesty's Dockyards, but he could honestly say from a long experience of Dockyard workmen, that it was quite a mistake to suppose that there was great idleness amongst them, or that their work was not performed in a most efficient manner. He hoped the next time his hon. Friend called attention to this subject, he would not look for reductions in these minor matters, but would bring to the test the necessity for some of the vessels we were building. If any reduction was to be made, it should rather be in Vote 10, which referred to ships built by contract.

MR. BENTINCK said, he had always been ready to support such expenditure as was necessary to keep the Navy in an efficient state. Some hon. Members seemed to be under the impression that when statements were made about the Navy in that House hon. Members were telling secrets out of school, but that was a mistake, for foreign Governments and foreign diplomatists knew a great deal more about our Army and Navy than many people in this country.

MR. T. BRASSEY said, that payment of labour in accordance with results was a great guarantee of economy in production. He knew that from private experience, and he thought the principle might very well be applied to the Government Dockyards. The work in the Dockyards was of the best character, and it was necessary to maintain the Dockyard establishments, for in a time of war we could not rely on private establishments.

MR. GOSCHEN asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, if he was prepared to present a Return for the last year showing the distribution of men on various ships, in order that the House might ascertain the manner in which the work was performed, and the probable cost?

MR. HUNT said, he would endeavour to supply the information required.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MOORE called attention to the large increase in the expenditure as regarded the chaplains who were members of the Church of England. He complained that the Roman Catholic chaplains were badly paid, their stipend being cut down to less than that of skilled workmen; while at the same time they had no retiring allowance.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, referring to the two descriptions of work done in the Dockyards, at a fixed rate of pay with superannuation pensions, and at the market rate of wages, asked how many factory men the Government proposed to establish, and on what terms? He also asked for explanations on the intended fitting-out of the Urgent, an old iron vessel, as a hospital ship for Jamaica, at a cost of £23,000?

MR. HUNT said, the Urgent was intended to serve as receiving ship at Jamaica, for which, being an iron ship, she was very suitable. A wooden vessel was more likely to be unhealthy, if used for such a purpose. Considering the object of the expenditure upon the Urgent, he did not think its amount was excessive. The number of factory men whom it was proposed to establish was 500. As it was a quarter to 11 o'clock and they had only obtained one Vote, he would not then discuss the large question as between hired men and men on the Establishment; but he might state that the Admiralty's plan had been adopted after much consideration. He believed that at present no factory men had been established, but the Admiralty were in communication with the Dockyards on the subject, and there was great expectation that the plan which had been adopted would be highly successful. With regard to the pay of Roman Catholic chaplains, he admitted it was not in a proper condition, and a proposition was now before the Treasury for an increase which he believed would be satisfactory. With regard to the Roman Catholic chaplain at Sheerness, whose salary had been complained of as too low, the answer was, that the £80 he received from the Admiralty was not the whole of his pay, as he also received a stipend from the War Office.

MR. SULLIVAN said, that the Vote was for £1,323,750 for Dockyards, and out of that million and a-quarter no less a sum than £839 was put down for Dockyards in Ireland, and this, he took it, was little better than a practical joke. Hon. Members might not be aware that in 1799 the then Government promised Irish Members that a Dockyard should be established in Ireland, and from that day to this the Vote of £839 had been taken yearly for the construction of a dock at Haulbowline. It had been calculated that at the present rate of work it would be finished in the year 2975. At any rate, the Union was accomplished, but part of the price to be paid—namely, this Dockyard—was still unaccomplished. The present state of things was, that when the tide was out six or eight dozen convicts went to work, "meandering, melancholy, slow," striving to do as little as they could; and when the tide turned as upon him, for his previous experience in the Arctic regions and general abilities as a navigator fully qualified him for this important duty. The Admiralty assented to certain officers accompanying Captain Allen Young, who had selected them; and the case being altogether an exceptional one the Admiralty treated it as such, and agreed to count their time as sea-going time. With regard to the damage done by Her Majesty's ships, it was impossible to say at the commencement of each year what was required under that head. Last year the sum required was exceeded. He was not aware what sum would be required for the present year. The case of the Monarch had been provided for in the last financial year.

MR. GOSCHEN hoped the permission given to the officers would not be drawn into a precedent.

SIR JOHN HAY quite approved the course taken with regard to the Naval officers in the Pandora, and only wished the same course had been taken with regard to Lieutenant Cameron.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(12.) £888,472, Half Pay, Reserved and Retired Pay to Officers of the Navy and Royal Marines.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY said, he desired to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, what conclusion he had come to in reference to a Petition which had been presented to him from a large number of retired commanders, asking for a step in rank after 15 years' seniority? He (Mr. Hanbury-Tracy) thought their case was a very hard one, and deserved a satisfactory settlement. Up to the year 1870, captains and commanders who retired, and who had not completed their qualifying sea-time, were allowed to obtain a step in rank after a certain number of years—captains on rising to the top of the list, and commanders after 15 years' seniority. This privilege was swept away in 1870, in the retirement scheme of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract. The reason for doing this was, he had always understood, that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers) thought there were far too many admirals; in fact, that the name of "admiral" had got into such general use, and was applied to so many officers who had not for so many years been at sea, that it was no longer looked up to with the feelings of respect which those who attained that high rank ought to have it treated. He had always understood that was the principal reason for abolishing the step in rank; but it must be pointed out, that whilst the privilege was taken away from the captains, it was taken away also from the commanders, but only on the general ground that you could not let one rank have the step and not the other. If that state of things had continued, nothing further could have been said. Unfortunately, last year the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hunt) thought fit to revert to the former order of things as regarded captains, allowing those who retired from the year 1870 to rise to the rank of admiral, but ignored the case of the commanders, who clearly ought to have been dealt with at the same time. He (Mr. Hanbury-Tracy) was very much opposed to tinkering or making alterations in the retirement scheme of 1870; but it was surely just to urge that if privileges of rising in rank were taken from two classes of officers under that scheme, it was most unfair afterwards to give them back to one and not to the other. More especially was this so, when it was remembered that the change was originally made to prevent too great use of the name and rank of admiral, and really only affected the captains. There was no question of pay included; it was simply a question of rank, which might be somewhat sentimental, but was no less a grievance which the commanders had every right to have redressed. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to granting the desired boon.

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, that the Petition had been considered, and he might say was still under consideration. The reason the step was not given to commanders last year, when it was granted to captains, was owing to the fact that as captains rose to the rank of admiral by seniority, and commanders were promoted by selection, the Admiralty did not then see that the same necessity existed of giving the step to commanders as it did to captains. At the same time, he did not mean to say that commanders would not be granted the same privilege. The question was again receiving the consideration of the Admiralty, and he would be glad if it could receive satisfactory settlement.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Selater-Booth, Mr. Salt.)

[BILL 190.] CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. HAMOND moved the insertion of a new clause providing that husband and wife in the workhouse, if either should be infirm, sick, or disabled, or above the age of 60, might be permitted, at the discretion of the Guardians, to live together, and every such case should be reported to the Local Government Board.

Clause—

("When any two persons being husband and wife shall be admitted into any workhouse, and either of them shall be infirm, sick, or disabled by any injury, or above the age of sixty years, it shall be lawful for the guardians of any union or parish to permit in their discretion such man and wife to live together, and every such case shall be reported forthwith to the Local Government Board,")—(Mr. Hamond.)

—brought up, and read the first and second time.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON proposed an Amendment to the clause, to the effect that if a man and wife were both above 55 years of age they should not be compelled to live separate and apart in workhouses. This would simply carry out the principle of the present law, which fixed the limit at 60 years of age. Further than that he contended there would be no increase of population occurring in the workhouse through the operation of the clause, for at the age mentioned, if not impossible, it would be very improbable. Beyond that, why should they separate a married couple at such an age?

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "wife," in line 1, to the end of the Clause, in order to add the words "both of whom shall be above the age of fifty-five years, shall be received into any workhouse, such two persons shall not be compelled to live separate and apart from each other in such workhouse; and any rule, order, or regulation, and any provision of any Act to the contrary is and are hereby respectively rescinded and repealed."—(Mr. Serjeant Simon.)

MR. WALTER said, he had great pleasure in supporting the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dewsbury. Since the subject was last under the consideration of the House he had looked into it a little, and had specially referred to the debate on the occasion when the rule was established which prescribed 60 years as the age at which married people should be allowed to live together in a workhouse. This rule formed no part of the original Poor Law, but was introduced almost exactly 29 years ago. The alteration was effected by Mr. Borthwick in 1847, when the Poor Law was undergoing revision. He introduced the Amendment, which was a relaxation of the original rigour of the Poor Law. It was opposed by Sir George Grey; it was accepted, with some qualifications, by Lord Russell; and he was strongly supported by his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) and by the late Mr. Ellice. They were high authorities, and they supported it, not on the ground that it would prevent outdoor relief, but that it would tend to increase it. Earl Russell wished to make it discretionary with the Guardians, and not compulsory upon them; but the House rejected that modification, and carried the Amendment by a majority of 70 to 55. It became the law of the land, and he should like to know what harm had ensued from the operation of the law. The hon. and learned Member stated there had been no increase in pauperism ascribable to it. He did not suppose that any increase would be ascribable if they adopted 55 instead of 60. But the point he wished to contend for was that, failing the condition that increase of the population was not to be allowed, they had no right to make the natural and best feelings of the poor a reason for oppressing them. There could not be a more odious principle than to employ the best feelings of the poor as a means of working upon them to their loss and discomfort. As a matter of fact, he believed poor people of the age of 60 seldom applied to live together in the workhouse. He, therefore, contended that no danger was to be apprehended from this relaxation of the law. He had visited the workhouses of two Unions—the workhouse in his own neighbourhood and the Chelsea Workhouse—and the excellent officials at these institutions stated that, not only had they never experienced an application from old people to live together, but they had received expressions of satisfaction from unfortunate married couples that they were able to live separate. The master of the Chelsea Workhouse told him that there was no wish to bring old married couples into the workhouse, as there was no accommodation for them, in fact; and outdoor relief was always given them. He had no objection to that; he thought it was the right principle; but if they compelled them to go in, they would work upon the natural feelings of the better class of the aged poor. Where such a class of persons were compelled to go into the house, they ought not to be separated, a proceeding which was a real hardship to them, but which was none at all to another class who were often driven there by the intemperance or bad conduct of one or the other, and who gladly accepted it as the best arrangement for them. Those were the grounds on which he supported the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury. He would not now express any opinion as to the second clause, but with regard to the first he should give his cordial support to the proposal before the House.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that as the matter had been discussed the other night very fully, he would not go over the arguments again. He did not wish to fix the limit at 55 or 60, but rather to go back on the principle of allowing the Guardians to exercise that discretion which the Poor Law gave them. Everybody was aware that in a large number of Unions where provision had been made for separate quarters for married couples that such provision had never been availed of. The Guardians might safely be left to exercise the discretion proposed to be left them by his hon. Friend. He hoped, however, the House would negative the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite.

The House divided:—Ayes 144; Noes 72: Majority 72.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD moved, after Clause 11, the insertion of the following clause—

"The Local Government Board may by their order, upon the application of the ratepayers of any union or parish made in pursuance of one or more resolutions passed at a vestry or vestries duly convened for that purpose, authorize and direct such ratepayers to elect guardians, who shall hold office for a period of three years. The said Board may also, upon the application of such ratepayers, made in pursuance of one or more such resolutions as aforesaid, rescind such order: Provided, however, that the rescision of such order shall not invalidate or affect any election which may have already taken place under it."

Clause (Local Government Board may authorise election of guardians to hold office for three years,)—(Mr. Morgan Lloyd,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH opposed the clause. He was aware that many Boards were in favour of such a change, but the question of triennial elections of Guardians might well stand over. It should, however, receive his attention. He could not assent to the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman at present; but he hoped to be able to do so on some future occasion, when dealing with the general state of the law.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD, satisfied with the assurance that the question should receive the consideration of the Government, said, he would withdraw the clause.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Walter

MR. MORGAN LLOYD moved, after Clause 14, to insert the following clause—

“It shall not be lawful for guardians of the poor to pay out of the poor rates any church rates, notwithstanding anything contained in the seventh section of the Act thirty-first and thirty-second Victoria, chapter one hundred and nine; Provided, That, nothing herein contained shall alter or affect any other provision of the said Act.”

The clause was rendered necessary by the construction placed upon the 7th section of the Church Rates Abolition Act by the Local Government Board, who had held that its provisions enabled Poor Law Guardians to pay a voluntary church rate out of the poor rates. He believed that interpretation was wrong, but even if it were right it was not in accordance with the intention of the framers of that Act. As a proof of this he would refer to a letter written by the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), in which it was distinctly stated that the clause was never intended to authorize any such payment by Poor Law Guardians.

Clause (Payment of church rates by poor law guardians,)—(Mr. Morgan Lloyd,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the said Clause be now read a second time.”

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he could not pretend to argue a point of law with the hon. and learned Gentleman, but certainly that was the first time he had ever heard such an interpretation of voluntary payment of church rates as that which the hon. and learned Gentleman had now given of them in connection with the poor rates. He could not accept the declared intention of the authors of a Bill as against the legal construction of it by professional advisers, which was that the payments objected to were legal, and he objected to amending so important a measure as the Church Rates Abolition Act by a clause in the Bill of this character. If it was intended to modify the Act referred to it ought to be done by a separate Motion, and not introduced at the end of a Bill having a different object in view. For that reason he objected to the insertion of the clause.

MR. STANSFELD hoped the right hon. Gentleman would re-consider his opinion, and give the House an opportunity to modify the clause.

The House divided:—Ayes 80; Noes 112: Majority 32.

MR. RICHARD moved the insertion of the following clause:—

“It shall be lawful for the guardians of any poor law union to make such arrangements as they may see fit for the religious instruction or worship of the inmates of any workhouse under their control, any existing provision contained in any statute, rule, or regulation to the contrary notwithstanding.”

His object was to enable other ministers besides clergymen of the Church of England to be appointed as chaplains of workhouses. At present they could only appoint chaplains of the Established Church, although the majority of paupers might be Nonconformists.

Clause (Religious instruction of inmates of workhouses,)—(Mr. Richard,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the said Clause be now read a second time.”

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH opposed the clause on the ground that it would not provide the remedy desired, and said that the Local Government Board never insisted on the appointment of a Church of England chaplain, if satisfied that other arrangements were properly made. The Guardians under the existing law had very great power in the matter, and the clause as it was proposed might lead to great inconvenience, if not abuse. There was really no necessity whatever for the clause.

MR. STANSFELD said, the whole question was a money question. The only paid chaplain who could by the law be appointed must belong to the Established Church. If any Board of Guardians chose to appoint and pay another person to give religious instruction or conduct worship, it must be at their own cost; and if the latter part of the clause were omitted he thought the clause might be adopted.

MR. RICHARD said, on the third reading of the clause he would be ready to admit the Amendment of the hon. Member for the County of Kildare, or some other verbal Amendment, which would secure the main object—freedom of religious instruction and worship.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 81; Noes 107: Majority 26.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the further Consideration of the Bill be now adjourned."—(Mr. Biggar.)

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH hoped the measure would be proceeded with, as it could be finished in 10 minutes.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 45; Noes 119: Majority 74.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 3, after the word "away," to insert at the end the words "The justices to hear the complaint against a husband, under the thirty-third section of the Act of the thirty-first and thirty-second years of Her Majesty, chapter one hundred and twenty-two, may be other than those who summoned him to appear before them, but acting for the same petty sessional division."—(Mr. Sclater-Booth.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. O'Sullivan.)

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

PREVENTION OF CRIMES ACT AMENDMENT BILL—(No. 125.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

EARL BEAUCHAMP, in moving that this Bill be now read the second time, said, that the object of the measure, which had come up from the Commons, was to enable the Secretary of State in England and the Lord Lieutenant in Ireland to classify the prisoners to whom registration and photography under the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, should apply. It had been found by experience that the number of identifications from registration and photographs had not borne so large a proportion to that of the number of prisoners registered and photographed as had been expected. When prisoners of a very tender age were photographed, the advantage as regarded subsequent identification was very slight indeed. Again, in very many cases the police were able to identify from memory. Gaolers and the police were able generally to form a good idea as to the prisoners who ought to be photographed, and this Bill would enable the Government to exercise a discretion in the matter, which at present was not permitted.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Steward.)

LORD ABERDARE said, it was a matter of the utmost importance that some system should be adopted through which persons accused of crime could be identified and classified, so that the punishment could be made proportionate to the criminality of the offender. During the time he was in office, several Acts had been passed having this object in view, but they were all of a tentative character, and he should be glad to see them revised and consolidated. In his opinion, the police supervision in respect of the convict classes was of the utmost value. In this, as well as in other matters of a cognate character, the magistrates of Gloucestershire had set an excellent example. They had tried the effect of short terms of imprisonment followed by police supervision, and had found it to produce very satisfactory results. There was gaol accommodation in Gloucestershire for 800 prisoners; but of the several prisons in that county all were closed except one, and in that one there were only 222 prisoners last year and 197 the year before. In other counties there was no communication between the gaolers and the police, and at quarter sessions when sentencing prisoners, the magistrates did not impose supervision. When Home Secretary, he addressed a Circular on the subject to the magistracy, and in some respects that appeal had not been in vain. He would suggest that good results would be likely to follow some such action on the part of the present Home Secretary, who had introduced such important measures and shown such zeal in the discharge of the duties of his office.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS BILL.

(Nos. 131-144.)

THIRD READING. BILL PASSED.

Bill read 3^a (according to Order.)

On Question, "That this Bill do pass?"

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY heartily thanked the Government for having brought in the Bill. It was, no doubt, an imperfect measure, and not all that those whom he represented could wish; but it was a marvel that they had obtained so much. He had accepted with much reluctance the introduction of the words permitting vivisection, "for the advancement by new discovery of physiological knowledge," but he had done so in the hope of conciliating scientific men, both in the passing of the Bill, and afterwards when it should have come into operation as law. He hoped the Bill would be passed in the other House without any very decided opposition, and that when it became law all parties would unite in promoting those objects of humanity and philanthropy which had led to the introduction of the Bill.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

THE FORTIFICATIONS OF MALTA.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

EARL DE LA WARR in asking Her Majesty's Government, If it is proposed to add or substitute guns of greater calibre than those now existing in the principal forts of Malta; and whether there is any objection to giving information with regard to the present state of efficiency of the fortifications of Valetta, said, he did not think it necessary to preface with many remarks the Question which he wished to put to Her Majesty's Government. His object was that their Lordships should be put in possession of such information on the subject of the present state of the fortifications of Malta as Her Majesty's Government might be willing and able to communicate. He knew that there was to some extent an opinion prevailing that matters of this kind should be left unnoticed in the hands of Her Majesty's Government. He agreed partly with what might be said in favour of that view; but, at the same time, he thought Parliament and the country ought to have some information given them on subjects such as that to which his Question referred. If their Lordships generally were to be asked what was the present condition of the defences of Malta, he was doubtful whether it would be found that their Lordships were in possession of any very definite information. His noble Friend the noble Viscount opposite, the late Secretary for War (Viscount Cardwell), would, doubtless, be able to give all the information that might be desired, and also the noble Earl who represented the War Department in their Lordships' House (Earl Cadogan); and he could not think it undesirable that their Lordships and the country generally should be clearly informed upon a matter of such great importance as the efficiency of the fortress of Valetta and the general state of the defences of Malta. Such a question as he now asked might have been of less consequence if naval and military warfare had undergone no changes of late years—it would have been necessary to look only to the past history of Malta to be assured of the strength of its defences; and the point, therefore, to which he wished to draw their Lordships' attention was this—whether the armaments and strength of the fortress of Valetta had kept pace with recent changes in naval and military warfare? Looking at Malta as the key of the naval position of this country in the Mediterranean, it was impossible to exaggerate the importance of that consideration. With reference to the first part of the Question—whether it was proposed to add or substitute guns of greater calibre than those now existing in the principal forts of Malta—he would only ask the noble Earl to inform their Lordships what were the size and number of the heavy guns now in the principal forts which commanded the harbour of Valetta, and what were the size and number of those it was proposed to add or substitute. He believed he was right in saying that the largest guns now in position there were 25-ton guns. It must be remembered that guns of this calibre were now comparatively small. Her Majesty's ship Devastation carried, he believed, four 35-ton guns, and a Russian ship, the Peter the Great, of similar construction, but larger, carried also, he believed, four 35-ton guns. It was probable that before long we should have still heavier guns afloat, and it could not be satisfactory that a fortress like Malta should be protected with guns of inferior calibre. As regarded the second part of the Question—the state of efficiency of the fortifications of Valetta—the noble Earl would perhaps excuse him if he called his attention to a Return made last year to the House of Commons, by which it appeared that in the year 1870 there was expended upon the fortifications and defences of Malta £12,863; in the year 1871, £17,718; in the year 1872, £53,166; and in the year 1873, £42,659—showing a considerable increase in succeeding years. In the year 1874 the total military expenditure amounted to £250,526, but he did not find what proportion of this was expended upon fortifications and defences. It would, perhaps, be satisfactory for the information of their Lordships if the noble Earl could state whether the increase was for strengthening the old fortifications of the harbour or for carrying on works of defence elsewhere. It was probable that a considerable outlay would be required to enable the old works to carry the heavier guns. He spoke with some diffidence on this subject in the presence of naval and military Members of their Lordships' House; but no observer of passing events could fail to notice that there were few, if any, places in Her Majesty's dominions which had a greater claim to attention in a naval and military point of view than the Island of Malta.

EARL CADOGAN said, Her Majesty's Government fully recognized the importance of arming the fortifications of Malta with guns of the newest and best pattern, and of sufficient calibre to cope with any which might be brought against them. The House would not, he felt sure, expect him to make a detailed statement on such a subject; but he might say that the work of strengthening the armament of the Island had been, and was being, gradually carried out. With regard to the fortifications of Valetta, he was informed by those most conversant with the matter that they were in a satisfactory condition.

ROYAL IRISH ACADEMY.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

LORD O'HAGAN, in rising to move for Correspondence connected with the Art Institutions of Dublin, said: My Lords, the Papers for which I move, and which I trust my noble Friend, the Lord President, will not refuse, relate to a question which has produced—and in my judgment has inevitably produced—a good deal of annoyance and irritation in Ireland. Until these Papers are before your Lordships I do not propose to deal with the question at any length: but it is necessary that I should very briefly inform the House of the circumstances in which it has originated. The position of the Royal Irish Academy, as a scientific and literary institution, is known to many of your Lordships. Some of you are members of it, and to others its well established reputation must be familiar. It was founded about the year 1785 by a voluntary association of gentlemen, very eminent for their social rank and intellectual culture, under the presidency of the Earl of Charlemont. In 1786, it obtained a Royal Charter, which, in the recital, after speaking of the ancient renown of Ireland for the pursuit of learning, declared the will of the Sovereign to be that the Academy should be established for the cultivation of "science, polite literature, and antiquarian research," and to this end it was endowed with various privileges and a modest grant of money which has since been increased, from time to time, until it is now £2,000 a-year—still a very moderate sum in comparison with the revenues of kindred institutions, but utilized to the utmost and made productive of most valuable results. From the date of the Charter down to the present hour, the Academy has laboured unceasingly and with signal success in carrying out the objects which were set before it. It has taken a very high place amongst the learned societies of the world, and is recognized and respected by them all. Its transactions are regarded with universal interest and attention: and the most distinguished men in Europe look upon admission to its membership as an honour. For Ireland, it fulfils the functions which belong to the Royal Society in England, and is beyond comparison the national institution of which her people have most reason to be proud. In the highest walks of science it has achieved great things, and the names of such men as M'Cullagh and Hamilton and Lloyd and Andrew have, from generation to generation, shed lustre on it for nearly 100 years. It has united the departments of polite literature and antiquities, and in them, also, has done noble service. It has preserved numbers of ancient manuscripts of entirely inestimable value for historical and philological purposes. It has formed a museum, unique and unequalled, containing, as has been declared by a Select Committee of the other House of Parliament, the richest and most important collection of Celtic antiquities in any nation. It has made and is making precious contributions to archæology—Irish and foreign—through the fruitful labours of men like Petrie, and Graves, and O'Curry, and Todd and Ferguson. In all its departments, it is as active and efficient as at any period of its history, and your Lordships will not wonder that, with such antecedents and such results, it commands a fond appreciation and a justifiable pride by the people for whom it has laboured so worthily and so long. They are content with it. They wish no change in it; and they fear any novel experiments which may result in its injury. Two proposals have recently been made with respect to it, though not, I believe, for the first time. It has been suggested, that the Royal Irish Academy should be amalgamated with the Royal Dublin Society, and the official person, Mr.

Donnelly, in whose letter that proposal was communicated as having the approval of Lord Sandon, adds to it another—that the amalgamation should go further, and connect the Royal Irish Academy and the Royal Agricultural Society of Ireland. This is the first proposal; and the second, which has, I hear, been partially carried into effect, is this—that the control of the grant to the Academy should be taken from the Irish Government, which has heretofore administered it, and committed to the Department of Science and Art at South Kensington. To both of these propositions the Royal Irish Academy has offered a prompt and peremptory, and, in my opinion, a becoming resistance. I desire to speak of the Royal Dublin Society with the truest respect. It is an old Irish institution—older in duration than the Royal Irish Academy—and within its proper sphere it has done infinite service to the country. But its sphere is wholly different from that of the Academy. It was created and is maintained to promote the industries of Ireland, manufacturing and agricultural, and it has been true to its trust and has promoted them faithfully and well. And so has the Royal Agricultural Society. It aims to improve the cultivation of the soil and amend the breed of cattle, and I have no doubt it has been greatly serviceable in these respects. But, surely there is a grotesque unfitness for amalgamation between such a body and the Academy—between those who pursue abstract science, in its loftiest regions, and polite letters and archæology, with purposes purely historical and literary, and those who devote themselves altogether, however meritoriously, to the development of the nation's material wealth and productive industry. They cherish aims wholly distinct, and move in planes wholly different, and I do not think that your Lordships will be surprised to find the members of the Academy repudiating the proposed connection as calculated to compromise their position—to destroy the *présti*ge they have won by the toils and triumphs of a century—and, instead of improving either of the amalgamated bodies, to breed confusion and complication from their ill-judged alliance; and diminish the value of both by putting them on lines of action for which they were not designed, and subjecting them to a mixed management to which they are unsuited. So much for the first proposal; and for the second, it is, I believe, quite as distasteful to the Academy. Heretofore, the Irish Government has been accountable for the sums voted by Parliament, and has discharged its functions with perfect propriety and complete satisfaction at once to the Treasury and to the Academy. Why should there be any change? No one has asked for it. No one desires it. It is justified by no public necessity. It promises no public advantage. The Academy is not disposed to submit to be subordinated to a Department at South Kensington which is not homogeneous with it, which is not animated by its spirit or engaged in its pursuits, which may be and is extremely valuable in many ways to England, but was not established, and is not qualified, to assume the control of Irish institutions. The Academy, at all events, declines to acknowledge its superiority or submit to its centralizing control—believing that the Irish Government, whilst it acts in Ireland as it ought to do, under the influence of Irish opinion and with a single regard to Irish interests, is far more likely to consult carefully and well the wants and wishes of the Academy, than any body of officials resident in England and having ample employment in the discharge of their proper duties, without meddling in matters which do not concern them and which they do not understand. My Lords, on both these points the Academy has spoken with no uncertain sound. At a meeting of the body on the 29th May it was resolved—

That resolution was proposed by my friend Dr. Russell, the President of Maynooth College, who came to the meeting to deny that the Commission of 1868, of which he was a member, had given any countenance to the project of amalgamation. It was seconded by my noble and gallant Friend opposite (Lord Gough), and it could not have been presented under more influential auspices. The resolution of the Academy as to the second proposal was, if possible, more decided and emphatic. The Council had reported that, in their opinion,—

“acquiescence in the transfer of the Vote from the Royal Irish Academy to the Science and Art Department would be attended with consequences fatal to the independence, and highly detrimental to the usefulness of the Academy."

And the meeting resolved, on the motion of a very eminent Fellow of Trinity College, which was seconded by Master Pigott—

"That the Academy protests against the transfer from the Irish Government of the charge of the Academy's Parliamentary grant, and declares its determination to forego all claim on the bounty of Parliament rather than apply to the Science and Art Department of the Committee of Council on Education for any issue of its grant."

That, my Lords, is a strong resolution, and indicates how earnest is the feeling which has been evoked amongst the intellectual classes of Ireland by the proposed changes. I do most sincerely trust that the adoption of an alteration so serious may not be forced on the Academy:—and I have moved in this matter, merely of my own accord, having a natural interest in it as myself a member of the body, that I might contribute, if possible, to avert what would be, in my judgment, for many reasons, a national calamity. I have asked for the Papers very much with the hope of fixing the attention of the noble Duke upon the subject of them, and with the full assurance from my knowledge of my noble Friend that if he will personally consider it—if he will look at it with his own eyes and decide according to his own judgment—what is at once right and kindly will be done—natural and honourable susceptibilities will be respected—the public Bodies to which I have adverted will be kept in their proper courses and made to pursue, with independence, their peculiar ends, and justice will be done to an institution which, in its scientific and literary action, has deserved well of Ireland, the empire and the world.

Moved, That there be laid before the House—

Copies of all public official correspondence, commencing 8th February 1876, between the Irish Government, the Treasury, the Science and Art Department, the Royal Dublin Society, and the Royal Irish Academy on the subject of the proposed establishment of a Science and Art Museum in Dublin."—(The Lord O'Hagan.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he was grateful to his noble and learned Friend for giving him an opportunity of endeavouring, if possible, to allay and put an end to any feelings of annoyance and irritation which were said to prevail in Ireland on this subject. Nothing could be further from the wishes or intentions of the Government than to say or do anything that would cause the slightest irritation to any of the learned and scientific bodies in Ireland, and nothing that they had done, he would fain hope, could produce such consequences. The history and position of the Royal Irish Academy were well known; while the marvellous collection of antiquities it possessed—the most remarkable, he believed, in the world, with, perhaps, the exception of the collection at Copenhagen—and also the manner in which the articles were kept by that society, would call forth the highest praise from those who took an interest in such matters. He found that Sir W. Wilde, in his evidence before a Committee of the House of Commons, stated that—

"up to the meeting in March last every article in the Museum, now about 12,000, had been catalogued, with the exception of some coins; and that if the Museum were removed to-morrow there would not be 30 articles to number or register."

With regard to the Correspondence now moved for, he might have declined to produce it on the ground that it was not complete, and that the negotiations were still pending; but he was unwilling to do so, because it might possibly suggest that there was something to keep back. At the same time he preferred to give the Correspondence in an amended form, and one which, he thought, would supply all the information desired by his noble and learned Friend. It would, he thought, show that there had been some misapprehension as to the course the Government had taken in the matter. What had really occurred was this. Representations had been made to successive Governments with a view to concentrate and develop the various scientific institutions which exist in Dublin; and when his right hon. Friend now at the head of the Government previously held a similar position the Government proposed to create a separate Department of Science and Art for Ireland. Accordingly, a Commission, consisting largely of noblemen and gentlemen connected with that country, was appointed to carry that proposal out. The Commission was composed of the Marquess of Kildare, Dr. Russell, President of Maynooth; the Rev. Samuel Haughton, of Trinity College, Dublin; Mr. G. A. Hamilton, the then Secretary to the Treasury, who was thoroughly Irish in all his views; Colonel Laffan, of the Royal Engineers; and others. The Commission was thoroughly Irish, and understood what was required for Ireland. The Commissioners were appointed for the purpose of considering how the different institutions in Dublin could best be developed, and how a separate Department of Science and Art for Ireland was to be constituted. But they very shortly came to the conclusion that it would not be to the interest of Ireland that there should be a separate Department of Science and Art for Ireland, and that it would prevent Irish students coming to this country to participate, which they now did, in the grants for Science and Art, and to compete as they did in many instances successfully, with their English fellow-students. The Secretary of the Commission was therefore directed to write the following letter to the Lord President:—

“The Minute states that ‘Her Majesty’s Government has decided to constitute a separate Department of Science and Art for Ireland analogous in its constitution to the existing Science and Art Department in London for the United Kingdom,’ and also ‘to frame a plan for the formation of a Department for Ireland, the permanent head of which shall be a secretary and director resident in Dublin, with a sufficient staff, who will report direct to the head of Education Department.’ Is the Commission thereby precluded from considering the question of the desirability of having or not having an entirely separate Department for Ireland?”

Well, having obtained permission to consider this question, they gave up the idea of a separate Department for Ireland. In the conclusion of their Report the Commission regretted their inability to carry out the Minute of the 22nd of May, 1868, in its integrity, by framing a separate Department for Ireland analogous in its constitution to the existing Science and Art Department, as mature consideration had convinced them that the institution of a separate Department would be detrimental to the interests of Science and Art in Ireland. They said they were of opinion that all the advantages to be obtained by the Minute of the 22nd of May might be practically secured by the arrangements indicated in one of the recommendations which they made—to some of which he would call attention. No action was taken at the time on that Report, and when Her Majesty’s late Government retired from office, as far as he was aware no action had been taken upon it. But during the last Session of Parliament the matter was taken up in the other House by two hon. Members, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer undertook that the matter should receive the most earnest attention of Her Majesty’s Government during the autumn of last year. Accordingly during last autumn his noble Friend the Vice President of the Council on Education and Mr. Smith, the Secretary to the Treasury, went over to Dublin and put themselves in communication with the Chief Secretary. They considered most minutely what arrangements could be made; and after considerable care and thought, in which deliberation he also, as head of the Council on Education, naturally took part, they communicated with the Lord Lieutenant; and the result was that a proposal was made by Her Majesty’s Government and embodied in a Letter, which his noble Friend the Vice President signed and which was sent to the Department in Dublin. The second paragraph of that Letter stated that from representations made to the Government as to the general wishes of the country, from the recommendations of the Commission, and from the evidence given before that Commission it appeared that a consolidation of the various Societies in Dublin had become essential to further progress. The Government proposed to contribute, he thought, from £80,000 to £100,000 to establish one large Museum in Dublin. His noble and learned Friend opposite (Lord O’Hagan) at the commencement of his remarks complained that the view of Her Majesty’s Government was that there should be an amalgamation of these Societies. He (the Duke of Richmond) should like it to be thoroughly understood that the Government had proposed no such thing. He thought that misapprehension arose from a letter to which he would refer. After the Government made a proposal to establish a Museum in Dublin and to combine all these Societies, a deputation from the Royal Dublin Society came to London.

the Duke of Richmond) was not to have an interview with the deputation, but his noble Friend the Vice-President received them; and, after his Friend received them, some of the members of the body had an interview with the gentleman who was at the head of the Scientific Department at Kensington. That gentleman wrote to Dr. Steele a letter which was private or semi-official letter rather than a strictly official document. But the letter contained these words—

After meeting the deputation from the Royal Society last Wednesday, I submitted the following Memorandum to Lord Sandon:—

I have had a long interview to-day with the deputation from the Royal Dublin Society; and I am confident that many difficulties would be removed if an amalgamation could be effected between the Royal Irish Academy and the Royal Society.

The arrangement of such an amalgamation would be a matter entirely for the societies, but I will tend to forward such a scheme if the members interested were assured that it met our Lordship's approval, and that if they were prepared to take the necessary steps, the Government would give them any aid in its power.

Further, there is some possibility of an amalgamation of the Royal Agricultural Society and with the Royal Dublin Society. If these were carried out would the Government be asked to provide for the Agricultural Shows in Phoenix Park, and remove them from the present buildings beside Leinster House?

Lord Sandon has authorized me to give this answer generally.

Will you, therefore, kindly inform the members of the deputation of this? I should add that I told Lord Sandon that if an amalgamation were effected, it would probably take the form of a new society, with a limited number of ordinary members, and an agricultural committee.

I said nothing about this in the Memorandum; it is, of course, a matter purely for the societies to arrange."

Therefore, it was a mistaken notion that the Government tried to force these Societies into an amalgamation. And the noble and learned Lord said that there was a grotesque unfitness in the amalgamation of these Societies. He reminded him that with that the Government had nothing to do; and, of course, if the Societies themselves felt that to be the case they would not amalgamate. Then the noble and learned Lord talked of the grant being taken from the Science and Art Department of South Kensington; but perhaps the noble and learned Lord was not aware that in reality the grant came through the Lord President of the Council—because Art and Science was one of the branches of the Department. Education was divided into two heads—Primary Education and Scientific and Art Education, both of which were under the Lord President of the Council. This was not a suggestion emanating from the Science and Art Department nor from the Lord President of the Council, but was what was recommended by the Royal Commission presided over by the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Leinster). The Report to which he alluded contained the following:—

"We regret our inability to carry out the Minute of the 22nd of May in its literal integrity, by framing a plan for the formation of a separate Department of Science and Art for Ireland analogous in its constitution to the existing Science and Art Department in London; as a mature consideration has convinced us that the formation of a separate Department for Ireland would be detrimental to the interests of science and art in that country. We are of opinion, however, that all the advantages for Ireland proposed in that Minute may be practically secured by the arrangements indicated in the following recommendations:—

"That in order to afford advantages and facilities to students, artisans and others in Dublin, in some respects similar to those which are yielded by the South Kensington Museum in London, and in other respects to those afforded by the Science and Art Museum in Edinburgh, it is very desirable that there should be a General Industrial and Fine Arts Museum in Dublin. The people of Ireland would thus obtain the fullest opportunity of improvement in the cultivation of the industrial and decorative arts by the study of approved models and objects.

"That this Museum should be purely a State Establishment, under a Director responsible to the Lord President or other Minister in charge of education.

"That the Director of the Science and Art Museum should be in immediate relation, not only with the Minister of Education, but also with the Irish Government, and it should be his duty to place himself in communication with the representatives of the various industrial interests of the country, with a view to the development of its resources.

"That all Votes for museums and educational establishments in Ireland should be taken on the responsibility of the Lord President of the Council or other Minister in charge of education directly responsible to Parliament."

He might add that within the last few months arrangements had been made with the Royal Society in London for the purpose of carrying out further researches, and they were to account for the money they received through the

Science and Art Department, and through the Lord President of the Council, and he had no reason to believe that what was acceptable as regarded our Royal Society here would be distasteful to the Royal Irish Society.

CIVIL SERVICE INQUIRY COMMISSION —THE CUSTOMS.—QUESTION.

DR. CAMERON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the scheme embodied in the Report of the Playfair Commission is to be applied to the Customs Establishment; and, if so, whether it is intended to offer any special terms to the older members of the Customs service to induce them to retire in order to facilitate the adoption of the scheme?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he presumed that the hon. Gentleman referred to the indoor Customs. No scheme had been presented to the Treasury. If any scheme should be submitted, it would, of course, receive due consideration.

UNITED STATES—THE EXTRADITION TREATY.—QUESTION.

MR. STAVELEY HILL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether negotiations are in progress for putting an end to the immunity from crime resulting from the possible annulment of the Extradition Treaty between this Country and the United States; and, whether he will give the House an opportunity during the present Session of discussing the policy of so amending the Extradition Act of 1870, as to enable a State, obtaining the committal and extradition of a prisoner, to put him upon his trial upon another charge, being in the list of extradition offences agreed upon between the two Countries, in addition to or in substitution for the charge upon which he has been committed and given up?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury had requested him, in his own unavoidable absence, to inform his hon. and learned Friend that the Premier thought that in his remarks last night he had anticipated this Question, when he said that, in the opinion of the Government, it would not be advisable that any discussion on this subject should take place until the last despatch of Mr. Fish and the answer to it were upon the Table of the House.

TURKEY—THE INSURGENT PRO- VINCES.—QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether there is any foundation for the statements which appeared in an Hungarian paper, the "Neusatz Zastava," that British ships have landed at Klek a large quantity of provisions, cartridges, and money for the Turkish troops; and, the statement of the "Moscow Gazette" that England is supplying arms and money to the Turkish force in Herzegovina?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the Government had no information that British ships had landed at Klek provisions, cartridges, and money for the Turkish troops; and with regard to any statement in the Hungarian, German, or Russian papers that the English Government were supplying arms and money to the Turkish force in Herzegovina, his reply was, that Her Majesty's Government had neither directly nor indirectly supplied any arms to any Turkish troops. With respect to the unhappy disturbances in which Turkey was involved, Her Majesty's Government had maintained a strict neutrality, and they expected a similar neutrality to be observed by other Powers.

THE VOLUNTEER REVIEW IN HYDE PARK.—QUESTION.

MR. E. J. REED asked the First Commissioner of Works, If he can inform the House what are the final arrangements for the Volunteer Review?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: In answer to the Question of my hon. Friend I have to say that as far as I know the arrangements for the Volunteer Review on Saturday next in Hyde Park are finally settled. Her Majesty's Government, after consulting with His Royal Highness the Ranger of the Park, have decided that no stands should be admitted at all. They came to this decision owing to the great damage which must necessarily be caused to the Park by attempting to erect structures on so large a scale as would be required. In place of the stands, however, there will be an inclosure, and this inclosure will be hurdled off, and will extend the whole range of the bases for saluting. That will comprise about 2,200 feet in length, and 30 feet in depth. It will be divided into various smaller inclosures for the accommodation of various public bodies of the State. In the centre, immediately behind the saluting point, where His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales will stand, there will be an inclosure which will be devoted to the Royal carriages, and none other but Royal carriages will be admitted to the Park. In immediate contiguity to that there will be an inclosure for those members of the Diplomatic Body who may wish to take advantage of this opportunity to see our Volunteer Force. On either side of the Royal inclosure there will be a large space set apart for both Houses of Parliament. I may say that I hope to be able to give each Member who may apply two tickets. I propose not to make one inclosure for the House of Lords only, and another for the House of Commons only, but that the two inclosures shall be open to the Members of both Houses. I think that would be a convenience in cases where a Member might wish to bring his family and go into the same inclosure with them. I have to make an appeal to hon. Gentlemen on this point, and that is, that they will have the goodness to apply for any tickets they may require on or before the rising of the House on Thursday evening next. The Speaker's Secretary has been kind enough, as usual, to undertake to distribute the tickets, and it is quite evident that, where so many tickets have to be issued, that gentleman must have at least one clear day in order to make sure that the tickets have not miscarried on their way to those who may have asked for them. Besides this, there will be inclosures for the friends of the Volunteers, and I propose to issue—what I hope will be considered a handsome amount—namely, 5,000 tickets. The rest of the inclosure will be devoted to public bodies, and at the extreme end there will be a small space set apart on each side for the general public—a very small space. [Laughter.] I can assure hon. Members that if for the last four days they had been occupying the post I have the honour to fill, they would not have met that remark with a laugh, for it appears to me that there is no end to the applications, both in point of numbers, distance, professions, and quarters in London and out of it, that have been flowing in by every post, and that before I had the honour of making any public announcement on the subject. Before I sit down I may be allowed, as guardian of the Parks, to make one appeal, not to hon. Members, but through this House to the general public. The Parks are now in all their beauty, both as regards flowers and trees, and, of course, as we must expect on Saturday next to see a vast concourse of people in the Park, so we must expect that there will be a great many persons who are not in this limited list which I have given to the House, and who will try to climb into the trees to see the Review. Everything will be done, as far as police arrangements are concerned, to guard on this occasion against the recurrence of that disastrous destruction of public property in the shape of trees that took place on the occasion of the last Review that was held. Everything will be done to prevent youths from breaking the trees, and breaking their own necks by tumbling out of them; but on an occasion of this kind, in the last resort, we must trust to the good sense and feeling of the general public to protect their own property as far as possible.

CHINA—THE BLOCKADE QUESTION. QUESTION.

MR. PENDER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, What arrangement has been arrived at by the Government of Hong Kong with the Chinese authorities at Canton, in reference to what is known as the Blockade Question; and, if he would produce the Correspondence on the subject?

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, the Question, which was one of considerable difficulty, had for a long time occupied the anxious attention of Her Majesty's Government. Communications were at present going on between the Colonial and Foreign Offices on one side, and the Chinese authorities on the other; and he hoped the result of those communications would be that they would shortly be able to determine the amount of the duty that should be levied on the Chinese junks entering the port of Hong Kong. The Papers relating to the subject would shortly, he hoped, be laid on the Table of the House.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Sclater-Booth, Mr. Salt.)

[BILL 190.] CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

Order read, for resuming adjourned Debate on Amendment [26th June] (proposed on Consideration of the Bill, as amended); and which Amendment was,

In page 5, line 3, after the word "away," to insert the words "The justices to hear the complaint against a husband, under the thirty-third section of the Act of the thirty-first and thirty-second years of Her Majesty, chapter one hundred and twenty-two, may be other than those who summoned him to appear before them, but acting for the same petty sessional division."—(Mr. Sclater-Booth.)

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. PELL moved, as an Amendment, that a provision be inserted to the effect that Boards of Guardians might, where it was considered practicable and expedient, grant medical relief by way of loan. His object was that when a case came before a Board of Guardians, in which the Board believed, after due inquiry, that an applicant for medical relief was only temporarily disabled from paying the cost thereof, the Guardians should be enabled to come to terms with him, so that they might recover from him the cost of the relief administered when his circumstances permitted of repayment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 34, after the word "orders," to insert the words "And any board of guardians may where medical relief is granted on loan declare that the same is so granted, and they may recover in any county court having jurisdiction in the union, or any part thereof, from the person to whom such relief is granted the reasonable cost of the same."—(Mr. Pell.)

DR. LUSH said, that medical loan relief was a new term, and he wished to know if the adoption of the Amendment would throw any additional duties on the medical man without compensation?

MR. CLARE READ said, it was the general opinion of Boards of Guardians throughout the country and in the City of London, that powers ought to be given to them to recover the cost of medical relief granted on loan when the parties so relieved were in a position to repay the Guardians.

SIR ANDREW LUSK objected to the Amendment.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH hoped the hon. Member would not press so important an Amendment at that stage of the Bill. Giving medical relief on loan might be exceedingly useful; but the question ought to be fully discussed after Notice before it was agreed to by the House.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill to be read the third time To-morrow.

POOR LAW (SCOTLAND) (re-committed) BILL—[BILL 179.]

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Assheton Cross.)

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(The Lord Advocate.)

MR. BAXTER said, he had placed upon the Paper a Motion that the House should resolve itself into a Committee on the Bill on this day three months. He had done so for two reasons—first, he disapproved the second reading of a Bill of this magnitude and importance, in which the people of Scotland felt so deep an interest, being taken at 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning, contrary, he begged to state, to all the usages and practices of the House of Commons; secondly, he had from the first thought that this was a bad Bill, and one which it would be extremely difficult properly to amend in Committee; therefore he had, immediately after the Whitsuntide holidays, placed his Motion upon the Paper. He found that many hon. Gentlemen who objected to this Bill still rather thought that some amendment of the Poor Law in Scotland was necessary, and that this Bill could after all be rendered a good Bill by alterations in Committee. He wished to say, however, that this was not his opinion. His Parliamentary experience led him to suppose that if the House once went into Committee on the Bill, the Lord Advocate, backed by a powerful Party, and acting on the principle of dividing and conquering, would be able to pass the measure much in its present form. Therefore, he wished to give the House an opportunity of expressing an opinion on the principle of the Bill, by moving that the House should resolve itself into Committee on this day three months. What, he would ask, was the principle of this Bill? Whenever he found in a Bill a clause printed in italics, and proposing that money should be given out of Her Majesty's Treasury, his suspicions were aroused, and he began to think that something was about to be done which could not be done except with a bribe. This was a Bill to confer upon the Board of Supervision powers so arbitrary, so extravagant, and he might almost say so paramount as had never been conferred by the House of Commons on any such body before, the local authorities being called upon to part with nearly all their powers for a miserable mess of pottage in the shape of a paltry grant to medical officers and some payment for medicines for the poor. The House ought to pause before it gave such wonderful powers to a Board which was neither representative nor responsible, whose proceedings were conducted in private, and against whose decisions there was no appeal. He believed that practically this Bill would relieve the landowners of Scotland at the expense of the other members of the community. It was well known that the Board of Supervision was in favour of systems of classification which other classes of taxpayers, not interested in land, believed to be unjust to them. He sincerely trusted that Parliament would not delegate powers to an irresponsible Board against whose decisions there was no appeal. This was his main objection to the Bill, and on this ground he should vote against it, even if he entertained no other objections to it. He did not mean to go in detail into the various clauses of the Bill, but he had placed his Motion on the Paper in order to show his own opinion, and with the view of enabling Scotch Members who were interested in the subject to let the House have the benefit of their opinions; and no doubt they would refer to many points which he would not now dwell upon. He felt very strongly that if the House passed this Bill, which would deprive the local authorities in Scotland of nearly all their power, it would be found difficult to get men of position to act on the Parochial Boards; and this in itself would be a great public loss. Moreover, the Bill proposed virtually to disfranchise the owners of property below £20. Again, auditors were to be appointed by the Board of Supervision, and they were to be paid out of monies to be voted by Parliament. A gentleman who had been for more than 50 years acquainted with the working of the Scotch Poor Law, and who knew more about its working than any Member of that House, stated that applications had been pouring in from medical officers, accountants, and others asking for appointments under the Bill. The regulations under Section 38 would in most parishes in Scotland be wholly unworkable, and the expense of the auditing and book-keeping would be greater than the cost of the maintenance of the paupers. Such was the opinion of the gentleman to whose letter he had been referring. He should very much like to know what was the origin of this Bill. Was it a fact that it had been lying pigeon-holed at the Board of Supervision for a good many years? In his opinion, it was wholly uncalled for. A meeting of the representatives of Scotch parishes had been held in Edinburgh, and without a dissentient voice they had asked the Government to withdraw this Bill. There were no fewer than 13 pages of Amendments to it, and this was a thing almost unprecedented in the history of Scotch legislation. He was by no means saying that the Scotch Poor Law was perfect. In many respects, he admitted, it might be improved—as, for instance, in the direction indicated by the Amendment of which his hon. Friend the Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay) had given Notice—namely, by making the Board of Supervision more representative in its character. Something also might be done to diminish the great expense of the management in Scotland. The Bill of the Government did not, however, propose to make the Board of Supervision more representative, nor did it contain provisions which would diminish the cost of maintenance. He was not aware that any body of persons throughout Scotland had asked for the changes which this Bill would effect. On the contrary, it appeared to him that it was strongly opposed in all parts of the country, and by all classes of the community, and he did feel greatly disappointed that Her Majesty's Government, so far from having dropped it, had given it precedence over other Bills which had been received with favour in Scotland. He wished to take the opinions of Scotch Members on the present Bill, and with this view he begged to move that the House should resolve itself into Committee on that day three months.

MR. W. HOLMS, in seconding the Motion, said, that throughout Scotland a general interest was felt with regard to this Bill, and he had no hesitation in affirming that if it became law it would cause a great amount of dissatisfaction. It was looked upon not as a Bill to improve the administration of the Poor Law of Scotland, but as a Bill to confer greatly extended powers on the Board of Supervision. He would ask hon. Members to consider what this Board of Supervision was. It consisted of nine members, six being ex-officio, of whom two, the Lords Provost of Edinburgh and Glasgow, were gentlemen engaged in business, while at the same time they had to attend to the affairs of the great communities over which they presided, and, therefore, had little or no time to devote to the business of the Board.

The same remark applied, perhaps in a higher degree, to the Solicitor General of Scotland, and to the Sheriffs of the three great counties of Ross, Perth, and Ayr. The remaining three members were nominated by the Government. One was the paid chairman, and another, Sir William Gibson-Craig, held the position of Lord Clerk Register, the onerous duties of which office no doubt occupied much of his time. The consequence of the constitution of the Board was—as might be expected—that the attendance of the members was extremely irregular. From a Report which he held in his hand, he found that last year 23 committee meetings were held, and that at none of them more than two members were present. There had been 27 general meetings, and, except on three occasions,—however important the business—there was not more than a quorum. A Member of the House of Commons, who had had a seat at the Board of Supervision for three years, had publicly stated that the whole business of the Board was practically done by the Chairman and the paid secretary. Of the nine members forming the Board seven were lawyers. Their business was conducted with closed doors, and no publicity was given to their proceedings except through the annual Report sent to the Home Secretary. So far as the administration of the Poor Law in England was concerned, a Gentleman directly responsible for it had a seat in the House, but there was no such representative with regard to Scotland. Hitherto, the functions of the Board of Supervision had been to supervise the local boards throughout the country, and to protect the interests of the poor. For this purpose the Board had been armed with most ample powers. It had been empowered to examine, by its members or by deputy, into the management of every parish in Scotland. No additional buildings for the accommodation of the poor could be erected without its approval, and rules and regulations drawn up by a Parochial Board could not be enforced until they had been sanctioned by the Board of Supervision. From the year 1845 till now, the operations of the Board had been watched with very great jealousy. Notwithstanding the amount of work it had to perform, an enormous amount of additional work was thrown upon it by the

the Health Act of 1867, which placed it the practical supervision of the thing out of that Act throughout and. The consequence was that in the Board declared that its secretary so overworked that he could not give his time to the performance of a very important duty—namely, that of acting as arbiter in cases of disputed matters. It was now proposed to refer to this small, irresponsible, and overworked Board, a large amount of operative work which had hitherto been performed by the Parochial Boards. Under the Bill it would rest with the Board of Supervision to judge of the circumstances of a parish, and to decide whether additional poorhouse accommodation should be built or not. The Board of Supervision would alone have power to remove inspectors, governors of poorhouses, medical officers, even matrons. Now, he asked Members, would it not paralyse the efforts of local managers if they were not able to deal with those whom they might term under-servants, in the case of their disobeying orders? Now, it was proposed by this Bill to give to the Board of Supervision alone, the power to grant to any pauper out-door relief for a longer period than one month. The Bill also enacted that the Board should make rules and regulations for bringing out children. And descending to the minutest details, it further enacted that the Board alone should decide whether a pauper might be allowed to leave or return to a poorhouse. He believed that those provisions would prevent any independent man from getting a seat at a Parochial Board. But the Bill went further, for it provided that the Board of Supervision should appoint auditors to audit the accounts of Parochial Boards, which, he might say, were composed of gentlemen who were themselves ratepayers, or the representatives of ratepayers, and who were consequently deeply interested in the economical administration of the affairs of the parish. Moreover, the independence of the Parochial Boards was destroyed in the most open and public manner. But this was not all. There was a clause in the Bill of a most dangerous character. At present the Board of Supervision had power to make rules and regulations, which were of no avail unless they had received the sanction of the Home Secretary; but the 43rd clause of the present Bill gave the Board power to vary or cancel any rules and regulations which had been made, and there was not a word about obtaining the sanction of the Home Secretary to such variations or cancellations. The result would be that the Board might pass rules which would receive the sanction of the Secretary of State, but as soon as they were so sanctioned they might proceed to alter or cancel them as they chose. He did not believe that such powers had ever been given to any Board, and he wished to know why they were to be given to the Board of Supervision? He thought the Government ought to have made some statement about the Bill; but up to the present moment no information had been given. He therefore had looked over the last five annual Reports of the Board of Supervision, in order to find, if possible, what were the reasons which had induced the Government to bring forward this measure, and from those Reports he had come to the conclusion that it could not be alleged that the Bill was rendered necessary on account of the want of sufficient accommodation for the poor, for it appeared from the Reports of the Board of Supervision that the accommodation throughout Scotland was at present available for a population of 2,970,000, leaving only 390,000 unprovided for. In other words, accommodation was already provided for nine-tenths of the population. Again, it could not be said that pauperism was increasing in Scotland, for 10 years ago there were 128,000 paupers, whereas last year the number had been reduced to 105,000. Moreover, he found that while in Scotland, during the last 10 years, the amount of pauperism had been diminished by 18 per cent, it had been reduced during the same period in England by only 9 per cent. It could not be said that the burden of taxation had increased, for in 1865 it was 11½d. per pound of the valuation, whereas in 1875 it was only 9½d. It could not be alleged that officials had been injudiciously appointed, for last year, in 886 parishes, the total number of complaints against inspectors, governors of poor-houses, and medical officers, had only been 28. He ventured to think that in no other public department—probably, indeed, in scarcely any private business—had there been so few complaints in proportion to the number of employés. It could not be said that Parochial Boards had not done their duty to the poor, for during last year from 105,000 paupers there had only been 244 complaints of inadequate relief, and of these only 28 had been sustained. As to the question of boarding out children, regarding which it was proposed to give the central board full power, the Board of Supervision had themselves stated that not to them, but to the Parochial Boards was the merit due of having thought of the system of boarding out 25 years ago, which they had carried out with "kindness, judgment, and success." Why, then, make a change when the present system had worked so well? In very few instances, indeed, had the Board of Supervision complained of the management of the poor by Parochial Boards, and he could not find any complaint that in even a single instance suggestions made by the Board of Supervision had not been acted upon. It was, however, a remarkable fact that while last year the expenditure on the relief of the poor had been £25,000 less than it was seven years ago, the cost of management—over which the Board of Supervision had considerable control—had been increased £22,000, and it was worthy of remark that 14 per cent of the whole expenditure in Scotland was absorbed for mere management, while in England the proportion was only 12 per cent. He had examined the Report of the Select Committee of 1871, and while he was bound to admit that it contained many recommendations which had been adopted in this Bill, and some of which gave additional powers to the Board of Supervision, he thought that the general conclusion at which they arrived was contained in the following extract from the Report:—

"Suggestions have been made for giving larger powers to the Board of Supervision, and more especially for making it the final arbiter in all cases of settlement, with the view of saving expenses. Your Committee do not think any advantage is likely to arise from the adoption of such a proposal."

The Select Committee were therefore of opinion that no advantage would result from conferring additional powers upon the Board. ["No, no!"] The Parochial Boards did not wish for any change, nor was he aware that it was desired by the people of Scotland. A few weeks ago he had occasion to visit Scotland, and came in contact with men of different political views. He found that there was an indignant feeling at the proposed interference of the Board of Supervision in parochial matters, and a general opinion that men of position and ability would no longer accept seats at Parochial Boards, the duty of which would be simply to obey the Board of Supervision. The result would be that an inferior class of men would manage parochial affairs, and that ultimately even the details of management would devolve on the Board of Supervision, which would be obliged to frame hard-and-fast rules and regulations which might be quite unsuitable for certain localities, or they would have to cover the country with swarms of inspectors to give them information. He admitted that the experience of 30 years showed the necessity for some legislation on such questions as the constitution of Parochial Boards, combination of parishes, and area of chargeability, medical relief, and with regard to the constitution of the Board of Supervision itself; but why should they not have a Bill dealing with such questions introduced on the basis of the legislation of 1845, leaving the local boards to be the initiative and executive body, and the Board of Supervision, as the name implied, to supervise the operations of the local boards? It was for the Government to show, he contended, that in order to amend the Poor Law of Scotland it was necessary to make such a sweeping transfer of power as was now proposed, and also that they were not paying too much for such amendment by a system of centralization, which happily was better known to Continental than to British statesmen. He should be wanting in political courage, if he did not protest against what appeared to him to be a determination on the part of Her Majesty's Government to undermine our local institutions, which had done so much to make the people of this country a self-reliant and law-abiding people. Two years ago, hon. Gentlemen were invited to relieve the local taxpayers as regarded lunatics and police, by a subsidy of £1,250,000 per annum from the Treasury, but the price to be paid was centralization. Again, the other night they were invited by the Home Secretary to accept £390,000 per annum in relief of prison rates, but in this case also the price to be paid was centralization. And now they were asked to submit to a transference of the management of the poor from local boards to a central board sitting in Edinburgh. He would remind hon. Members that one of the greatest difficulties and dangers with which France had to contend in her struggle with Germany, was that during the siege of Paris every city and commune was paralyzed, because they had been accustomed under the French system of centralization to look to the Imperial Government for guidance and direction in the management of their local affairs. For the reasons which he had given, he felt it to be his duty to offer all the opposition in his power to a Bill which, if carried, he was sure would prove detrimental to the interests of Scotland, and would be a distinct advance towards bureaucratic as opposed to local administration.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee," — (Mr. Baxter,)—instead thereof.

MR. MARK STEWART said, that notwithstanding the speeches of the two hon. Gentlemen who had preceded him, he maintained that if some pains were taken to amend this Bill in particular directions in Committee, it would be acceptable to those Gentlemen themselves and to the people of Scotland. There was nothing easier in that House than to find fault with a Government measure, especially a measure dealing with a subject with which so many in that House were conversant. He considered that a strong case was made out for considerable change in the Poor Law system of Scotland. He did not think the Board of Supervision was by any means so bad as it was said to be by the hon. Member for Paisley (Mr. W. Holms). True, in the Return that the hon. Gentleman moved for he found it consisted of nine persons, and, humanly speaking, it was impossible that all these nine persons could attend, seeing that they lived in different parts of the country. In fact, from 1866 to 1876 these members only once attended altogether, and he found that in some years only four were present at several meetings. It was thus impossible for the members of the Board to be all intimately acquainted with what was going on in the deliberations of that body. But he could see no reason why the Board of Supervision could not be made more constitutional and more fairly represented in Parliament than it was. In England they had a representative of a Local Government Board in the House of Commons, and they knew perfectly well in Scotland that it was almost impossible that a Lord Advocate, especially a Lord Advocate with a large practice, could give his whole attention to those more minute matters of administration. It was therefore the more important to Scotland to be represented in that House by some Minister giving his special attention to this and kindred questions. He hoped by any remarks he was making he was not throwing any slight upon the Scotch Representative of the Home Department, for all knew how anxious he was to push on business, and how ably he did so. But it was impossible the Home Secretary could cope with all the details of Scotch as well as English business at one and the same time. It was very easy to find fault with this Bill; but on consideration it would be seen it contained important principles which could not be thrown aside. There were clauses in which there was much that was good, and much that would be found practicable and useful in carrying out the Scotch Poor Law. The great principle of this Bill was its adoption of a more general system of uniformity. Supposing the Board of Supervision to be constituted in a somewhat different manner, and to exercise the supervising influence which it was originally intended that it should exercise, they would have a good system already at work under which the local boards would carry on the same system that had been carried on since 1845, but considerably strengthened by increased powers given to the Board of Supervision. There were other points in the Bill which would meet approbation. One of them had been the subject of agitation by Scotch deputations and

Scotch Representatives since this Parliament met. It was a great matter to find that Government had so thoroughly given in to the views of Scotch Members on the question of medical relief, and that they were willing to establish equality in this matter. Another question had been agitated by different deputations coming from Scotland—namely, the superannuation of Poor Law Officers. It always appeared to him a great hardship that under the present Poor Law Act no Parochial Board could make provision for those often most deserving men who had given up the best part of their life's services in the administration in which they were placed. Then, again, there was a valuable provision in this Bill compelling the mother of an illegitimate child to go to the workhouse instead of receiving alimentary aid from the parish. There was a most important clause with respect to boarding out; and another that children should support their parents. There were other clauses stating that no out-door relief should be given in certain circumstances, and that the paupers, and especially the Irish paupers, might appeal against removal. It must not be forgotten that the Government had based this Bill, perhaps too much, on the Reports of that Committee which, he was informed, took two years to its deliberations on this Poor Law question. Almost every proposal in the Bill was founded on that Report. He would only ask hon. Gentlemen to look to the names in that Report. No doubt the House would hear that many hon. Members who served on that Committee had seen after experience that it was wrong in its conclusions. It was strange that these views which they entertained in 1871, were now, when they were on the other side of the House, disapproved of by the same Members. He should be as willing as any Member to assist in Committee in making this Bill a thoroughly satisfactory Bill, not only acceptable to the House but to the people of Scotland, because he was perfectly aware of the utter futility of passing measures through the House which had not the general sanction and approval of those outside the House. It was possible for his side of the House, being the stronger Party, to carry forward this measure; but unless it was amended—and he had Amendments to more than one clause himself—he would not pledge himself to vote for the third reading, and he should be quite prepared to vote against the measure unless he considered it generally acceptable to the country.

Mr. TREVELYAN said, his hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) began his speech by saying it was very seldom that a Bill as important in principle did not receive full discussion on the second reading; and he would go further, and say that he had never known a Bill which proposed to make such sweeping advances in such a novel and questionable direction, which had been laid before the House, and kept before it till it reached this stage, with such a scanty and miserly exposition of the principles on which it was based. The truth was, the Bill had been introduced to the House as lightly as if it were a Highway Bill concerning a single county, with the consent of all parties concerned, and not a measure for abolishing self-government in one of its most important departments, and that not in a single county or isolated town not fit to conduct its own affairs, but in the most self-governing portion of the European nation. Very different reasons must be given before they could consent, on behalf of those who sent them there to represent them, to make such a sweeping and radical change in the nature of the local bodies of Scotland, and in taking from those local bodies, when they had been so manipulated, all that was essential, all that was weighty, all that was dignified in their functions, in order to entrust those functions to a Board whose proceedings were secret, whose authority was autocratic, and whose constitution, as his hon. Friend next him (Mr. Holms) had shown, was anomalous to the very verge of absurdity. When this Bill was first brought forward there was a universal feeling of uneasiness in Scotland. That feeling showed itself in Petitions, circulars, and memorials, and culminated in a grand deputation to the Lord Advocate. The right hon. and learned Gentleman received that deputation with that courtesy which he always extended to every one who approached him from any public or private motive; but he (Mr. Trevelyan) must allow in this case the courtesy was rather an injury than a benefit to those to whom it was extended, for the result was that it sent them back to their northern homes with the opinion that the right hon. Gentleman who was so kind in his manner could not be so cruel in fact, and with the idea that all the objectionable features of the Bill would be expunged in the second edition. But when the second edition appeared it was evident that the Bill, to all intents and purposes, was precisely the same, and it was astonishing to him that any one who knew the Scotch people—that remarkable people who read Parliamentary Bills with the same eagerness as people of other countries read sensational novels—could have imagined for a moment that changes so slight and so insignificant would have satisfied so general a demand for the withdrawal of the Bill. He would not refer to the conference in Edinburgh except to say that that conference, which was held after this amended Bill was presented to the House, showed the disappointment of the country at the second edition of the Bill to be at least as great as its disapprobation of the first. Of the Parochial Boards which attended that conference or sent down opinions to it, 10 would not offer a distinct opinion; one was in favour of the Bill as a whole, and three were in favour of it in part; while 52 were opposed to it root and branch. He believed he could put new facts before the House which would leave it under the same impression as regarded this Bill as that of the Parochial Boards of Scotland. In the first place, the Bill contained provisions for re-distributing local burdens in property—provisions which would be an immense boon to one class and an immense infliction on another. The President of the English Poor Law Board had introduced a Valuation Bill into the House, and in the third schedule of that Bill he had laid down the very important principle that deductions should be made from the gross rental of certain classes of property. Now, broadly stated, this principle went to assert that there were certain classes of property which were so expensive to keep up that it was only just, in rating that property, to make an abatement. In this schedule to the Valuation Bill, which was actually a Government measure now before the House, 25 per cent was to be deducted from the value of houses, and more than

33 per cent from the value of manufactories. This principle was contained in the Poor Law Act of 1845. The 37th section distinctly sanctioned such a deduction, and in consequence of that 37th clause, a large number of towns in Scotland had carried out that principle, and had made large deductions from the valuation of mills, factories, and houses. And then there came the Lord Advocate with a Bill of 19 clauses, by which the 37th section of the Act of 1845 was abolished, and by which all rental was henceforward to be the gross rental—that was to say, the responsible Minister for the Poor Law Department came down to the House, with the concurrence of the Cabinet, and proposed to give the Government sanction to a principle which had had the sanction of the practice of the country for a great many years; and in the same Session and in the same month a Member of the same Government, with an inconsistency such as he had never seen in that House before, called upon Members to declare against the principle in favour of which his Colleague had emphatically pronounced. He was glad to see a Cabinet Minister present (Mr. Cross). He hoped the Government would turn their attention to this Bill, and would not allow a Bill to be introduced which forbade the voluntary adoption of a principle North of the Tweed which they were themselves making universal and compulsory South of it. The suffering which was going to be inflicted on owners of house property was not confined to these cases. There was a more serious matter behind. By Clauses 17 and 18 the Board of Supervision might not only recommend, but might actually impose upon parishes its own notion of the classification of tenants for which rates ought to be levied. Now, what the notion of the Board of Supervision with regard to the classification of tenants was, Scotch people knew only too well. They issued a circular in 1868, the principles enunciated in which had been carried out in a large number of parishes. According to this, the tenant of land was to pay only a fourth or a fifth of what the owner had to pay; and henceforward, if this Bill was passed, no doubt that would be the classification which would be adopted all over Scotland. The result would be that house property, after this Bill had become law, would in some places be charged 56 per cent more than it was charged now, while land would be relieved to the extent of nearly 70 per cent. This was an enormous change. It meant in the case of houses almost confiscation, and in the case of land it went a long way towards exemption; and he thought that hon. Gentlemen who had been accustomed to know how matters were carried on in this country would agree that a change of this gravity should only be carried through by two methods. One was that it should be imposed by the Imperial Parliament, in which every ratepayer in the towns, at any rate, had a voice through his Representative; the other, that it should be imposed by local boards, in which every ratepayer sat in person or by proxy. There was one course remaining by which they might make this great fiscal change, and that was one to which this country was not very partial. It might be imposed by the bureaucratic will of a central board. This was the course which the right hon. Gentleman had chosen to adopt. But the interference of the Government was carried on in much more serious matters than local taxation. The Board of Supervision was, according to this Bill, to have a paramount influence in arranging the election of these Parochial Boards, which were the head and front of our local government. The great body of the owners, the people who at present were the rank and file and the strength of the Parochial Boards, were no longer to sit on the boards, but were to elect so many of their number as from time to time might be fixed by the Board of Supervision. This was disfranchisement of the most wholesale description, and disfranchisement, let him say, of an exceedingly humiliating and invidious description. To be deprived of one's franchise by the will of Parliament or by the election of a Judge was a very serious matter; but it was a very much more serious matter to have one's privilege and franchise dependent upon the will of an invisible salaried official—an official who was appointed, not by the voice of the people, but by the Central Government, and it was a still more serious thing that such an extraordinary invasion of the rights of Britons should be introduced by a right hon. Gentleman who was a Member of the Government which extended household suffrage to the dwellers in towns. It was a matter of very great regret that the influence of the householders and the owners of house property should be diminished on these boards at a time when they were going to pay such a very much larger share of the local rates, and the holders of land should have so much greater influence when they were going to pay so much less to the parish. We had here a Bill which would add to the value of land 5 or 10 per cent in certain parishes. The same Bill which gave this great addition to the value of land gave a seat to every landowner of any importance, and immensely diminished the influence on those boards of those people who were to pay a so much larger part of the local burdens. He believed that this Bill had been truthfully described as a piece of unmitigated class legislation. It would be rejected by all burgh Members, whose constituents it injured, and he firmly believed it would be repudiated by a good many county Members, whose interests it so unduly and inequitably favoured. Clause 40 took out of the hands of the Parochial Boards the power of appointing certain officials. These were henceforward not to be trusted servants of their true masters, the people who paid them their salaries; they were to be instruments of a central board, which would be able to exercise its influence throughout the length and breadth of Scotland by means of officials who were dependent on it for their bread. By this clause would be destroyed that confidence which ought to exist between employer and employed, and the officials of the Poor Law would be more and more placed under the most grievous temptation to thwart their employers of the Parochial Board at every turn, because some one who lived in Edinburgh had theories upon Poor Law questions which he had determined to force down the throats of the local bodies. Then came another set of clauses—36 to 38—which gave the appointment of auditors to the Board of Supervision, and the Bill allowed the Board to lay down the rules under which the audit was to be conducted. By means of those auditors the Board of Supervision would acquire over the local boards themselves very much the same sort of hold as that which another clause gave them over the officers of the local boards. They had heard a great deal about the members of local boards being obliged from time to time to have interviews with Ministers and Members of Parliament. That was a grievance which he allowed the Bill would at once remove. He should like to see the face of a Government auditor called upon to audit the expenses of a deputation sent to London to protest against the policy of the board upon which he was dependent for his official existence. By Clause 15 the Parochial Board could not even make a request for a pauper without the risk of its being disallowed. By Clause 16, a Parochial Board really lost the power of transferring the paupers from parish to parish on its judgment. The utmost it was allowed to do was that while awaiting the fiat of the Board of Supervision, it could allow "such person such interim allowance as might be required." Then came the great question of out-door and in-door relief, and connected with that subject was the other great question of boarding out pauper children. That was a question too high for the limited intellect of Scotland, and it must be left to the Board of Supervision to discuss. A few collectors to get in the rates, and a few clerks to arrange the accounts, would be far better instruments for the Board of Supervision than those parochial bodies which were to be so elaborately elected. He would venture to say that no man with self-respect, no man who thoroughly understood the interests of his locality, and keenly sympathized with its feelings, would consent to sit on a board at which his opinions on any local matter, however important, would simply go for nothing, unless those opinions happened to coincide with the stereotyped notions of a board sitting 150 miles off. How was the Board of Supervision constituted? It was constituted by a paid chairman and a paid secretary, the Provosts of Edinburgh and Glasgow, the Solicitor General of the Government for the time being, three Sheriffs of counties, who got £100 a-year, and one or two gentlemen who had obtained such very great celebrity in other departments of life that he thought he might fairly describe them as ornamental members. That was the Board of Supervision. It was a Board which was to eat up all the local boards as Pharaoh's rod ate up all the other rods—a board which had no merit of constitution except its omnivorous powers of digestion. He would just ask English Members what they would think if the President of the Local Government Board was to come down to the House and propose to give over the assessment, the levying, the disbursement, the auditing of all local rates, and the entire management of the Poor Law system to a board composed of one of the Law Officers of the Government, the Lord Mayors of London and York, Sir Henry Maine, Mr. Milner Gibson, and the County Court Judges of Kent, Cheshire, and Cambridgeshire? He might fairly ask the English hon. Members to put themselves in the place of the Scotch Members, and to remember that all that was done in order to increase the power of a body for whose farcical constitution they were called upon to immolate the self-government of Scotland, and to sacrifice much that was best in the spirit of the Scotch institutions and the character of the Scotch people.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY could answer the question that had been put as to the origin of the Bill. Who was it that first proposed a Committee of Investigation into the management of Poor Law in Scotland? Why, an hon. Member who sat opposite—the then Member for the Ayr Burghs (Mr. E. Craufurd). He took great interest in the matter, and he was very much dissatisfied with the Scotch Law. The consequence was that he persuaded the House to grant him a Committee of Inquiry into the whole management of the Scotch Poor Law, and the hon. Member obtained the Committee. Before it was collected an immense amount of valuable evidence in reference to the management of the Scotch Poor Law. He supposed some Members had never read the evidence of that Committee; but if they would only do so, they would find that there was not a single clause in the Bill which had not the recommendation of that Select Committee to support it. In fact, he was satisfied that there was hardly a single thing in the Bill which had not been recommended by the Select Committee of 1871. He said that after having examined the recommendations of the Committee, and after having gone over the clauses seriatim. Had not the people of Scotland long been clamouring for a fair share of grant for medical relief? Did not the Bill propose to give what they had been asking for, and was not that one point to recommend the Bill to the favourable consideration of the House? Every Parochial Board in Scotland for the future would have the means of using a test. A good deal had been said about the constitution of the Board of Supervision. He did not pretend to say that the constitution of the Board was as perfect as it might be; but it was not the first time that the constitution of the Board had been found fault with in the House. It was a common custom, particularly on the opposite side of the House, to find fault not only with the Board of Supervision, but with all the Boards in Scotland. So much at one time was said on the subject that at last the Treasury resolved to get at the bottom of the dislike to them, and they appointed the Commission which was so ably presided over by the Earl of Camperdown. That Commission went to Scotland and made inquiries. They investigated, for instance, the conduct of the Board of Supervision, and if any hon. Member would read the Report of the Commission on the point of the management of the Board of Supervision, he would find that their management was highly commended. It was said the Bill was going to give powers to the Board which they ought not to have. He was not aware exactly what the powers of the Local Government Board in England were; but he had been told that there was no power given to the Board in Scotland which the Local Government Board did not possess at that moment. If that were so, he could not see why hon. Members should declaim so much against the powers proposed to be given. The hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) took exception to the 32nd and 45th clauses, and he blamed the Government for allowing the system of valuation to be altered. The question of a difference in the systems of England and Scotland was nothing new. Why, he had heard of it in the House for the last 15 years. They knew that in England the valuation was not a gross valuation; there were reductions made. But the system in Scotland was different for every rate except the poor rate, which was assessed on the gross. His hon. Friend had found fault with classification; but if they were to have a gross valuation it was quite fair there should be a classification. The Board of Supervision had hitherto regulated the classification of parishes in Scotland, and he had never heard any one complain of their proceedings in that matter. As to himself, he was not afraid to entrust them with that important power, and he felt quite sure that they would so arrange the different classes of property as to make the rate much fairer than it was at that moment. The Bill, in his opinion, would improve the Poor Law administration in Scotland to a great degree. He, for one, had no jealousy of the Board of Supervision. He believed no Board was better managed, and it would be safe for the House to entrust it with the powers contained in the Bill.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, he did not wish to re-traverse the ground that had been traversed by his right hon. Friend near him (Mr. Baxter), and others who had ably supported him on that side of the House. At the same time he did not wish to give a quite silent vote, for he really did not remember any Bill for a long time past that had called for such strong disapprobation in the district of burghs which he had the honour to represent. When he first looked at it he hoped that it might go through the usual routine of Scotch Bills—that was, that they should correspond with their constituents, discuss it in the Lobby, communicate privately with the Lord Advocate, possibly have a meeting of Scotch Members, and so gradually arrive at some sort of modus vivendi, so to speak, with those who introduced it. When, however, he had corresponded with his constituents, and had looked further into the Bill, he saw all hope of an agreement vanish away. Unless the right hon. Gentleman opposite would consent to strike out those clauses which gave so great an increase of power to the Board of Supervision at the expense of the Parochial Boards, and unless he would consent to strike out the provisions which conferred advantages on land at the expense of house property, it was idle to imagine that they could come to any understanding with him. He (Mr. Grant Duff) was sure that was the general feeling of the Members for Scotland who sat on that side. Well, if that was so, what was the position? They were not in Committee, yet this was the 27th of June. There were 19 pages of the Bill, and 13 pages of Amendments. What chance was there of the Bill becoming law that Session? Would not the right hon. Gentleman consult his own interest and the interest of the Government if he withdrew the Bill, with the intention of bringing in another, next Session, embodying what good clauses there were in this, and adding others to carry into effect necessary reforms? Would he not thereby give some Scotch Bills, about which they might agree, a better chance of being pushed forward? He made that suggestion in the interest of Public Business generally, though of Scotch Business in particular, and he trusted it might meet with some favour at the hands of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. ORR EWING said, that until he saw the Amendment for the rejection of the Bill on the Paper, he was not aware that there existed in any part of Scotland any objection to the principle of the Bill. There had not been any Petition from any part of Scotland against it, and he understood that a feeling the reverse of that existed. There was no talent so commanding as that which could make the worse appear the better cause; but he hoped the eloquence of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) would not have such influence in the House as to lead it to the conclusion which he desired hon. Members should arrive at. A greater misrepresentation of the objects of the Bill than that contained in the hon. Member's speech was never laid before the attention of the House. Had he been a Member of the Committee which had sat for three years on the Bill, or had he been a Scotchman conversant with the management of parochial matters, he never would have made such statements as those which he had indulged in. He (Mr. Orr Ewing) could hardly believe his understanding while he listened to him. The hon. Member had spoken of class legislation, and of the doing away with the liberties of self-government. Where was the class legislation? He said taxation on land would be reduced 70 per cent, and the taxation of houses raised 60 per cent. He (Mr. Orr Ewing) was interested both in land and houses; but he was far more interested in houses than in land, and if there was one atom of truth in the statement he would be an opponent of the Bill not only on his own account, but on behalf of others. The statement had been repeated by another hon. Member opposite who had not the same apology as the hon. Member for the Border Burghs, for he was familiar with Scotch business. He only hoped when they got into Committee on the Bill that both hon. Members would be able to substantiate their statements, and if they did so, he, for one, would give them his support. The only reason brought forward by the right hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) against the Bill was that there was no chance of taxation being lessened by it. He had also said that the Bill ought to be laid aside, and that the Roads Bill should be passed in its place. That reminded him of their Irish Friends, who the other night would not allow the Judicature Bill to pass, because they wished for some promise in regard to another Bill. But Scotchmen had so far received credit for the way in which they had conducted their business in the House, and he hoped they would continue to deserve that credit. Was the right hon. Member for Montrose familiar with the Report of the Committee? Why, every clause in this Bill for the alteration of the present Poor Law had been recommended by the Committee. He objected to the 37th clause—that had been recommended, and he hoped it would be carried. Nothing was more difficult to make than the reductions from the gross valuation; but it could be thoroughly insured by the classification which was embraced in the Bill. He hoped both Englishmen and Irishmen would see the advantage of the system, and that they would rather imitate Scotland in that respect than that she should follow them. A great deal had been said about the Board of Supervision, and the hon. Member for Paisley (Mr. W. Holms) had declared that it was composed of a body of men who had no time to attend to the duties of the Board, and that the members who met were very small in numbers. But in reply to that, he would say that he was not aware that a small committee was a bad way of getting through business. Although the legal gentlemen might not always attend the committee meetings, all the papers, whenever a legal point was raised, were sent to their houses, and there was the advantage of their opinion being given on every legal case. The Select Committee appointed to investigate the affairs of the Boards in Scotland was proposed by the then hon. Member for the Ayr creased powers of the Board of Supervision, the fact was that the Select Committee made no recommendation on the subject. The truth was that the whole question turned on this—whether the House was prepared or not to adopt any additional regulations with regard to out-door relief, and to introduce any changes to remedy the admitted defects of the system as it now existed. For his own part, he believed that the result of the proposals of the Government would be to secure more, instead of to bring about less, independence than there was under the present system. Everything depended on the extent to which the powers of supervision established by the Bill were under regulation; and whatever decision the House might arrive at, he trusted that neither the House nor the Government would err on the other side, and give too much power to the local bodies, for he held it to be a sound principle of local parochial management that these should be under a certain amount of control at all events. There must be some regulations as to administration, and he did not know any other or better way of securing the object in view than by an efficient system of inspection and audit. Holding these opinions, he thought that the Bill was well worth the consideration of the House, and trusted that the House would allow the measure to go into Committee.

(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

[BILL 82.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET) moved that the Bill be now read a second time, with the view of a Select Committee being appointed to consider it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN was sorry to say that he could not agree with the proposition. The Bill was one of the most important relating to Ireland that could be brought before the House. It proposed to revolutionize the whole system of County Courts, and that being the case it ought not to be read a second time in that way without a discussion. The Bill was introduced and read the first time on the 8th February, and had been put down for second reading about 50 times. Yet the discussion had not taken place to this day, and the Government therefore had no right to complain that he objected to it being referred to a Select Committee in this summary manner. To refer the Bill to a Select Committee in July was quite absurd. Most of the Irish Members would not be in the House in July, and it was very important that persons taking an interest in the question should serve on the Committee. He repeated that the Bill involved changes of the most important character. The House would, perhaps, be surprised to hear that the County Courts were now nearly 80 years old. They existed in Ireland before they existed in England. They were indebted to the Irish Parliament, which they were so much in the habit of abusing, for the first establishment of Civil Courts in Ireland, and they were now exercising a jurisdiction under an Act passed in 1796. They were the cheapest Courts in any part of the United Kingdom. They had given universal satisfaction to the people in Ireland, and he believed there were no Courts in Ireland in which people had such confidence as they had in the Civil Courts.

And it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Debate was adjourned till this day.

The House resumed its sitting at Nine of the clock.

CHINA.—RESOLUTION.

MR. RICHARD, in rising to move—

"That, having regard to the unsatisfactory nature of our relations with China, and to the desirability of placing those relations on a permanently satisfactory footing, this House is of opinion that the existing Treaty between the two Countries should be so revised as to promote the interests of legitimate Commerce, and to secure the just rights of the Chinese Government and people,"

said: Mr. Speaker, the question to which I have to call the attention of the House this evening, it will be admitted on all hands, is one of very grave importance. We have, by our own act, or by a series of acts, entered into relations with an Empire containing between 300,000,000 and 400,000,000 of souls, and forming probably not much less than a third of the whole human race. Assuredly, it is desirable that those relations should be friendly and pacific. That they are not so, that they have not been so, any time for the last 40 or 50 years, is unhappily too notorious. A few months ago we seemed to be on the eve of another war with China, which, if it had broken out, would have been the fourth war we have waged against the Chinese within one generation. Now, the question arises—Whose fault is it that our relations with that country are in so disturbed and unsatisfactory a condition? Well, a thorough-going and unscrupulous patriotism would say without hesitation, and with great emphasis—It is entirely the fault of the Chinese; they are an arrogant, insolent, treacherous race of barbarians, or semi-barbarians, who know not how to keep faith or observe Treaty engagements, and they have come into contact with us, an upright, honourable, law-abiding people, who are always faithful to our obligations, and who have shown the most wonderful forbearance towards them; while they are resisting, by running and chicanery, our efforts to introduce among them the germs of a higher and better civilization than their own. Unhappily, the voice of historical truth does not ratify this self-complacent judgment. On the contrary, my impression, after a somewhat careful study of the question for many years is, that there is no part of our history upon which an honest Englishman, who brings to the examination of the case an unprejudiced mind and an unsophisticated conscience, can look back with so little of complacency, or with more of mortification or shame, than that which records our doings in China. That is to say, if we are to be judged by the ordinary rules of international morality. But if we are chartered libertines, men above ordinances, as some of the sectaries in the time of the Commonwealth claimed to be; if we have a dispensation which absolves us from observing the obligations of the moral law in certain latitudes and towards certain races of men, that is of course a different matter, and we are left absolutely without any standard by which we can estimate our own conduct. And it really seems to me that some of our countrymen in the East seem disposed to push their pretensions even to that extent. I read in a recent number of The China Mail these words—

“We dispute that China has international rights similar to those preserved by ourselves and other Western nations. Justice to a semi-barbarian nation becomes injustice to our own people.”

But I hope the British Parliament will lend no countenance to such immoral doctrines as these. It seems to me, indeed, that one source of the errors into which we have fallen in China is just this—that we have virtually abandoned the initiative and the direction of our policy into the hands of a small commercial community, who have powerful connections at home, and who have interests real, or imaginary, of their own to subserve, which, in my opinion, are not always the interests of the nation. It is not necessary for me to disclaim any hostility to commerce. I honour commerce as, next to Christianity, the most powerful agent in the civilization of mankind, dispelling ignorance, effacing prejudice, multiplying ten-fold by diffusion the beneficent gifts with which Providence has endowed humanity, and bringing men of different nations and races into relations of mutual dependence for the promotion of their common happiness and well-being. But that must be commerce content to clothe itself in its own legitimate attributes, and to use means that are in harmony with its own character. Not the commerce that is always clamouring for gun-boats and broadsides; not the commerce that wants to force itself on unwilling populations at the mouth of the cannon and at the point of the bayonet; not the commerce which is always holding its loaded revolver at the head of its customers to force them to receive articles which they do not want, or which they reject with abhorrence as injurious to them. I deny that that is honourable and legitimate commerce. I have no doubt that there are among our countrymen in China and Burmah, and other Eastern countries, many who cherish friendly and generous feelings towards the people among whom they live and with whom they trade, and would willingly do, and are doing, what lies in their power to befriend them. But I am afraid that is not the case with the majority, if we may judge by the tone of the organs who are supposed to represent their sentiments. The fault I find with these classes of our countrymen is this—that they seem to be always looking out for occasions of offence, and when they rise, though they may be of a trivial character, they eagerly seize upon them and do everything in their power to present them in the most aggravated form, and make them the foundation for invoking the extremest measures—measures of vengeance, of aggression, of annexation. They seem always intent upon pushing this country into war with Oriental nations; wars in which they do not fight, and for which they do not pay. The way in which the thing is managed is this: When any difference arises between our officials and some Eastern Power—and differences will arise without any necessity of assuming that either side is purposely and perversely in the wrong—the most alarming telegrams are sent to this country about insult to the British Minister, or insult to the British flag, and the other customary phrases which rouse the British lion. And although later and more accurate intelligence may show that they were grossly exaggerated, if not altogether unfounded, they have in the meantime done their office in inflaming public opinion at home, and preparing a certain class of writers in our own Press, to raise the cry for vengeance and war. I can give some illustrations of the spirit of which I complain in connection with a late event in the East, which has attracted much attention in this country, I mean the expedition to Yunnan and the murder of Mr. Margary. As soon as intelligence of that deplorable event reached China, our countrymen there, in the absence of all authentic information, immediately rushed to the conclusion that it was owing to the treachery of the Burmese or Chinese Government, or a combination of both. Now there is abundant evidence to prove, especially that of Dr. Anderson, who was himself a member of the expedition, that there is no ground whatever for the accusation that either the Burmese Government or people were implicated in that matter.

On the contrary, Dr. Anderson shows that the embassy was treated with marked honour and hospitality.

"Nothing," he says, "was left undone to show that the king delighted to honour the members of the Mission. . . . A numerous guard was assembled, the Royal order being that the Mission was to be safely escorted to the Chinese frontier."

That guard performed their duty with the utmost vigilance and faithfulness, and at the hazard of their own lives protected the members of the expedition, when they were assailed.

"Nothing," says Dr. Anderson, "would have been easier than for the Burmese to have deserted their charge; but from first to last they displayed a zealous fidelity beyond all praise."

But while the Burmese Sovereign and people were acting thus, what were our countrymen in China saying? These are the words of The North China Herald for May 15th, 1875—

"The impression in India is strong that the King of Burmah was the chief instigator of the outrage If the Burmese King's complicity can be proved so much the better. His deposition and the advance of the British frontier to the borders of Yunnan would be a great political gain."

In another number of the same paper we read—

"If a share of the responsibility can be brought home to the King of Burmah, we fancy his tenure of power will become precarious. There can be no doubt that England would be conferring a boon on the people by incorporating Burmah Proper with the sea-board territory over which she already rules."

So again with regard to China, there is no proof whatever that the Chinese Government was guilty of any complicity in the murder of Mr. Margary. Yet that was quietly assumed and immediate hostilities demanded. The North China Herald of April 15th, 1875, says—

"Apart from the punishment of the crime, and beyond the necessity to re-establish our prestige on the frontier, arises the broad question of our position and policy in China, and the opportunity should be taken to re-assert both with a firm hand. It cannot be denied that the influence gained by the last war has been gradually slipping from us, the respect which our victories insured for us has been dying out, and the traditional influence of the Chinese mandarin is again obnoxiously evident. It is high time to remedy this, and the present opportunity is a favourable one to teach the Chinese a new lesson."

So that what these modest people proposed was, that on mere suspicion, we should take two wars upon our own hands in the East—one in Burmah, to end by the annexation of the whole country to our Indian territories, and the other with China, to teach the Chinese a lesson, and also to annex—for that was part of the programme—some further portion of that country, for our countrymen in all parts of the world have a perfect mania for annexation. When we went to war with Abyssinia, we were told that after the capture of Magdala we ought to have taken possession of the whole country. When we quarrelled with the Ashantees, on the West Coast of Africa, there were people who actually proposed that we should extend our possessions there. I believe, if a dozen of our countrymen could find their way to the moon, they would not have been there a twelve-month before they would send a memorial to the Colonial Office, asking it to annex the moon to the British Empire. Lest I should be thought to bear too hard upon our countrymen in the East in what I have said, let me fortify my own opinion by the authority of one whose name and character are held in honour by men of all parties in this House, and in the country, I mean Lord Elgin. It is well known that he was engaged in two special Missions to China. Three or four years ago, his Letters and Journals were published—a book of rare interest, especially as a revelation of the man. No one could read it without seeing that he was a man of noble, generous, humane character, and it is clear that the spirit displayed by our countrymen in the East was like a perpetual nightmare to him. Writing to his friends at home, he says—

“I have gone through a good deal since we parted. Certainly I have seen more to disgust me with my fellow-countrymen than I saw during the whole course of my previous life, since I have found them in the East, among populations too timid to resist and too ignorant to complain. I have an instinct in me which loves righteousness and hates iniquity, and all this keeps me in a perpetual boil.”

Elsewhere he says—

“I am sure that in our relations with these Chinese we have acted scandalously, and I would not have been a party to the measures of violence which have taken place, if I had not believed that I could work out of them some good for them.”

Again, speaking of Mr. Russell's book on the Indian Mutiny, and complimenting him highly on the courage with which he had exposed “the scandalous treatment” which the Natives received at our hands in India, he goes on—

“Can I do anything to prevent England from calling down on herself God's curse for brutalities committed on another feeble Oriental race? Or are all my exertions to result only in the extension of the area over which Englishmen are to exhibit how hollow and superficial are both their civilization and their Christianity? The tone of the two or three men connected with mercantile houses in China, whom I find on board, is all for blood and massacre on a great scale. I hope they will be disappointed; but it is not a cheering or hopeful prospect, look at it from what side one may.”

I have dwelt upon this point, not with a view of casting reproach upon our countrymen in Burmah and China, and other Eastern countries, but because it is, in my opinion, a point of great practical importance. I say we have abandoned the control of our Chinese policy into the hands of these merchants; but I hope the British Government, and Parliament, and people, will become alive to their own responsibility, and to the necessity of taking that policy into their own hands, to be directed by their own principles. I differ wide as the Poles asunder from the doctrine laid down by the hon. Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing) last year in the debate on the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Wigtown (Mr. Mark Stewart). He seemed to resent any one in this House presuming to discuss Eastern questions. He told us that India cannot be governed according to English ideas. Well, as I believe that, in the main, English ideas are ideas of justice, humanity and mercy, I want India and China, and Burmah also, so far as they are under our control, to be governed by English ideas. The same kind of language used to be held by the promoters of the Slave Trade and by the West India planters towards Clarkson, and Wilberforce, and Brougham, and Buxton, and Sturge. They were told that they did not understand the West Indies or the peculiar conditions of society that existed there, and that therefore they ought not to meddle. But the British Parliament did not listen to those reclamations, and insisted that the West Indies should be governed according to English ideas, and the consequence was that the Slave Trade and Slavery were

Canton. Well, that war was ended by the Treaty of Tientsin, one of the principal provisions of which was the forced legalization of the opium traffic. I say "forced" because there cannot be a doubt that the Chinese retained as strongly as ever their dislike of that trade. Mr. Reed, the American Minister, spoke in one of his letters published in our Blue Book, of "their fear even to talk on a subject which they thought had once involved them in war, and which might give them trouble again."

It is only just to Lord Elgin to say that he also personally felt great reluctance to press this matter upon them. He says—

"I could not reconcile it to my sense of right to urge the Imperial Government to abandon its traditional policy in this respect."

But he had his instructions from home, and his official and commercial entourage in China urged him to demand the legalization of the trade. That this was forced upon the Chinese, along with other concessions in the Treaty of Tientsin, there is ample evidence to prove. Here is an extract from Commissioner Kweilang to Lord Elgin in October, 1858, pleading for some forbearance as to carrying into execution certain of the Articles of the Treaty of Tientsin—

"When the Chinese Commissioner negotiated a Treaty with your Excellency at Tientsin, British vessels of war were lying in that port; there was a pressure of an armed force, a state of excitement and alarm, and the Treaty had to be signed at once without a moment's delay. Deliberation was out of the question, the Commissioners had no alternative but to accept the conditions forced upon them."—[Correspondence relative to Lord Elgin's Mission, pp. 408-9.]

This is abundantly confirmed by the acknowledgments of our own officials. Sir Rutherford Alcock says—

"To keep as clear as possible of all foreign Governments is a very natural desire on the part of those who have thrice, in a single generation, had objectionable Treaties imposed upon them at the point of the bayonet."

And so Lord Elgin, referring to the Treaty of Tientsin, says—

"The concessions obtained in the Treaty from the Chinese Government are not in themselves extravagant, but in the eyes of the Chinese Government they amount to a revolution. They have been extorted therefore from its fears."

Still more emphatic, if possible, is the language of Sir Thomas Wade, writing in 1868—

"Nothing that has been gained was received from the free will of the Chinese. The concessions made to us have been from first to last extorted 'against the conscience of the nation,' in defiance, that is to say, of the moral convictions of its educated men, not merely of the office-holders whom we call Mandarins, and who are numerically but a small proportion of the educated class, but of the millions who are saturated with a knowledge of the history and philosophy of their country."

The Treaty, therefore, legalizing the opium trade was extorted from the Chinese against the conscience of the nation; and their proposals in the course of the negotiations, to put some check upon it, at least by means of a high duty, were likewise rejected. Now, Sir, I must say this appears to me a humiliating spectacle to see all the resources of British diplomacy, and all the terrors of British power employed in the name of a Christian nation to force on a heathen nation an article which they were doing all in their power to keep out, because it spread among their people debauchery, demoralization, disease, and death. I cannot argue with those who pretend to maintain that the habitual use of opium as a stimulant is not injurious. The evidence on this point is so overwhelming that I must say I find it hard to believe in the sincerity of those who put forth that view. We have a perfect cloud of witnesses to prove that it is injurious to body, and mind, and morals; witnesses so numerous, and of such various classes and conditions, and many of them of such high character, that, if it should turn out their testimony was unfounded, it would prove the most extraordinary conspiracy ever formed to misrepresent the truth without any conceivable motive. We can adduce the testimony of such men—most of them high officials in India and China—as Sir Stamford Raffles, Sir George Staunton, Sir Charles Forbes, Sir John Davies, Captain Elliot, Colonel James Tod, Captain Shepherd, Chairman of the East India Company, Mr. Henry St. George Tucker, another Chairman of the East India Company, Mr. Montgomery Martin, Sir Arthur Cotton, Sir Thomas Wade, and many others. I will only cite a sentence or two from the last, our present Minister at Pekin; and I do so especially, because it meets one of the favourite pleas urged in defence or mitigation of this traffic. We are often told in this House and elsewhere, that though, no doubt, opium smoking is a great evil, it is not worse than the gin and whiskey drinking that prevails among ourselves. Well, it need not be worse, and yet be bad enough. But what a strange argument to be used by a Christian nation to say—"There is a habit among ourselves which, according to the concurrent testimony of Ministers of religion, magistrates, Judges, medical men, of all who are concerned in the administration of the law or who are caring for the health and morals of the people, is the most prolific source of disease, crime, and misery, and what we force on the Chinese is not much worse than that, and what right have they to complain?" But what does Sir Thomas Wade say on this very point?—

"It is to me vain to think otherwise of the use of the drug in China than as of a habit many times more pernicious, nationally speaking, than the gin and whiskey drinking we deplore at home. I know of no case of radical cure. It has ensured, in every case within my knowledge, the steady descent, moral and physical, of the smoker."

Then there is another kind of evidence of quite exceptional value on such a subject—that of a large number of medical gentlemen, who have been engaged professionally in China, some in hospitals, and some in private practice; and who have themselves witnessed and treated the ravages produced by opium smoking—such as Dr. Parker, Dr. Allen, Dr. Lockhart, Dr. Hobson, Dr. Dempster, Dr. Little, Dr. Bell, Dr. De la Porte, Mr. Jeffereys, Mr. Loch, and others. The last is Dr. Dudgeon, who has lived for 12 years at Peking as a medical practitioner, and has been appointed to the Chair of Anatomy and Physiology in the Peking College. He is now in this country; and his testimony is most explicit and emphatic, to the dreadful and disastrous effects of indulgence in opium. Then we have the Missionaries of all denominations, who, with one voice, declare that the effects of opium on the people is deplorable; and that our complicity in the traffic is the most formidable obstacle in their way in promulgating Christianity among the Chinese. I hold in my hand a Petition just sent to me by the Directors of one of the most respectable and powerful of our Missionary Societies—the London Missionary Society—in which this, and other points in reference to the opium question, are put with great force. Now another question arises—Are the Chinese sincere in their opposition to the trade in this article? We are frequently told in this House and elsewhere that all their edicts, and protests, and remonstrances on this point are sheer hypocrisy; but certainly there is no very obvious reason why we should suspect them of playing a part in their endeavours to prevent their people being poisoned by opium. Let me call the attention of the House to one very remarkable piece of evidence on this point. It is known that in the Treaty of Tientsin there was a provision which entitled either of the signatory parties to propose a revision of the Treaty at the end of every 10 years. Well, in 1868, an attempt was made by Sir Rutherford Alcock to procure a revision. Negotiations then took place between him and the Foreign Board, which he describes as, "in fact, the Imperial Government in its most influential shape." Among other things that came up for discussion was the opium question. On that subject a note was transmitted to Sir Rutherford Alcock from the Board by Prince Kung. It may be regarded, in fact, as a powerful and pathetic appeal from the Chinese to the conscience and kindly feeling of the British nation. As such I think it ought to be laid before the British Parliament, and I hope I shall be permitted, notwithstanding its considerable length, to read it to the House—

"From Tsungli Yamen to Sir Rutherford Alcock, July, 1869. The writers have, on several occasions, when conversing with His Excellency the British Minister, referred to the opium trade as being prejudicial to the general interests of commerce. The object of the Treaties between our respective countries was to secure perpetual peace; but if effective steps cannot be taken to remove an accumulating sense of injury from the minds of men, it is to be feared that no policy can obviate sources of future trouble.

"Day and night the writers are considering the question with a view to its solution, and the more they reflect upon it the greater does their anxiety become; and hereon they cannot avoid addressing His Excellency very earnestly on the subject.

"That opium is like a deadly poison, that it is most injurious to mankind, and a most serious provocative of ill-feeling, is, the writers think, perfectly well known to His Excellency, and it is therefore needless for them to enlarge further on these points. The Prince [the Prince of Kung is the President of the Board] and his Colleagues are quite aware that the opium trade has long been condemned by England as a nation, and that the right-minded merchant scorns to have to do with it. But the officials and people of this Empire, who cannot be so completely informed on the subject, all say that England trades in opium because she desires to work China's ruin, for (say they) if the friendly feelings of England are genuine, since it is open to her to produce and trade in everything else, would she still insist on spreading the poison of this hurtful thing through the Empire? There are those who say, Stop the trade by enforcing a vigorous prohibition against the use of the drug. China has the right to do so, doubtless, and might be able to effect it; but a strict enforcement of the prohibition would necessitate the taking of many lives. Now although the criminals' punishment would be of their own seeking, bystanders would not fail to say that it was the foreign merchants who seduced them to their ruin by bringing the drug, and it would be hard to prevent general and deep-seated indignation; such a course, indeed, would tend to arouse popular anger against the foreigner. There are others, again, who suggest the removal of the prohibitions against the growth of poppy. They argue that as there is no means of stopping the foreign (opium) trade there can be no harm, as a temporary measure, in withdrawing the prohibition on its growth. We should thus not only deprive the foreign merchant of the main source of his profits, but should increase our revenue to boot. The sovereign rights of China are indeed competent to this. Such a course would be practicable, and indeed the writers cannot say that as a last resource it will not come to this; but they are most unwilling that such prohibition should be removed, holding as they do that a right system of government should appreciate the beneficence of Heaven, and (seek to) remove any grievance which afflicts its people, while to allow them to go on to destruction, though an increase of revenue may result, will provoke the judgment of Heaven and the condemnation of men. Neither of the above plans, indeed, is satisfactory. If it be desired to remove the very root, and to stop the evil at its source, nothing will be effective but a prohibition to be enforced alike by both parties. Again, the Chinese merchant supplies your country with his goodly tea and silk, conferring thereby a benefit upon her, but the English merchant empisons China with pestilent opium. Such conduct is unrighteous. Who can justify it? What wonder if officials and people say that England is wilfully working out China's ruin, and has no real friendly feeling for her? The wealth and generosity of England is spoken of by all. She is anxious to prevent and anticipate all injury to her commercial interest. How is it, then, she can hesitate to remove an acknowledged evil? Indeed, it cannot be that England still holds to this evil business, earning the hatred of the officials and people of China, and making herself a reproach among the nations, because she would lose a little revenue were she to forfeit the cultivation of the poppy! The writers hope that His Excellency will memorialize his Government to give orders in India, and elsewhere, to substitute the cultivation of cereals or cotton. Were both nations to rigorously prohibit the growth of the poppy, both the traffic in and the consumption of opium might alike be put an end to. To do away with so great an evil would be a great virtue on England's part: she would strengthen friendly relations, and make herself illustrious. How delightful to have so great an act transmitted to after ages! This matter is injurious to commercial interests in no ordinary degree. If His Excellency the British Minister cannot, before it is too late, arrange a plan for a joint prohibition (of the traffic), then no matter with what devotedness the writers may plead, they may be unable to cause the people to put aside all ill-feeling and so strengthen friendly relations as to place them for ever beyond fear of disturbance. Day and night, therefore, the writers give to this matter most earnest thought, and overpowering is the distress which it occasions them. Having thus presumed to unbosom themselves, they would be honoured by His Excellency's reply."

I do not think I ever read a document in which the accents of sincerity are more apparent than they are in this. It is no wonder that Sir Rutherford Alcock, after receiving it, should have recorded his own opinion in the following strong language:—

"He had no doubt that the abhorrence expressed by the Government and people of China for opium, as destructive to the Chinese nation, was genuine and deep-seated, and that he was also quite convinced that the Chinese Government could, if it pleased, carry out its threat of developing cultivation to any extent. On the other hand, he believed that so strong was the popular feeling on the subject, that if Britain would give up the opium revenue and suppress the cultivation in India, the Chinese Government would have no difficulty in suppressing it in China, except in the province of Yunnan, where its authority is in abeyance."

But, before passing from this point—the proposed revision of the Treaty of Tientsin—I have to call attention to facts of great significance, especially as illustrating the statement I have already made, how our policy in China is virtually surrendered into the hands of the mercantile classes. Sir Rutherford Alcock, of all our officials in China, was the statesman who had the most intimate acquaintance with, and the longest experience of, Chinese affairs. With infinite pains, and after negotiations prolonged for many months, he concluded a supplementary Treaty, which was signed in October, 1869, by himself and the Chinese plenipotentiaries. In that Treaty he had procured concessions of the most important nature from the Chinese Government, which would confer very large advantages upon British commerce; but in return for these concessions he had yielded to the Chinese these three things—an increase in the export of silk duty amounting to 1 per cent ad valorem; an increase in the opium duty of 2½ per cent ad valorem; and the right to appoint Consuls at the British ports. The Treaty, of course, required ratification at home. It was entirely approved by the Government at home, first by Lord Clarendon and then by Lord Granville; but it was violently opposed by the China merchants and their backers in the Chambers of Commerce. And why? Mainly because of the small additional increase on the opium duty, which would have raised it to about 7 per cent altogether. Now, when we consider that we impose a duty on Chinese tea of 25 to 30 per cent, it does not seem a very unreasonable demand that we should allow the Chinese to put a duty of 7 per cent on opium; and yet the Government, acting against their own judgment, and discrediting their own most experienced representative in China, yielded to the clamour of those interested parties, and advised Her Majesty not to ratify the Convention. I now come to the unfortunate expedition to Yunnan, and the murder of Mr. Margary. No one deplores more than I do the death of Mr. Margary. He appears to have been a young man of rare promise—intelligent, enterprising, courageous, and likely to prove a great ornament to the Service to which he belonged. The one salient point, however, known to the people of this country in regard to that expedition was, that a gallant and high-spirited young Englishman had perished by unfair means in Burmah or China, or in the borderland between the two, and the cry was raised, “Let us have vengeance.” If it be asked, “Against whom?” the answer seems to be—“Against anybody; against the Burmese, or Chinese, or somebody; English blood has been shed, and we must be avenged.” I think, however, I can show that this accursed thing, opium, had something to do with this ill-fated expedition to Yunnan. I believe there is little doubt that one of the objects had in view in forcing open this trade route was to inundate the wealthy provinces of China in that direction with Bengal opium. How do I prove this? Why thus. In 1862, Colonel Phayre, who was then Chief Commissioner of British Burmah, was instructed by Lord Elgin and his Council to procure a Commercial Treaty with the King of Burmah for re-opening “the caravan route from Asia, vid Bamo, to the Chinese province of Yunnan.” In a letter from the Indian Council to Sir Charles Wood (now Viscount Halifax), who was then Secretary of State for India, among the articles which Colonel Phayre was specially instructed to press on the Burmese Government for insertion in the Treaty, this was one—

“Opium to be allowed to pass from the British territories through Burmah into Yunnan, either duty free or on payment of a moderate transit duty.”

Now, let it be observed that opium was the only article of merchandise specified by name in the instructions of the Indian Government, which sufficiently showed their anxiety at least to have it introduced through Burmah into China. Well, Colonel Phayre did his best to fulfil his instructions; but there arose difficulties, and most curious and significant are the words he uses on this subject in his despatch to the Indian Government—

“There is one subject which still requires to be mentioned. It is as regards opium. I had proposed that a separate Article should provide for its being conveyed through the country, either Burmese or British, for sale in countries beyond. The King has an objection on religious grounds to allow his subjects to consume opium, and was averse to admitting, by a special Article, that the drug might be conveyed through his country, but said he would not object to its coming in, like other goods, under Article IV.”

It is surely a humiliating contrast to find that while this heathen Monarch had an objection on religious grounds to allow his subjects to consume opium, and did not like even to have it carried through his country, the representatives of a Christian nation, so far from having any religious scruples, were actually trying to seduce the King of Burmah into complicity with their design of thrusting opium through, still another avenue, upon China. But there was a previous expedition to Yunnan, and it is necessary to know something of that as tending, perhaps, to throw some light on the failure of the second expedition. Seven years before, Major Sladen had taken the same route, and with the same object.

At that time Yunnan was in possession of the Mohammedan or Panthay rebels, who were in arms against the Chinese Government. Talifao, where it was proposed to establish our Consul, was their capital. In the Treaty of Tientsin, there were clauses which forbade our even approaching places held by rebels. But what will the House say when I inform them that Major Sladen, acting under the orders of the Indian Government, formed intimate relations with the Panthay rebels; that the Indian Government through him recognized the rebel chief, entered into friendly negotiations and commercial arrangements with him, and kept up the intercourse until the suppression of the rebellion by the Chinese Government four years later? Li-sieh-tai, who has been accused of complicity in Mr. Margary's murder, was then an officer in the Chinese Army. But Major Sladen actually instigated the rebel chief of Manwein to attack Li-sieh-tai in his stronghold at Manphos, from which he barely escaped with life and the loss of 300 men. We are always talking of the treachery of the Chinese; but what shall we say to this monstrous story of an officer representing the British Government entering into close alliance with rebels against the Chinese authority, at the very time when we were professedly not only at peace, but in friendly relations with the Chinese Government? I cannot enter fully upon the history of this last unwise and ill-fated expedition to Yunnan. It seems to me, after reading the Papers, to have been a perfect muddle throughout. What with the interchange of cross telegrams and despatches between the Chief Commissioner of British Burmah, our Ambassador at Peking, the Indian Council, the India Office at home, and the Foreign Office, it is impossible to find out where the responsibility rests. Lord Northbrook and the Indian Council—after the catastrophe had happened, indeed—declare that—

“The Government of India have never been disposed to entertain sanguine expectations of the advantages to be derived from the schemes which from time to time have been proposed for the exploration of the routes from Burmah to the Western Provinces of China,”

“was undertaken in furtherance of the wishes of Her Majesty's Government.”

Mr. Richard

On the other hand, Lord Derby says the expedition was suggested by the Indian Government, and with his usual perspicacity and sound judgment points out in reference to one part of the project, of establishing a Consul at Talifao, that—

“Her Majesty's Government cannot claim a right to appoint Consuls at any places in China except the Treaty ports, and that there are grave difficulties in the way of any project for establishing British communities in the far interior of China, where British protection could not be extended to them in case of danger, which in the present state of the Chinese Empire is constantly threatening foreigners, and which the Government of Peking, even if well-disposed to do, can only imperfectly guard against.”

For myself, I believe we have been on the wrong tack in our conduct towards China from the beginning. We have tried a high-handed and masterful policy for many years, and with what results? Always with ill results, in every possible respect. At every succeeding war it was loudly proclaimed that it would open up all China to British trade, but events have shown this to be a delusion. Our export trade with China had always been, and was now, in an utterly unsatisfactory condition. The late Mr. Cobden used to say that he had not the smallest doubt that if we were to compute the profits that we have received from our export trade to China for the last 40 years, and set against it all that it has cost us in wars occasioned by that trade, and in the Naval and Military and Consular Services thought necessary to protect and promote it, that the nation could be shown to be largely a loser by the transaction. But this is to be observed, that the profit goes into the pockets of a small body of China merchants, and the cost comes out of the pockets of the British people, though, as if by the operation of some strange Nemesis, even the former have of late years fared miserably ill. My contention is, that we have tried to extend our commerce in China by means that cannot be justified, and that we have failed utterly and ignominiously in attaining our object. I believe there is far more to hope as respects our commercial interests from another policy, a policy of conciliation and peace, instead of that of dictation and meddling. This is the opinion of Sir Rutherford Alcock. He says—

"If only means can be found of keeping from them all foreign meddling and attempts at dictation, there is yet ground of hope. But these rouse strong instincts of resistance and national pride, giving fresh force to the retrograde and anti-foreign party; while at the same time it paralyzes all hopeful effort in those more favourable to progress from the fear of its being made a new pretext for action on the part of foreign Powers. No nations like the interference of a foreign Power in its internal affairs, however well-intentioned it may be, and China is no exception to the rule. I am thoroughly convinced they would go much better and faster if left alone."

"The Chinese will have nothing to do with foreigners as the protégés of their respective Governments; and they are right. To keep as clear as possible of all foreign Governments is a very natural desire on the part of those who have, thrice in a single generation, had objectionable Treaties imposed upon them at the point of the bayonet. . . . Railways, telegraphs, steam machinery, scientific directions for the working of mines, the acquisition of foreign languages—all these may, within a very few years, be in full play throughout the country; . . . 'but on one condition—that they are left alone,' free alike from dictation or control as to the selection of their agents, and the time and condition of their employment, and that they are free from all restraint or galling interference on the part of foreign Governments or their agents, diplomatic or Consular. Hitherto a different condition has undoubtedly existed."

Sir, the time is coming for another revision of the Treaty of Tientsin. I wish that we should take advantage of the opportunity that will be thus afforded to review our entire Chinese policy in a large and generous spirit. I hope especially we shall have the courage to confront the great evil of the opium trade, which, in my opinion, more than any other cause—more than all causes put together—is the source of that chronic difficulty with which we have to contend in our intercourse with the people and Government of China, which, moreover, renders it almost impossible for our Missionaries to make any progress in the spread of Christianity, and which is dishonouring the British name before the face of all the nations of the world. I do not know how other hon. Members may feel; but I own I am oppressed with a sense of the accumulating responsibility we are incurring by the course we are pursuing in China. I am not ashamed to say that I am one of those who believe that there is a God who ruleth in the kingdom of men, and that it is not safe for a community, any more than an individual, recklessly and habitually to affront those great principles of truth, and justice, and humanity on which I believe He governs the world. And we may be quite sure of this—that in spite of our pride of place and power, in spite of our vast possessions and enormous resources, in spite of our boasted forces by land and sea, if we come into conflict with "that" Power we shall be crushed like an eggshell against the granite rock. It is because I do not wish to see my country enter into that terrible and unequal conflict, that I entreat the House to re-consider our Chinese policy, and to accept my Motion, calling upon the Government, when the Treaty of Tientsin comes to be revised, to approach the task in a just and generous spirit, so as to place our intercourse with these teeming millions of the human race on a footing of justice, friendliness, and humanity. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

MR. MARK STEWART seconded the Motion, and called attention to the Burmah Commercial Treaty of 1862, under which it appeared to him that its main aim was to facilitate the transit of opium from Burmah into China, while on the other hand all opium coming from China was prohibited. He maintained that we were not doing our duty to China nor fulfilling our mission to that great country as the pioneers of civilization. The course we had hitherto pursued was not satisfactory, nor was it likely to raise us in the estimation of the Orientals. Our relationship with China had not been based upon justice, and there ought to be a revision of policy. With respect to the Mission of Colonel Browne in 1874-5, its object, which was practically recognized by Lord Salisbury, was to open up commercial intercourse between Western China and British Burmah, and the establishment of a Consul for that purpose. But there was no reason for anticipating any voluntary concessions from the Chinese, for it was known that great hostility was manifested by the provincial governor. Was that Mission ill-advised or ill-timed? He thought it could hardly be said to be well-advised. Lord Derby, with that foresight which so distinguished him, had apparently endeavoured to throw cold water on the whole affair. In a despatch which he sent from the Foreign Office in 1874

he said Her Majesty's Government could not claim to appoint Consuls in China except at the Treaty Ports. The Treaty of Tientsin, to which so many prohibitions were attached, ought to be thoroughly revised, with the view of our obtaining trade facilities which we had not at present, and placing the opium traffic on a more equitable footing according to Chinese ideas. He was anxious to impress upon Her Majesty's Government the necessity of using all their efforts by degrees, not only to prevent the extension of the opium trade, but to put a stop to it altogether. It was satisfactory to find that in the recent Treaties with China it had been studiously declared that no opium should be permitted to be imported into that country. Now that we had a Minister who was capable of dealing with this difficult and complex subject, no time should be lost in devising means to convince the Chinese that we were anxious to adopt a course of action that was just, sound, and true.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, having regard to the unsatisfactory nature of our relations with China, and to the desirability of placing those relations on a permanently satisfactory footing, this House is of opinion that the existing Treaty between the two Countries should be so revised as to promote the interests of legitimate Commerce, and to secure the just rights of the Chinese Government and People."—(Mr. Richard.)

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL observed, that the great difficulty of dealing with this subject was not to acknowledge the evil, but to devise some remedy for it. The suggestion that the late expedition across the Burmese frontier to China was intended to force our opium into China was entirely without foundation. At the time when it was undertaken he was one of the advisers of the Secretary of State for India, and could, therefore, speak with authority on this point. So far from the Government of India prompting the expedition, they acquiesced in it with great hesitation. Lord Lawrence, while Viceroy, negatived a similar proposal, but the expedition was at last undertaken after full consideration of the altered circumstances of the case. It was one of exploration simply, and he denied that there was any attempt in consequence of that expedition either to establish Consulates or to do anything contrary to the terms of the Treaties then existing. He thought his hon.

Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. Richard) had done good service in directing attention to the fact that in dealing with China and the Chinese Englishmen had not always acted in a spirit of fairness and justice. We applied the standard of Western ideas to all our claims against them, but failed in reciprocity. Having now forced our intercourse upon the Chinese it was necessary to make it fair and just. One detestable feature of the system which we had adopted in our relations with weak countries was the practice of pressing private demands for compensation of an excessive amount in respect of injuries alleged to have been suffered by British subjects. Many of these claims would not be listened to in a British Court of Justice. He found from the Blue Book that when news was first received of the murder of Mr. Margary the first thing done by Sir Thomas Wade, himself a good specimen of an Oriental diplomatist, was to make what he must call a monstrous demand for compensation, being merely as the preliminary to inquiry. Not only was this proceeding unjust, but it was undignified, placing as it did private interests before the claims of public justice. He was glad to find that Her Majesty's Government did not entirely support that demand. The argument used by the Chinese Ministers when an appeal was made to them on this subject was that they would investigate the matter according to their own rules and laws and in their own Courts of Justice, which was all the satisfaction we gave them when they had a complaint against us. It seemed to require some explanation that, when all the demands made in March had been conceded on the 1st of April, we had not availed ourselves of those concessions, and that the whole question should have to be reopened with very much increased demands on our part. He hoped the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs would give some explanation as to the great delay which occurred in the despatch of the Mission. He thought our Government should not make exorbitant demands simply because they could back them with our ships and guns. In conclusion, he had only to say that the efforts of the Government ought to be directed to the object of impressing upon the Chinese Government that in all cases in which we had reason to complain full justice would be required to be done, giving to them at the same time the assurance that when they had demands against us or complaints to be made of injustice full redress would be afforded to them.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR wished to say a few words on this subject, on the ground that having served in India and China the Motion deeply affected the interests of those two great countries. His hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard) knew that he sympathized with the object he had in view. He (Sir George Balfour) was no defender of the trade in opium, and it was quite open for parties to plead for its discontinuance without asserting that it had led to wars between England and China, for he must say that it was not, as alleged by some hon. Members, the traffic in opium that caused the war to break out between Great Britain and China, but it was quite as well grounded to say that the first war was the act of English traders to force Manchester goods on China. In their efforts to break down the monopoly which the East India Company had carried on for 200 years in trading with the Chinese, the English Government destroyed a system of management created by the India Company which had for that long period preserved the peace between the two nations; and within the first six years of the direct rule of the affairs in China under the Foreign Office there was a succession of disputes, terminating in the first war of 1840. He (Sir George Balfour) did not mean to maintain that the monopoly of the East India Company was at all defensible; on the contrary, he must say that, in the interests of India, if not of China, he was glad that that monopoly had been broken down; but the British merchants, who succeeded to the India Company's trade with China, in their efforts to open the Chinese markets for Manchester and other goods, had certainly committed great wrong, and been guilty of great injustice and great excesses against Chinese feelings of exclusiveness. This was England's doing, and India ought not to be made responsible for England's mismanagement. The result was that for two centuries there was quiet in our trade with China, and for 40 years since the transfer there had been disturbance.

Since 1839 we had been in constant hot water with the Chinese, and the consequence had been that, since that time, there had been two great wars carried on between this country and China, and year after year a constant anxiety about war breaking out. Having served in the first war in China, and having seen the desolation and great loss of life thereby caused, he was happy to be able to assure the House that he fully agreed with the hon. Member for Merthyr in the hope that we might never again go to war with that country.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR proceeded to say that it was necessary to clear away a great delusion that prevailed as to the repugnance of the Chinese Government to the opium trade. He believed that the Government of China detested the presence of the Roman Catholic Missionaries, who spread themselves over the whole of China, and excited the fears and alarms of the Government; our Protestant Missionaries were also disliked. He could add that the greatest anxiety he felt when Consul at Shanghai was when that able man the Rev. Mr. Medhurst, of the London Missionary Society, visited the green tea country. The greatest efforts were made by the Chinese Government to have him seized, and it was his (Sir George Balfour's) duty to insist in stern language that in apprehending Mr. Medhurst the utmost degree of respect and good treatment should be shown. This was a far more troublesome task to perform than he had ever had with regard to opium. But it was not true that the Chinese Government were unwilling to admit opium. Immediately after the Treaty of Nankin — that was, in 1843 — the opium question was discussed. It was at Canton that most of the negotiations took place with respect to the tariff, and it was distinctly stated by the two Chinese Ministers to Sir Henry Pottinger that they were willing to admit Indian opium if a proportionate sum of money was paid for its admission. Subsequently, when Consul at Shanghai, as stated in a former debate on the opium traffic, he (Sir George Balfour) did all in his

—one quoting the opinion of one of our Consuls in China to show that the use of opium was not so hurtful as he had at first supposed, and that further observation convinced him that it afforded a solace and a stimulus to persons who did the hardest and rudest work without injuring their health: and others to the effect that the cultivation of the poppy in various parts of China was gradually extending, while the action of the authorities, local and Imperial, in reference to it was very uncertain: in some cases its cultivation was treated as an illicit, and in others as a recognized trade, the native revenue officers exacting bribes from those who carried it on—proceeded—therefore, notwithstanding all attempts to discourage the growth of the drug, the Chinese were so much addicted to its use that there was now no prospect of its not being grown even to a greater extent than it had heretofore been. Nothing could be farther from the truth than the allegation that an attempt had been made to force opium upon China through Burmah. Some observations had been made with regard to the delay in making inquiries as to the murder of Mr. Margary. The reason why a mission with regard to the murder of Mr. Margary did not take place immediately was the impossibility of obtaining from the Chinese Government those guarantees which Sir Thomas Wade thought were absolutely necessary. But those guarantees were finally obtained. If a route from Burmah to Western China could really be opened up by means of negotiation, then the object of Mr. Margary's mission would be secured, and far greater results would be gained for this country than could have been conceived. It had been said that the English Government was liable to make exorbitant claims on behalf of private individuals. He knew of no such cases since he had been at the Foreign Office; but, at the same time, if the lives and property of British subjects in China were to be protected, they must hold the Chinese Government responsible for any injury or maltreatment which they received. The hon. Member opposite had raised objections to the extritoriality of English settlements in China; but although it was not a system that we should like to see established in this country, it was absolutely necessary in conducting our commercial intercourse with nations like

China, because without it no English merchant could carry on his business there for a single day. Her Majesty's Government agreed with the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) that the time had come for a revision of our Treaties with China, and, indeed, negotiations having that object in view had been going on between the two Governments for some years. A Convention, in fact, had been agreed upon with the Chinese authorities for that purpose, but it having been submitted to the Chambers of Commerce in this country, and having been disapproved by them, the late Government had been compelled to inform the Chinese Government that it could not be ratified by us. That showed how careful the late Government was of commercial interests. In conducting our negotiations for a revised Treaty with China, we were bound to remember the peculiar position of the Government of that country, and should endeavour to adopt a line of conciliation, and to bring the interests of our merchants as much as possible into harmony with those of the Chinese people; and looking at the present political position of China, we must avoid all acts that would derogate from the authority of the supreme power, and thus prevent what at one time was imminent—the complete social disorganization of that country. It was, however, at the same time, necessary to be very firm in our dealings with the Chinese authorities, because a large body of the people were anxious to have nothing to say to us, and he was sorry to say that our experience of the Chinese was that they would take every opportunity they could to avoid carrying out the terms of their Treaties with us. There was nothing to be gained by denying that fact, and therefore it was necessary to show that Her Majesty's Government was prepared to insist upon the observance of Treaties which had been entered into. They had done all that was possible in the way of negotiation; but, as the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil had remarked, it was necessary to consider the opinions of other Powers in reference to a question of this kind. Having consulted the Governments of France, Germany, and the United States, Her Majesty's Government was waiting to learn what was likely to be done by the Powers in reference to it.

s before deciding upon any definite course as far as the action of this was concerned. If it were necessary to act we should not do so without the co-operation of one or two, perhaps three, other Powers. He thought the hon. Member would not press the question to a division. The Government was anxious, as regarded opium, to do what it could; and, as to a revision of the Treaties, he did not think there was much difference between the Government and the hon. Member, who, he thought, would be satisfied with the discussion which had been conducted with so much ability on both sides of the House.

JOHN KENNAWAY held that the Government had no right to make use of its strength to force opium upon an alien people like the Chinese. He seconded the appeal to the hon. Member to withdraw his Motion. It was clear from the statement of the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken that Her Majesty's Government was not only inclined to deal with the question, but had actually taken steps to do so.

RITCHIE said, the House had spent many hours, and had to meet at noon that day. It was time for half-past 12 o'clock, to go home, and he therefore moved the Adjournment of the House.

On made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Ritchie.)

MR. NOLAN gave Notice that if the Government should support the Motion for Adjournment he should divide the House against every Morning Sitting for the remainder of the Session.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER appealed to the hon. Member for Devon Hamlets not to press the Motion because, undoubtedly, when a Morning Sitting was taken there was an understanding that the Government would endeavour to secure for hon. Members a fair opportunity of discussing the questions in which they were interested.

CONSTABULARY PENSIONERS (IRELAND).

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. MELDON rose to call attention to the claims of the Royal Irish Constabulary Pensioners who retired from the "Force" previous to the month of August 1874, with respect to the readjustment of their "Pensions;" and to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the justice of the claims of the Royal Irish Constabulary Pensioners who retired before the month of August 1874, and to report thereon. The case of the Constabulary pensioners was a very hard one, and called for equitable redress. At the time the Royal Irish Constabulary were established, in 1847, they were to have two-thirds of their pay settled on them as pensions after 15 years' service, and after 20 years' service they were entitled to retire on the whole of their pay. When the Act of 1866 was passed they were to receive an increase of pay; but they had no reason to complain that injustice was done to them. Up to 1866 the Constabulary out of their own pay contributed to a fund to provide pensions for themselves. That fund, he was informed, was amply sufficient for the purpose, so that if the pensions were given, they would not be paid by the public, but out of their own savings; but from 1866 to 1874 this justice had been refused to them. He thought these other facts would induce the Government either to make an inquiry into the matter, or to give him a Select Committee on the subject.

MR. R. SMYTH seconded the Motion. He mentioned as a type of many cases that one man received £36 of a pension, while another man of the same rank and service received £76. The system of pensions accorded to the Irish Constabulary was nothing better than a kind of "blindman's buff," because a man who retired on the 31st July, 1874, did not know what was taking place, or the serious disadvantage at which he was placing himself by retiring 24 hours too soon, and the man who took an increased pension the next day also did not understand it. The Government having determined on a change, it ought to be carried out on equitable principles; and those who had faithfully discharged their duties for a long series of years ought not to be sent back to their native districts with a sense of wrong rankling in their breasts.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the justice of the claims of the Royal Irish Constabulary Pensioners who retired before the month of August 1874, and to report thereon."—(Mr. Meldon.)

MR. MACARTNEY supported the Motion, and said that the case of the Constabulary, as laid before the House by his hon. Friend, was quite in accord with the feeling of the people of Ireland.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH denied that the members of the Constabulary who had retired before the passing of the Act of 1874 had been unfairly treated, for the pensions granted to them had been calculated in strict accordance with the provisions of the law.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH resumed, by saying that although differing in opinion upon this subject from hon. Members who had addressed the House, he regretted the interruption which had taken place. All he wished to add to that which he had already said was, that the men received the exact amount of pension which they were expecting to receive, and which was the amount calculated upon the provisions of the then existing law, and no complaint of unfair treatment had ever been made on their behalf until the rate of pensions was largely increased under the Act of 1874. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Kildare seemed to think that the Government would refuse a Select Committee, because it was certain to report against them. He had no such dread; but looking at all the circumstances of the case he could not grant the inquiry asked for, as it would only have the effect of raising hopes which would never be realized.

MR. O'REILLY suggested that, as the matter was a difficult and complex one, it might be referred to an independent party.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there was no disposition to act unhandsomely by the Constabulary pensioners. He had previously gone carefully into the question with the Chief Secretary; but if they would leave the matter in the hands of the Government they were quite prepared to look again carefully into the matter, and take the opinion of the English Law Officers of the Crown in respect to it. They did not think it desirable to appoint a Committee, which must cause excitement injurious to the Service.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS thought they ought not, after the concession just mentioned, to fly in the face of the Government. The House was prepared, if necessary, to fight out the matter on behalf of the Motion.

MR. PARNELL wished to explain that, in giving his vote for the Motion, he was not voting for pensions for a semi-military Force. He hoped the time would come when good and true Irishmen, as these men were, would not be employed by the Government in hunting down their countrymen.

MR. MELDON said, he felt that, under the circumstances, he would not be acting in the interests of the Irish Constabulary if he proceeded with the Motion, which he begged to withdraw—"No, no!"—and thus leave the matter in the hands of the Government.

Question put.

PARLIAMENTARY AGENTS.

Lords Message [23rd June] (by Order) considered.

MR. RAIKES, in moving—

“That a Select Committee of five Members be appointed to join with the Committee of five Lords (as mentioned in the Message from the Lords of the 23rd day of this instant June) to consider the expediency of making further regulations concerning the admission and practice of Parliamentary Agents, and to report their opinion thereon,” said that, as it at present stood, any man might, on the recommendation of a Member of Parliament or a justice of the peace, become a Parliamentary Agent. Such a system afforded no guarantee and no means of judging of a man's fitness to undertake the conduct of Parliamentary Business. Owing to some recent circumstances, the matter had been brought to the notice of the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees of the other House of Parliament, who had thought it desirable that some joint action should be taken by the two Houses, in order to protect the public interest in this matter—the public being at present liable to suffer not only from the inexperience and incapacity, but also from extortion on the part of persons calling themselves Parliamentary Agents. Personally, he (Mr. Raikes) would testify to the great assistance which he had received from Parliamentary Agents ever since he had held the office of Chairman of the Committees of Ways and Means. They were gentlemen of the highest probity and capability, and no doubt hon. Members had observed the able manner in which they conducted their business. He would not suggest the course which this Committee, if appointed, should pursue, but simply state that no harm could be done by joining the Lords' Committee. He would add that if the House of Lords should make further regulations, great inconvenience might arise if the House of Commons did not make the same. He might point out that instances of unprofessional conduct on the part of certain Parliamentary Agents had recently come to light, such as dividing their fees with the solicitors. This necessarily tended to increase the expense of Parliamentary proceedings, and was in every respect a great abuse, and it would be well if some steps could be taken to put an end to the practice. The hon. Member concluded by moving the appointment of the Select Committee.

MR. DODDS thought that sufficient reasons for the appointment of this Committee had been given, and therefore he had no objection to offer to the Motion. After the Joint Committee had considered the matter the new regulations, if any were agreed upon, would be brought before the House and then there would be an opportunity of discussing them.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed; to consist of Mr. DODSON, Mr. BASIL WOODD, Mr. O'REILLY, Mr. BATHURST, and Mr. RAIKES:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Three to be the Quorum.

REAL ESTATE INTESTACY BILL.

(Mr. Potter, Mr. Leatham, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Mr. Hopwood, Mr. William Edwin Price.)

[BILL 31.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. POTTER, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said: The Bill which I ask the House to read a second time to-day has for its object the assimilation of the law affecting real property with that on personal property in cases of intestacy. It aims to remove from the Statute Book a law which, in my opinion, gives an unwise and unjust preference to an eldest son over the rest of the family in cases of death without a will, for which law there is no State necessity, as in feudal times, and which is not adapted to the circumstances of the day. The subject has been frequently before the House, and a Bill was brought forward as early as 1836 by the late Mr. William Ewart, then Member for Liverpool. It was again brought forward in 1837 by the same hon. Gentleman, but in both cases it met with no success. Mr. Locke King brought forward the question in 1850, and in several successive Parliaments the question was identified with his name, until in July, 1869, he obtained a majority of 25, and carried the second reading by 169 Ayes to 144 Noes. In 1870 it was understood that the question was left in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone); but, as no measure was introduced, Mr. Locke King again prepared a Bill in 1873, which did not reach a second reading. I am not going to enter upon the legal technicalities of the question, as I believe they will be dealt with by hon. Gentlemen who will follow me. Nor do I intend to dwell on the numerous instances of injustice and hardship to widows and younger sons and others, which occur in the working of the present law, and which, I think, cannot be denied. I believe the law as it stands at present is an anomaly, and not suited to the necessities of the present day. I believe it ought to have been abolished 200 years ago, when the feudal obligations on which it was based were done away with. The feudal system, which was quite contrary to the spirit of the old English laws in Saxon times, was fully established in England in the 13th century. The necessity of Monarchs in those days required the concentration of power and of land (which was the main source of power) in the hands of very few individuals; and consequently the law directed the inheritance of land to the eldest son, to the exclusion of the younger branches of the family, though not to so complete an exclusion as the present intestacy laws provide for. I venture to impugn the intestacy laws as the key-stone of the custom of primogeniture. I am aware that there is no law of primogeniture, but in cases of intestacy the law sanctions the custom, and, in fact, gives the custom the force of law. In the 13th century military service was frequently the sole condition on which land was held. I hold in my hand a title deed or grant of the 13th century, which belongs to a friend of mine who still occupies the land granted to his ancestor 600 years ago. Homage and service are the sole conditions except the payment every year of the clove of gilliflower at Easter. There was, however, a singular condition entered into on the part of the grantor, which was that in return for the homage, military service, and the payment of the clove of gilliflower each Easter, he bound himself and his heirs to defend against all men, Jews and Christians, the grantee and his heirs for ever. In 1662, at the Restoration of Charles II., the military obligations of landowners were abolished, and a grant was made to the King of a tax on the beer of the people to the extent of 1s. a barrel in place of them. The landowners relieved themselves of the burden of military service, on which their tenure had been based, but accepted no new burden themselves. It was at that time that, as it appears to me, the laws of intestacy should have been abolished. There was no longer the necessity of concentrating power in a few hands for military objects, as armies were no longer provided by the landowners. Since that time the effect of the maintenance of these laws has simply been the political and social aggrandizement of certain families. Unfortunately, instead of abolishing the laws of intestacy, when the necessity for their existence had passed away, these laws had been made more stringent and exclusive during the last 200 years. I think it will not be denied that by assimilating the law on real and personal property in land, a great simplification would be gained as regards title deeds to property, though the lawyers might complain that their interests were interfered with. Whatever may be the views taken by lawyers, the real difficulty in effecting the change I desire is political and social. But I think it is time that the spirit of feudalism should give way to more modern ideas. The many would be gainers, though the few would be losers by the change. It was said by an American statesman, speaking of the change in the intestacy laws in the State of Virginia, which State was the last, after American Independence, to adopt the modern idea, that—"If there would be fewer coaches and six driving into Richmond, there would be more carriages and pairs." I do not anticipate that the abrogation of these laws will affect any great immediate change, but I believe the result will be salutary on the whole, and that, at any rate, an anomaly will be removed from the Statute Book. I claim the support of the present Government, and especially that of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who told us in Manchester last autumn that "the true features of a Conservative policy were not to destroy institutions, but to adapt them to the circumstances of the day." Surely I may claim that the present laws as affecting intestacy are not adapted to the circumstances of the day. I hope, therefore, to have the vote of the right hon. Gentleman in favour of the second reading of the Bill.

MR. LEATHAM: I rise, Sir, to second the Motion of my hon. Friend (Mr. Potter), and as my name is upon the back of the Bill, perhaps the House will allow me to say a few words in its defence. When this subject was last under discussion, we heard a great deal about the small freeholder, and I dare say that he will make his appearance again to-day. Hon. Gentlemen contend that the Bill will destroy him, and, so far as I am able to follow the argument, it is this—most of these small freeholds are heavily mortgaged, and the village usurer is only prevented from foreclosing and pouncing upon the land at once, because he knows that under the existing law it will descend in a lump. But how can he know that his victim will not make a will? And further, if the freehold be so heavily mortgaged, that the process of sale will sweep away the margin, the question suggests itself whether it is worth while to keep such a freeholder as that upon his legs at all. It is, above all things, desirable that the land should be in the hands of men of means. And if by the peasant proprietor be meant a proprietor who is mortgaged to the hilt, for my own part I lose all interest in the peasant proprietor. Indeed, I am a little amused at the amount of sympathy with which he appears to have inspired hon. Gentlemen opposite. I had always supposed that there was no landholder in the House who would have thought it a great misfortune if, at anything like a reasonable price, he was able to clear away some of the little white patches which, in his estimation, no doubt disfigure the green expanse of the map of his estates; but now I find that there is nothing so much to be dreaded, and nothing so much to be deprecated. There is one class of small freeholder, however, whom the Bill will not touch—those who have purchased a few acres with the proceeds of their industry, or who have inherited from those who have so purchased. For we have the high authority of Lord Coleridge, based upon his experience as a revising barrister, for saying that such men are not only in the habit of making wills, but even simple settlements. But the class upon which hon. Members perhaps have their eye is one whose freeholds have grown up, not because they have been inherited, as we were told on one occasion, from the time of William Rufus, or any other William, but because the negligence of the lord of the manor has permitted squatters upon the common land. I cannot regard this class as either interesting or important. To begin with, they are not in a position of independence; for isolation is not independence. They are usually feeble parasites hanging on to the flanks of some great estate. There is nothing Arcadian about them, not even the simplicity, and if this Bill should promote their disappearance without hardship to anybody, and so give an unexpected holiday to the gamekeeper and the policeman, I do not know that we shall have any great cause for regret. But whether this be so or not, nothing can be more absurd than to invest the heirs of such men with all the paraphernalia which you have contrived to throw around the ownership and descent of land in the gross. It is better at once to recognize the fact that, except in the vicinity of towns, land has become a luxury of the rich, and one for which they are willing to pay exorbitant prices. It follows that for a poor man with a family to continue to hold land is very often the height of improvidence, and it is better for everybody that at his death the land should be sold at a high price for the benefit of all the survivors, rather than that it should pass to one to the exclusion and possible pauperism of all the rest. So much for the case of the small freeholder. Now, let me turn to what I cannot but regard as a more substantial objection to this Bill in the minds of hon. Gentlemen, and one which is thinly veiled by all this transparent enthusiasm for the small freeholder—I mean the possible influence which this Bill may exercise over the future of primogeniture in this country. To listen to some hon. Members, one would suppose that a hereditary Monarchy and a hereditary Peerage were staked upon the issue of this debate. It has been my melancholy lot on many an occasion, when some just reform has been demanded, to see what I may term the great Gods of the Constitution dragged by the hair into our debates, but not often, I think, in quite such a quarrel as this. At the risk of appearing irrational to some hon. Members, I venture to dispute the assertion that this Bill will endanger the principle of primogeniture as it is now understood in this country. For what is meant by primogeniture now? Does it mean that the obligation which devolves upon every man to support all the beings whom he has introduced into the world is rendered null and void by the fact of his being possessed of property in the most substantial and enduring shape? If this were the meaning of primogeniture, it could not exist in this intelligent community for a single hour. What is the significance of your whole system of settlements in favour of younger children? Why, it is the protest of every succeeding generation against the naked barbarism of such an idea. The universal custom of the country is against it, for it is the universal custom to provide for younger children at the expense of the estate. All natural justice and all reasonable sentiment are against it too, for I will engage to say that there is no Member of this House possessed of landed property, and only landed property, and possessed also of the power of willing it, who would dare to think that he was propitiating either justice or sentiment if he bequeathed the whole to one child, and flung all the rest naked and destitute upon society. Yet it is precisely against this burlesque and caricature of primogeniture that this Bill is framed. Now, if it is any crumb of comfort to hon. Members who are opposing the Bill, let me say at once that, as one of its promoters, I have no quarrel with the principle of primogeniture. I am very far indeed from saying that when a man has once made what he considers to be an adequate provision for his children, he is not at liberty to bequeath the surplus to any member of his family he pleases; and upon what member of his family is his choice so likely to fall as upon his eldest son? I will go a step further, and say that when a man has made proper provision for his family, there is no principle of economy, and, certainly, no precept of morality and religion, which can forbid him to bequeath the whole of the surplus to some great public object with which his children may have nothing directly to do. Taking, then, this limited and modified, and, as I venture to think, reasonable notion of primogeniture, what is there in the Bill before the House to overthrow or even endanger it? The practice of primogeniture is based on almost immemorial usage. Are we asked to believe that immemorial usage will perish before a Bill which will change the devolution of only one estate in 500—perhaps not of one acre in 5,000? It is not contended for a moment that this Bill will change by one hair's-breadth the devolution of large estates. They are bound up by fetters which are strong as the chains of destiny, and which the Bill cannot unbind. And whose example are the small proprietors so likely to follow as that of the large proprietors? If, then, primogeniture be just, if it appeals, as it does appeal vehemently, to sentiment, if it be able to command the force of predominant example, what has it to fear from this Bill? Hon. Gentlemen display very little confidence in the justice of primogeniture and in the power of all those forces which will still converge in its favour, when they tremble for it, and for everything which they suppose to be founded upon it, merely because we propose to touch the very fringe of the question by a little Bill for the dispersion of estates which are either so small, or the devolution of which is so little an object of interest to their owners, that they make no wills at all. Even if I were enamoured of the principle of primogeniture, if I regarded it, not as I do regard it, as a principle which has a great deal to be said in its favour, but as that upon which everything which is just and stable in this country is founded, I should still vote for this Bill; because all experience proves that if a principle is to be respected and preserved it must not be pushed to an excess, and I contend that it is pushed to an excess by the existing law. Why, there is no civilized country in the world with such a law of intestacy! We are acting not only in the teeth of English custom, but of the whole law and custom of mankind. And, under these circumstances, what must happen? Why, being indefensible, the law will some day be swept away, and with it possibly other things which are quite susceptible of defence, but which we persist in confounding and entangling with it by all the reasoning, I had almost said by all the casuistry, at our command.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. T. B. Potter.)

MR. GREGORY said, that the subject of the Bill had not yet been brought forward in the present Parliament, and no one could say that it was not a fair one for discussion, or that it had not been most ably and moderately treated by the hon. Members who had introduced it. But the question was, whether they had shown a sufficient case for the alteration of a law which had been in operation, in this country, at all events, since the Norman conquest, and probably before, as it appeared to have formed part of the Saxon code by which the country was previously governed. Now, in the first place, in dealing with the question, he protested against any analogy being attempted between this and foreign countries. The conditions of their climate, products, and population were so different that no fair parallel could be drawn, and he trusted in particular that we should never be brought to entertain the French law of partition of property, of the effects of which he had some personal experience, and of the destructive effects of which upon property he warned the House. It was true that the present Bill did not go to that extent, inasmuch as it left untouched the power of dealing with property by settlement or devise; but if they introduced the principle as proposed by this Bill of the partition of property, in case of intestacy they might before long have a cry raised against the power of devising land by will as contrary to the spirit of the law, and the distribution of property which it contemplated. Now, as regarded the Bill itself, it would, as he read it, operate as a conversion of real property out and out in cases of intestacy, and as the property was to pass by the grant of administration, he apprehended that it would become liable to administration duty. He did not know whether it was the intention of the promoters of the Bill to subject land generally to probate or administration duty. It had not been stated by them, but it was implied by their Bill, and gave rise to a very grave and serious question, involving, of course, the distribution of burthens between real and personal estate, and the liability of the former to land tax, local rates, and other impositions of that nature. As regarded the operation of the Bill it would not take effect upon many of the larger estates in this country, as they were generally the subject of settlement, or upon many of those belonging to the upper and educated middle classes, as those persons generally left wills which would take their property out of the operation of the Bill; but the Bill would take effect upon many small properties belonging to persons in humble circles, and it would be well for the House to consider what this effect would be. Now, if land was to be divided amongst a family, it could be done only in one of two ways—namely, either by sale or by partition; and he ventured to say that, do what you would, the expenses in either case would be wholly disproportionate to, and would seriously affect, the value of the property. Besides this, were you really benefiting the members of the family by this distribution? Would you not be creating in their minds the impression that on the death of their parent they would come into possession of property sufficient for their wants, and that it was not necessary for them to provide for them by their own exertions, subjecting them, in short, to that most demoralizing of influences—namely, that of living upon expectations? He (Mr. Gregory) had seen much of this in families, in cases of personal property, and he certainly did not think it would be beneficial to carry it any further. Well, if this were a true representation of the effects of the Bill, the question arose, whether a sufficient case of hardship had been made out of the operation of the present law to justify the alteration of it. The hon. Gentleman who promoted this Bill had not cited any instances of it. He (Mr. Gregory) did not deny that there might be some—in fact, there was hardly any law which did not occasionally give rise to hard cases. But he did not believe they were numerous in the present instance, and certainly, in his own experience, which had extended over a good many years, he could hardly recollect one. Again, he believed that the law as it stood generally carried out the wishes and intentions of the owner of the property. There was a general desire in the proprietors of land in this country to keep it together, and in none more strongly than in Gentlemen who, like the Mover and Seconder of the Bill, he believed, had acquired property by their own energy and intelligence. He believed, under the circumstances he had stated, that the proposed alteration of the law was uncalled for and injurious; that it would be destructive of small properties, which would have to be sold, and, if sold, would certainly be merged into larger estates; and that we were called upon, without any case of necessity being shown, to alter a system of great antiquity, well recognized and generally acquiesced in by the people of this country.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE, in seconding the Amendment, referred to the time which had elapsed since the question used at long intervals to be presented to the House as the pet crotchet of Mr. Locke King, the loss of whose genial presence was the smart money which Parliament had paid for the beneficent change of 1874. Mr. Locke King used to base his views on somewhat sensational stories of alleged individual hardships, while the hon. Member for Rochdale had plunged into the depths of archæology, and discoursed upon gilliflowers in 1270. As to the ingenious speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield, he could only contrast it with a very telling one from the same lips delivered only a short time ago, when he was resisting a small Bill for enfranchising widows and spinsters, on the ground that that apparently trifling little Bill was only an instalment which would open the road to still wider and worse changes. On that occasion his arguments seemed to be very conclusive, and cynical critics might consider them a logical reply to the speech which the House had just heard. Still, his hon. Friend was the martyr of his own consistency, when he had the candour to tear the mask from the Bill and own that it was intended for the absorption of small properties. He must himself, relying as he did on such good authority, denounce the Bill as a barefaced attempt of Plutocrats to make it more easy to absorb and gobble up those small properties in land which were often, at present, difficult of acquisition; while, if the desired change took place, they would be at the mercy of any provincial Ahab. In this respect he maintained that the Bill was contrary to public policy and an anachronism; while, on the other hand, it might often lead to the breaking up of properties, when sound reason would urge they had best be kept together. It had been brought forward many times by Mr. Locke King; but he would go no further back than March 2, 1859, when it was thrown out by 271 to 76. On that occasion the Leaders of the then Opposition, though Liberals, showed themselves conservative of the principles of the Constitution. Sir George Cornwall Lewis—one who was, in the best sense of the word, the most sceptical of men—a man in whom imagination never overbore reason, nor hypothesis evidence—denied that a measure of this sort could have a limited application, and said “its effect would be to extinguish that class of persons who were denominated heirs.” Sir George Lewis argued, moreover, that it would operate against the widow, by raising a sentimental feeling against marriage settlements for fear of crippling younger children. So that, although under the present system there might be “limited starvation,” under this Bill there would be starvation all round. As things were, there was left one corpus of property on which all might lean—hereafter, corpus there would be none. Lord Palmerston, who followed, roundly asserted that such a proposal was incompatible with the maintenance of a constitutional Monarchy; but it was not necessary to go that length to be seriously opposed to the change. However, it was worth noting that that very shrewd man stated that his objections to the Bill were “on every possible ground;” while he characterized the alteration in the law as at variance with all the habits of the English people. In 1866, when he (Mr. Beresford Hope) had the honour of carrying its rejection, the minority of 76 in favour of the Bill had grown to 84, but the opponents of the measure then numbered 281. So the progress in seven years was an increase in the opposition to it of just two. Sir Roundell Palmer, who was then Attorney General, thought it so necessary to resist the measure that he ran out of Court, and came down to the House in his wig and gown in order to make a speech against it, in which he dwelt with great force on the benefits in time past of the maintenance of a graduated scale of society, which, as he contended, this Bill would affect. The debate was concluded by the right hon. Member for Greenwich, who was then Leader of the House, and he expressed a general acquiescence in Sir Roundell Palmer's arguments, and voted in the majority.

Mr. Locke King again brought forward the measure in 1869, when it was carried by a small majority, during the first year of the Government of the right hon. Member for Greenwich. But that was at a time when hon. Gentlemen opposite were reveling and rollicking in their enormous majority of 120, pulling down Churches and generally turning the world upside down. Yet they could only whip up a miserable majority of 25—169 to 144—although the right hon. Member for Greenwich—following the bent of his gigantic but impulsive intellect—then voted for the Bill. It was not for him to conjecture the mental process which had so soon turned his right hon. Friend; but this he knew—that in the minority still voted 17 Liberals, and some of them men of great weight in that House, such as the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (the late Attorney General), the right hon. Member for South Hampshire, and Sir Roundell Palmer. At that time, too, the case of the advocates of Mr. Locke King's measure was bolstered up by that most absurd fallacy that there were only 30,000 landed proprietors in England—founded upon an obviously unfair muddling of some fragmentary Census Returns—a fallacy which he grieved to say that even the right hon. Member for Birmingham had condescended to pick up and to propagate. Since then the "Domesday Book" had appeared, and showed that, excluding proprietors in London, there were 972,836 landed proprietors in England and Wales, of whom 703,289 held less than an acre each. Not only had that fallacy been exploded, but the Return had clearly proved that there were a great many more proprietors of very small quantities of land scattered throughout the country than the world had previously suspected. He found, for instance, that out of 48 properties, taken at haphazard out of eight counties, six from each, 22 were under 10 acres, while only two counted by thousands—4,323 and 1,716 respectively; and there were but five between 1,000 and 100 acres—the largest of 747, and the smallest of 183. How, therefore, any hon. Member could contend that public policy required that further facilities for the division of landed property should be given by the Legislature, he was at a loss to understand. These figures proved that land was already divided enough. The common sense of the matter clearly was, that although when a large property came into the market the next proprietor, if he could buy it as a whole, and if he was sure it would stay a whole, might very probably do so, supposing him to be a man who had made a fortune, and who wished to establish a name in the country, yet that, as a rule, sizeable properties were preferentially kept together at their original dimensions.

The enactments of this Bill, and still more the tone of feeling which it would engender, would be fatal to the continuance of the existing balance; the bigger properties would get bigger, and the smaller ones smaller each generation. There was, again, another class of small proprietors which had no existence 40 or 50 years ago—the proprietors of lots in building societies. What would be the result in their case if this Bill were passed? When any of these proprietors had not made his will, the property would come into the market. Was it likely that the labourer or the artisan would come in to buy it? No, it would go to the attorney or the speculative builder, who would be on the perpetual look-out to snap up windfalls; so that land societies would no longer be the beneficent agents of industry which they were intended to be. The village usurer also—a common character in some parts of the country—would profit by the Bill, for, although a man might still, by mortgaging his property, retain a nominal ownership, he could be able to do so only at a higher rate of interest in proportion to the risk, and thus be more speedily reduced to destitution. If hon. Members opposite were all as candid as those who had preceded him, and declared as openly that they wanted to see an end of small properties, he could meet them on equal grounds. But, even assuming their premises, the damnosa hereditas, if it was one, was limited to a single victim, and it was only exceptionally damnosa, while the other sons made their own way by their own exertions. Under that system of preferential division of which this Bill was the forerunner, all inheritances would ultimately be damnosissimæ, and the ever swelling phalanx of owners of land too little to live by, and yet just big enough to delude them into dodging starvation, would daily draw closer to the risk of deteriorating into purposeless and needy loafers. Then, as to the larger properties. In his speech in 1866, Sir Roundell Palmer pointed out the advantage of keeping old residential estates well together, estates on which the landlords lived, not merely viewing them as investments, but for pleasurable occupation—men who looked after the schools and provided good cottages on their properties. But it was said that if the Bill became law not only this residential landowner, who did so much for the poor on his property, but all others, would be sure to make their wills. Well, it was a strange reason for asking the House to pass a measure to enter into a sort of guarantee that its provisions would be inoperative. It would, however, not be inoperative in such cases, for instance, as those in which a proprietor happened to be a minor or a lunatic, and the result would be that, however important to the neighbourhood might be the maintenance of an estate in its entirety, it would have to be put up for sale and divided piecemeal.

The right hon. Member for Birmingham had, in speeches delivered outside the House, told them that it was not intended to introduce the French system of compulsory division or to interfere with freedom of bequest, and had urged that this was simply an optional measure. But its more outspoken advocates admitted that their desire was to change the existing prejudice for keeping property together, and to substitute the opposite doctrine in popular estimation. If they had not a bias in favour of some such system the question would not have been urged on with so much pertinacity. But in France the enforced division of land had, as the House well knew, and as had been pointed out in a very interesting work (Round my House), recently published by Mr. Hamerton, and describing the social life of provincial France, or at least of Burgundy, from the farm-house and the cottage to the chateau of the squire and the dwelling of the well-to-do bourgeois in the country towns—produced a very miserable state of things, and one which must, as time went on, lead to still more disastrous complications. The supposed political stability and dread of change which had sometimes been predicated of the French system as a favourable feature was one which he would not dignify with the name of Conservatism, for it was at best a lazy, torpid, profoundly ignorant, and, above all, selfish feeling. It had to be taken in connection with another French practice, not indeed enforced by the Codex civile, but by the equally tyrannical law of custom, the mariage de convenance, also very graphically pictured by Mr. Hamerton. The most respectable provincial form of this mariage de convenance (the one, that is, which is fashionable in upper and bourgeois classes) was when neither party had ever seen the other, but both were convinced of the solid advantages of the alliance, and both perhaps owners of some scrap of land. The combined results of this system was that which a very eminent French Protestant minister lately owned to him (Mr. Beresford Hope) was la plaie (the sore) of French social life—namely, the limitation of families. This was a subject on which it was impossible to speak publicly with perfect plainness in a country where the domestic hearth with its large and happy family circle was cherished as God's blessing. The husband and wife in France married for interest. Their affections were set upon keeping together their properties, of which each had probably a share. One child would unite both possessions, two would leave things as they were, and the diminution made by three could be repaired by saving. A larger family meant inevitable partition and diminution. The result was that the marrying couples did not wish their unions to be very fertile and that those unions were not very fertile. The House would not be surprised at his being very fearful and jealous of any legislation which seemed even to open the door to any possible introduction of so evil a system. The Bill had never yet been made a Party question, for the number of distinguished Liberals who voted against it in 1869 had been sufficient to divert it of that character. He appealed, therefore, to the Opposition not, now for the first time, to make this a Party division.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Gregory.)

MR. BAXTER said, the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge had delivered a long and amusing speech, but he had entered very much into the question of general politics, in which course he (Mr. Baxter) did not desire to follow him:—indeed, if any one had come into the House during the earlier portion of the hon. Member's speech he would have been at a loss to discover what the debate was about. The party who were opposed to the very simple alteration of the law which it was the object of the Bill to accomplish, had made a very remarkable change of front during the course of the controversy. He (Mr. Baxter) was old enough to recollect when the sole objection made to the change was that it would lead to the partition of estates, and when all the stock arguments against the system adopted in France and elsewhere were brought up to frighten the people of this country into a rejection of the policy proposed by this Bill. But in 1869 that argument was not used. Hon. Gentlemen one after the other took exactly the opposite line, and told the House then, as it was told now, that if the Bill was passed, the main and immediate consequence would be to annex a number of the small properties to vast neighbouring domains, and in that way forward the accumulation of property in a few hands, and so make the evil greater than it was at present. That was the argument of 1869. To-day they were favoured with both these arguments; for both the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment (Mr. Gregory), and the hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope), described this as a Bill for the partition of land, and then went on to show that it would tend to the annexation of small properties to large ones. Two more inconsistent speeches he never remembered. For his own part, he did not believe that the consequence of the passing of the Bill would be the assimilation of the property would make any perceptible difference in the size of estates in Great Britain. But the true question in issue, in this the 19th century, was whether the mode in which personal property—intestate personal property—was now distributed—namely, to the widow and children, male and female, was a fair and natural and a Christian-like mode of distributing it? And he would ask every hon. Member sitting on the other side of the House, if he had a new constitutional code to draw up, would he for one moment entertain the idea of giving the eldest son the right to all the real estate, leaving, perhaps, the other members of the family in a state of destitution? Why, this was a piece of artificial legislation. It came down from feudal times, from the mediæval ages, and arose from the circumstances of those ages. Our more modern and better notions of justice to humanity would never have established it, and he was satisfied that sooner or later it would be abolished. The cases of intestacy were few and far between in this country; but, at the same time, it was essential that the law should be uniform, no matter what the property was, whether it was real or personal. He had two reasons for supporting the Bill. First, that it would do something in the way of educating the people of this country in favour of a more equal division of property. He did not agree with what had fallen from the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham), and thought the Bill would have a tendency to educate the people of this country in favour of equal distribution of property, and so mitigate the evils of the advantages which were too often given to primogeniture. He would plainly assert his opinion that it was a great detriment to any nation when great tracts of land were held by one man, who must necessarily be an absentee, and unable to perform those duties which a landlord ought to perform. The hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Beresford Hope) had referred to a most interesting book relating to the subdivision of property in France. The book exposed the evils which they all knew existed under that system—and he might say at once that he was not an advocate for the compulsory subdivision of property, or that we should assimilate our law to that of France. He thought the law of France

a very bad law; and in advocating this Bill he wished to deny in the strongest manner that he had any desire whatever to assimilate the law of this country to that of France. His second reason for supporting the Bill was that it would relieve many families who under the operation of the present system would be plunged into a state of destitution by the death of a father who had invested all his little savings in a plot of ground, and had unfortunately omitted to make his will. The hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), who moved the Amendment, said—and he (Mr. Baxter) was surprised to hear it—that he did not believe there were many such instances in this country. Surely his hon. Friend had been present on former occasions when a great many instances of such hardship were quoted. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge admitted that in the speech they had just heard. Another objection had been urged against the Bill. It was said that it would be found that small properties would be consumed by mortgages, and that the effect would be to annex small holdings to large ones. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gregory) did not agree on this point. He said he did not believe that mortgages existed to a great extent; but he was flatly contradicted by the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge. Was it not a strange thing that this country of ours was the only country which had a law of this kind? That was a reason of itself why they should pass the Bill. The distinction between real and personal property could not be long maintained, and he thought the House would act wisely in making a virtue of necessity by reading this Bill a second time.

MR. GOLDNEY said, that isolated cases of hardship must occur in every state of society and under any law, and no doubt inconvenience sometimes arose from our law in relation to this matter. The real question was the general expediency of the existing law. As to the Bill, there had been many proposals for altering the law, but this Bill appeared to him the very worst of all the measures which had so often been submitted to the House on this subject. He thought it would have been far better if the hon. Member for Rochdale, being a private Member, instead of bringing in a Bill for altering the law on so important a subject, had moved a Resolution stating the principle on which he desired to proceed. But remembering the advanced opinion of the hon. Member, they must look a little beyond the particular provisions of the Bill. Some political economists had vindicated the right of the owner of land to dispose of it by will as tending to the public good, on the ground that the owner of such property would have a stronger motive to take care of his land when he knew that he had the right of directing how it should descend. Others asserted the absolute right of the children to share the land of the deceased parent. But if it were once affirmed by Parliament that in the event of intestacy the land should be divided among the children, the matter would not rest there, for some philosophers had advocated that in the event of there being no child the land should lapse to the State. The Bill really tended to the adoption of the maxim of the late John Stuart Mill, which ignored more or less the right of private property in land. Then there were economical authorities who held that a man's duties did not extend beyond educating his sons and providing for them up to years of maturity; at all events, that he was under no obligations towards collateral relations, and if once Parliament affirmed the principle of this measure, it would pave the way for hereafter limiting the rights of children in cases of intestacy or ignoring the claims of collateral relatives. It had been said that the existing law in this country could be found in no civilized community. The Colony of Victoria, however, after fully considering the whole subject, had adopted the English law of descent in its integrity. In some of the American States there was a different mode of distribution upon intestacy, but it was coupled with a provision that the widow should take her share only for life, as under our law of dower, while under this Bill she would be entitled absolutely to any portion coming to her. No doubt an investment in land was by no means the most profitable a poor man could make; but, as far as his experience went, there was a strong feeling, even among persons possessing but a small amount of landed property, in favour of inheritance by the eldest son. He fully recognized a man's right to leave his property to anybody else; but the custom in favour of the eldest son was thoroughly understood in English society. The common saying was, "land which comes by heirship goes by heirship;" and persons who possessed only a cottage and two or three acres of land would rather do anything than dispossess their eldest sons. This Bill, however, would tend to break up small properties into properties still smaller; and as these small estates came into the market, they would be bought up and added to the larger estates adjoining; therefore the practical effort of the Bill would be to increase the size of estates already large, and to diminish the number of small freeholds. Again, it was a great objection to the Bill that it left so large a question as the descent of land to rest upon the mere accident of a man dying without a will; and there might be such a case as that of a married woman having power to dispose of her land by will—would her husband allow her to make a will, which might defeat his own right of succession which would accrue if she died intestate? Again, there was the case of copyhold property, which in the absence of a will would descend according to the custom of the manor; why should that property pass in a different way from that in which ordinary freehold property passed? Then there was an enormous proportion of the land in this country which was held in trust which this Bill would not deal with at all. In all these respects, there would be one law of descent established for one portion of the land, whilst there would be another mode of descent for other portions of the land. It must further be remembered that if estates were to be split up in the event of intestacy, the burden of employing surveyors and other persons upon such occasions would create consequences which would be serious in the case of large estates, but in the case of small estates would constitute a ruinous burden. A more simple way of carrying out the principle contained in the Bill would have been simply to say that land should in future be treated as personal property. He was very much inclined to think, as other hon. Members would, that behind this Bill this principle was sought to be established—that property in land should, as much as possible, be broken up in some shape or other. He did not see the right hon. Member for Birmingham in his place; but some years ago the right hon. Gentleman took a large part in the discussion of this measure, and then thought it unfair and unjust that a man should exercise his right of disposition to benefit one child to the exclusion of another. But the right hon. Gentleman said—"I think that to force the division of property by law is just as contrary to sound principles and natural rights as to prevent its division as is done by our law." Now it had not been shown that the present state of things required to be altered, and he hoped, therefore, the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for East Sussex would be agreed to.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN believed that the probable effects of this measure had been greatly exaggerated, both by its supporters and opponents, but he should support it, because he believed that the operation of the existing law was unjust and oppressive. The Bill, in his opinion, would be of very limited operation. It would not touch the great family estates, which constituted the great bulk of the real property of the nation, nor would it touch any land disposed of by will. As to a man dying intestate in England, he had small chance of doing so, even if he desired it. He altogether protested against the suggestion of the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney) that there was something behind it. He maintained that a measure ought to be judged on its own merits. For his own part, he was opposed to the law of France with regard to the subdivision of property. In the case of real property intestacies were rarer than in that of personal property; and he did not believe that one man in a hundred of the owners of real property died intestate. But if a man died intestate the office of the law was to step in and make, as nearly as possible, the same disposition of the property as the owner, if a right-minded man, would have wished to do. Well, he would ask, was there any less obligation to provide for his children on a man who had invested his money in houses than if he had invested it in Consols, or was a man entitled to a freehold estate more free from that obligation than one who possessed a leasehold for 999 years? It was very often a toss-up whether a man died possessed of real or personal property. For instance, a farmer in his neighbourhood who had just invested all that he was able to scrape together in the purchase of a little real estate, on his return from the solicitor's office, and before he had made a will, was run away with by his horse and killed: the whole of his property went to his eldest son, and the widow and children were thrown on the parish; but if the man had been killed while going to the solicitor's office the property would have been divided among his widow and children. Not one of the three hon. Members who had made speeches against the Bill had touched the question of the justice of the case. The whole of their argument was founded on public policy. But then the divergence between the Mover of the rejection of the Bill and his Seconder was remarkable, for while the former opposed the measure on the ground that it would lead to the accumulation of estates, the latter opposed it because it would lead to their subdivision. No doubt the latter influence was the stronger of the two; but if there were these two dangers we might safely leave the one to neutralize the other. He did not believe the Bill would have any sensible effect in increasing either the subdivision or accumulation of property: but what he would say was—"Make your laws just and reasonable, and leave the accumulation and subdivision of property to take care of themselves."

MR. HENLEY said, no doubt much might be urged upon the abstract question whether one species of property should be dealt with in one way and one in another: but what he looked at was this, where parties by their own default did not make a will, how this proposed legislation would act upon those who were better off in the world and those who were less well off. He confessed he looked very much to the effect this Bill must have upon a very valuable class, the 40s. freeholders. He could not but see that this measure in the course of a very few years must annihilate them. He was very sorry for it, but he could see no other result. Take the case of a man with a cottage and garden of 40s. a-year who died intestate. By the time the administration fees were paid, perhaps a little debt on the cottage, and the legal expenses, what would be left to be divided among the family? He asked any reasonable man whether that would not amount to a confiscation of property? Who was entitled to most consideration, the man with little learning and little information, who was not likely to know the ill effects which would happen if he did not make a will, or the man who was wealthy and better informed, and was therefore better able to make a just distribution of his property? Those who knew anything about the poorer classes would agree with him that they were not in the habit of making wills, they did not like lawyers, they knew how their property went, and were content to leave it alone. He did not see why, on account of some injustice and inconvenience which might arise among those who were more able and ought to take precautions against those evils, we had a right to inflict this Bill upon that large class comprehended under the name of 40s. freeholders. They were a valuable class, who had held their estates for many generations, and who would be very loath to see those estates dealt with as this Bill would deal with them. An argument had been used as to the effect of the Bill on the distribution of property. His belief was that its effect would be precisely the reverse of what had been stated, because so little was to be made by land that those portions that were put up for sale would fall into the hands of some wealthy neighbouring proprietor. That would be the natural result, and so far from distributing property, the tendency would be to concentrate it. He would therefore be glad to support the Motion of the hon. Member for East Sussex for the rejection of the Bill.

MR. LEVESON GOWER said, he should support the Bill. He had listened to the whole of the arguments for and against the measure, and he believed the entire question lay in a nutshell. The law of France had nothing whatever to do with this question. There was not a single Member of the House more opposed to the law of France than he was; its evils, economical and social, were manifest; but he defied any one to point out that such evils would be occasioned by the proposal now under consideration. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Henley), to whose opinions he always listened with respect, was opposed to the measure on the ground that it would be injurious to the owners of small properties who did not make wills. But he (Mr. Leveson Gower) must say that every one ought to make his will, and the man who wished to divide his property among his children ought to make a will as well as the man who wished to leave it to his eldest son. If this proposed change in the law were made, the duty of making a will would be impressed on every one. He was not opposed to the custom of primogeniture. If not pushed too far, the custom was beneficial; but he held the custom to be a very different thing from the law of primogeniture. Anyone with an estate of a certain size was, in his opinion, right in leaving it to his eldest son, to educate his younger children, and give them the means of living. One of the beneficial results of that custom was to be seen in the fusion of our different classes; for he believed there was no country in Europe in which the separation of classes was less marked. But without the existence of the present law there was the natural feeling of a man to wish to increase and maintain the importance of his family; and that would induce this custom to continue in force. That was not a bad feeling unless carried too far. But the important question was, whether the present law of primogeniture did not carry that feeling too far. He believed there was in this country a notion that a man was more responsible for the welfare of his eldest son than of his other children. He was not sure that this feeling was not fostered by the present law. Where a man had colossal estates it was desirable that a man having several sons should distribute his estates, and that would be done to a larger extent than now if this law of primogeniture did not exist. With regard to younger children, he thought the feeling was in favour of equality among them, and if the law were altered a man would be led to consider their case more than at present. The case of daughters was a very cruel one. Many daughters brought up in luxury were often reduced to a position bordering on beggary; but if the law gave those children a right to a certain portion of the property of their father in case of intestacy, it would probably dispose him to consider his responsibility in regard to them. He thought the operation of this Bill would be gradual, but beneficial, so far as it went, and therefore he should support it.

Mr. ASSHETON said, that it had been argued that the existing law was a relic of feudality. He was not to be frightened by the word feudal. The greatest advantages to this country had originated in the laws that had come down to us from feudal times; and if everything that could be traced to feudality were eliminated from our system very little would be left. A fallacy pervaded the arguments of those who supported this measure. It was said that where a man possessed of personal property died intestate the law divided that property among his children, and why should not the same thing be done where the property was real estate? He saw no reason for assimilating the law of real property to that of personalty. He had known cases in which the personalty having been divided among the other children, the heir had been left comparatively a beggar. He believed this Bill, if passed, would be really inoperative, and what was the use of passing a measure which would be practically inoperative? He should vote against the second reading.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT thought the hon. Member for Clithero (Mr. Assheton) had carried his enthusiasm for primogeniture to a most extravagant extent, for he seemed to think that the heir having got the inheritance should take the personal property also. He could congratulate the constituency of Clithero for having for their Representative a Gentleman who was several hundred years behind the age, and whose opinions would have been considered barbarous even in the 12th century. The question was not one of feudalism—they had nothing to do with the cobwebs spun by the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney)—it was a question of justice between man and man. He asked the House to consider was it fair where a man died intestate, and where the whole of his property was in land, that his widow and younger children should be altogether unprovided for? He hoped and believed there were very few men in this country who by will would leave their whole property to one son, leaving the other children and the widow beggars. Such conduct would be reprobated by society. The object of this Bill was to declare that where a man possessed of real estate died intestate, the law of England should not make so wicked a disposition of his property. The present law was monstrous and unjust. If a man died intestate in regard to personalty, the law made a fair and just distribution of it; and when he died intestate possessed of real property, he did not see why the law should not make an equally fair and just distribution. The law should not interfere with the personal liberty of the individual—he should have free power to dispose of his property as he wished; but if he did not exercise the option which was given him to dispose of his estate, the law, like that of every other civilized community, should be a just law, and prevent what he said was a monstrous and wicked scandal resulting from the existing state of the law. He heartily supported the second reading of the Bill.

MR. HERSCHELL supported the Bill. He could see no reason or sound principle on which the present law could be defended. The simple question was, when a man died without a will what was a fair and equitable distribution the law should make of his property for him? In considering this question they were too apt to look at it in its personal bearings rather than to its effect on the national interests, and he said it was most unjust and most injurious that the whole real estate should, in the accident of intestacy, descend to one individual, leaving the widow and the rest of the family to destitution. As to the 40s. freeholder argument, if this law passed it would not extinguish the 40s. freeholder, who was likely to continue so long as it remained a qualification for a vote; but if it did it would be better that it should happen than that the present unjust law should continue to exist. In the law as it stood, when it first came into existence, there entered no idea of disinheriting the bulk of a man's children in favour of one. In those days the estate went to the eldest son, but it carried with it duties, burdens, and liabilities, and when those were borne by the same person there was nothing so unreasonable in it. The eldest son was then only a sort of administrator of the estate for the benefit of the family. He was only in law the proprietor. The law had been maintained, but that part of it was abolished, or had become obsolete, which prevented its working injustice. Again, the ancient law made a provision for the widow; but under the Dower Act and by the practice of conveyancers every piece of land was now conveyed in such a way as to deprive a widow of all her dowry. He had heard no broad argument against the principle of the Bill. The hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) said this Bill would facilitate the conversion of realty. That might seem a horrible and monstrous result, but it only meant that the freehold house and the freehold piece of land would be dealt with in the same way as leasehold had been dealt with for many years. There would, no doubt, be individual cases of hardship under the new law as under the old; but the broad question which they had to consider was whether this Bill proposed a just, wise, and equitable distribution of property. He regarded it as a moderate, practical, and sensible reform. It would remedy cases of injustice where a man did not make a will, and it would leave every man free to will his property as he pleased. He believed that in a few years men would recollect with astonishment that a Bill so little revolutionary had been introduced into Parliament so many times in vain. He thought it was just and wise in its conception, moderate in its character, and that it would prove beneficial in its operation.

MR. GREENE said, that as soon as he saw the names on the back of the Bill he made up his mind which way he should vote. It was a very small Bill, but it had some very large names on its back. The Bill proposed a revolution in the laws and habits of this country which the Liberal Party had not urged when they were in power. That suggested the probability that the object of it really was to unite the Liberal Party; but he was not afraid of that consummation at present, and therefore he was not much afraid of the Bill passing. The law had the effect of holding families together and making our country what it is; and a stronger case must be made out for such a revolution as was now proposed.

MR. HOPWOOD said, the argument just used was such as always came from old grain Conservatives when reforms were proposed. England was "what it is" because of reforms which such Conservatives first opposed and then accepted. He repudiated the terrorist ideas of the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney), who had attributed views to the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Potter) which he did not hold. The proposal of the Bill was small in itself, and in point of justice it was unanswerable.

Mr. HARDCASTLE said, the question was not whether any change was desirable, but whether we should make the change specified in the Bill, and he desired to look at the probable effect of the Bill on the smaller properties. There were two kinds of small landowners—yeomen or “statesmen” who cultivated their fields with their own hands, and men with ample means, an increasing class, who owned good, often large, houses, with more or less land, forming what were called residential estates. In regard to the first class, the division of the property would lead to great hardship. It was far better for them and for society that the estates should remain in the hands of one member of a family, and that the other members should have to seek their own fortunes in trades and professions than that the old family property should be sold and the children receive a few pounds often more to their injury than benefit. Even in instances in which the money divided might be more considerable, the members of a family would still desire that the ancestral home should remain in the hands of one of them, as the rallying-point where they might meet occasionally, renew old associations, and gratify that attachment for the soil which was distinctive of the family life of this country. In regard to the second class, the distribution of the property would be the breaking up of the home, and would be felt as a family misfortune. He should oppose the second reading.

Mr. LOWE said, the solution of the question raised by the Bill depended upon the answer that would be given to another question—What were the considerations that ought to influence a man when he sat down to make a will? As the House was aware, up to the time of Henry VIII., the Legislature was of opinion that it was not right that a man should be allowed to make a will; but at that time opinions changed, and by degrees men were allowed to make their own wills. Why did the Legislature give them this power? Clearly because the State thought the power would be better exercised by individuals than by itself. If the question had been whether there should be a division or an aggregation of property, the State would have been a better judge of it than the individual; but clearly the State did not think the making of a will a matter of political economy or State policy, but thought it was one of duty, justice, honour, and obligation as between a man and his children or relatives. It must have been on that principle that the law gave freedom of testamentary disposition. But suppose a man neglected to avail himself of this power, how ought the State to exercise it for him? Clearly if a man died intestate and the State was remitted to its former power, it ought surely to exercise it on the principle it had substituted for the old one and make a just and equitable will. But how was it to decide what would be a just will? On this matter we possessed complete information. In the case of personal property, the Legislature had laid down, and the common sense and feeling of the people had accepted, the law of division when there was no will; and the State therefore having to make a man's will, had nothing to do but to apply the same principle to real property. This appeared to him to dispose of all objections against the Bill. The Bill had nothing to do with any wild theory about the distribution of property, or with curtailing the liberty of men in dealing with their own. He could not see how any Conservative object could be attained by keeping up a flagrant and manifest injustice which in principle had been condemned by the State itself. As regarded the opposition to the proposed change, there was, perhaps, no instance in which so much had been made of so little. The present law was a plain and simple injustice—and who would maintain that it was conservative that the State should continue to maintain a gross and flagrant injustice? Any one would resent it as an insult if it were suggested that he would do that which the State did when it gave real property to eldest sons and left daughters and youngest sons to starve. Nothing could be less conservative, more revolutionary, more calculated to shake the foundations of property, than this clinging to antiquated notions derived from other conditions of society which did not now commend themselves to the common sense and the feelings of mankind.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the question before the House was very narrow and simple, but it was one which ought not to be decided without serious consideration. The question was simply whether in cases of intestacy the law should deal with real property as it dealt with personal property. It was all very well to deprecate criticism of the details of the measure; but it was certainly most extraordinary that, after the consideration which ought to have been bestowed upon it as the result of former debates—and the proposal was now introduced for the fourth or fifth time—it was still in so crude a form—so little considered and so carelessly prepared, that, if a married woman possessing real property died without a will it would be handed over to her husband without any provision being made for her children. Surely such a provision as that was not consistent with the claims of justice. In nine cases out of ten it would have the effect of compelling the sale of the smallest properties. The measure came before the House in specious guise, which certainly had the air of theoretical plausibility; but the question was not whether such a measure would work with theoretical justice, but it was whether, taking a large view of the interests of the community, it would be wise, expedient, and politic to pass it, and thereby effect a sweeping and radical change. Isolated instances of hardship must not prevent us taking a comprehensive view of the operation of the law; and if so great a change were necessary, surely hon. Members who had been getting up their case for years could have adduced some evidence of a desire in the country to alter a law which had existed for centuries, and which on the whole had worked satisfactorily. No such evidence had been adduced; no speaker had hinted at any manifestation of public feeling on the question. If it were the law that in every case where a man possessing real estate died intestate it should devolve upon the oldest son to the exclusion of the widow and of the younger children, he would admit that that would be a strong argument for some change: but it was not so—according to the law every owner of landed estate had large powers of dealing with it either by settlement or will. He might settle it for the benefit of his eldest son, or he might bequeath it by will for the benefit of his widow and children. It was said that the possessors of real estate often neglected to make any disposition of their property. This was, however, seldom the case, because they valued the possession of land so highly, and treated it as so sacred a description of property, that they were in the great majority of cases careful to make a settlement or disposition of that property. Therefore, in dealing with this Bill, the House had only to consider what would happen in the very few cases in which the owners of real estate died intestate without making some disposition of their property either by settlement or will. In that event the real estate—subject to the widow's right by dower, which was too often forgotten—went to the eldest son. The question was what sort of will a man would be likely to make in regard to this kind of property. Notwithstanding what had been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for London University (Mr. Lowe), he was of opinion that in the great majority of cases where the owner of landed property died intestate he would, if he had made a will, have kept the property in the family and settled it for the benefit of his eldest son. If the proposed law had been in existence in this country, it would have had a detrimental and disastrous effect upon a class of persons who were entitled to the highest respect—namely, the small freeholders of this country. The House had been told that the ownership of the land was the luxury of the rich; and no doubt they possessed the greater proportion of the land of this country; but many of those who were not rich possessed as keen and eager a desire to acquire a portion of land as was found in the breasts of the rich. When a man of this class had bought or inherited a well-timbered estate, with perhaps a sparkling trout stream and other advantages, he was most reluctant to part with it, and he usually desired, of all things in the world, to keep those few acres in his family. This was, he knew, the case in those parts of England with which he was acquainted—in Cumberland, Westmoreland, and North Lancashire—which swarmed with “statesmen,” as they were called, the owners of a small freehold property which had been in the family from generation to generation. What was the result? These

in consequence of the property possessed. They might devise this erty and settle it, but it was kept in family by exercising this right the law from generation to genera-

Was this so hard? Did it not happen that the small freehold ietor did devise his property to his t son, charging it very highly for enefit of his widow and younger ren, or leaving his personal proto his widow and the younger bers of his family because he was ing the land to his eldest son? It ently occurred, however, that the t son died before he was of age to a will, or some other contingency t occur under which the whole of property which had been in the ssion of the family for centuries, which had been so cherished a ssion, would be of necessity brought a hammer under this Bill. Was it irable thing that the House should uch a limitation and fetter upon the rship of these small estates? There to his mind, another reason why rovisions of this Bill would not have eficial effect. Under the present f a man possessed a very consider-landed estate he was in a situation arge that property for the benefit of idow and children, or other persons had claims upon him, because the t son to whom it would come could ay there was any abstract injustice at disposition. If, however, the law, ad of giving him that property,
the property to a number of people, they were entitled to it as if it were nalty under the Statute of Dis-tions, the testator would hesitate to that disposition of his property.
pposed this Bill because he believed uld work detrimentally to the in-ts of the State, and because it d interfere with the small free-ars and practically tend to extina class as much entitled to respect y other class in the country. He sed the Bill, moreover, because it d create the greatest possible conn and difficulty, and cause a change undesirable in regard to the pub-venue. To sum up his objections, pposed the Bill because it would a sweeping and radical change in w that had existed for centuries, because no case had been made out why such a radical change should be made.

MR. POTTER said, he was quite contented with the course of the debate, and would not delay the House in coming to a decision except to say that he felt assured no long time would elapse before the Bill would be carried.

TURKEY—DECLARATION OF WAR BY SERBIA.—QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE: I wish to ask the noble Earl at the head of the Foreign Office, Whether Her Majesty's Government has received any information with regard to the rumoured declaration of war on the part of Servia?

THE EARL OF DERBY: I have not received the information that a declaration of war has actually been made, nor have I heard anything that would justify me in stating, as a matter of fact, that a declaration of war on the part of Servia is certain; but from the general tenour of the reports that have reached me I have little, if any, hope that war can be averted.

BANKRUPTCY BILL—(No. 106.)

(The Lord Chancellor)

Order for COMMITTEE discharged:—Bill withdrawn.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that in the present state of Public Business there was no chance of the Bill being discussed in the other House of Parliament this Session. In these circumstances he should not be justified in asking their Lordships to go into a Committee of the Whole House. He therefore moved that the Order for going into Committee be discharged.

Order discharged.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM rose to ask the Lord President, Why there had been no Return of lands sold by the Commissioners of Church Temporalities in Ireland, in obedience to the Order of the House of Lords on the 27th of July, 1875? and to call the attention of the House to the Report of the Commissioners of Church Temporalities in Ireland for the year 1875.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON regretted that there should have been any misunderstanding or mistake with regard to the Return for which his noble Friend moved in July last. The fact was that it was found to be scarcely possible to give the Return in the terms stated, and, if it had been possible, the expenditure of time and money would have been enormous. He therefore now proposed to his noble Friend that he should consent to the discharge of the Order of last Session, and should move for a Return of the information he desired to obtain in an amended and more practicable form.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM assented to the proposal.

Then there was Ordered to be laid before the House—

“(1.) Name of each purchaser of lands sold by the Commissioners of Church Temporalities in Ireland;

“(2.) Denomination of land sold, with names of the benefice, county, and barony;

“(3.) The purchase money in each case, distinguishing between the amount paid in cash and the amount secured by mortgage;

“(4.) The date of each sale;

“(5.) The amount of rent formerly paid for each holding sold;

GAS LIGHT AND COKE COMPANY— SOUTH METROPOLITAN GAS COMPANY.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN asked for a statement of the capital of the Gaslight and Coke Company and of the South Metropolitan Gas Company, distinguishing the moneys authorized to be raised in the form of shares from the moneys authorized to be raised by loan, and showing also the amount which had been up to the present time raised in the form of shares and of loan respectively; and for a statement of the rate per 1,000 cubic feet charged by each company in the years 1859, 1861, 1869, 1875, and 1876.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that the whole of the information sought by the noble Earl was contained in the accounts of each Metropolitan Gas Company, which were annually laid before Parliament under the Act of 1868. The Return should therefore be confined to the years 1859 and 1861. The accounts for the year 1875 were now in the hands of the printer, and would be laid before Parliament immediately on being received.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN expressed a hope that the Returns would be laid before their Lordships before the second reading of the Gas Light and Coke Company's Bill.

ST. STEPHEN'S GREEN, DUBLIN.

QUESTION.

MR. M. BROOKS asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, If it is true that the Government undertook to recommend to Parliament to grant an annual sum for the maintenance of St. Stephen's Green, Dublin, as a people's park; whether they have communicated to the Lord Mayor and Corporation of the said city the conditions upon which the Government would adopt such a course (if its adoption was to be conditional); and, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House Copies of all Correspondence and documents relating to this subject?

MR. W. H. SMITH: It is true that the Government undertook to recommend to Parliament the grant of an annual sum for the maintenance of St. Stephen's Green, Dublin, as a people's park. They did so under the following circumstances:—Early last spring the Colleague of the hon. Member (Sir Arthur Guinness) entered into negotiations with the Commissioners of the Green and the Town Council, which resulted in the very handsome offer on his part to pay off a debenture debt of about £2,200 on the Green, and expend £3,000 (afterwards increased to £5,000) on improvements, provided the Commissioners would surrender their exclusive rights in favour of the public. The Corporation, on its part, by a resolution of the 12th of May, agreed to forego the yearly rent of £276 which it is entitled to receive from the Commissioners; and, further, to contribute a moiety of the yearly expense of maintaining the grounds as a park, provided such moiety should not exceed £600 per annum. Thereupon the Government undertook to place the Green under the charge of the Board of Works, and to ask Parliament to vote annually the remaining moiety of the cost of maintenance. A Bill has been prepared to give effect to this arrangement; but I regret to say that I now learn that the Town Council of Dublin are desirous of receding from their share in the agreement, and in that case I fear that the people of that city will be deprived of a much-needed improvement offered them by the liberality of their senior Member. I apprehend that there will be no objection to produce the correspondence, but I should like to examine it first.

POOR LAW — DEPORTATION OF FEMALE PAUPERS.—QUESTION.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the President of the Local Government

Board, If his attention has been called to the deportation from Nottingham Union to Limerick Union of two female pauper lunatics in May of this year; if so, whether the evidence connected with their past residence in Nottingham seems to his Board to have warranted their deportation; whether it is not in accordance with the custom of the department that a female official should accompany such paupers on deportation, and whether this principle has not on this occasion been violated, the female paupers in question being accompanied on the journey from Dublin to Limerick at night by a male official only; whether a Mr. Nugent, a ratepayer of Nottingham, has not by letter complained to the Nottingham Board of Guardians that, on calling at the Nottingham Workhouse to inquire into the case, he was assaulted by one of the officials of the union; and, whether the Local Government Board has undertaken, or will undertake, an inquiry into the circumstances?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the case, and he had been in communication with the Nottingham Guardians on the subject. Yesterday he saw the Chairman of the Board and the clerk, who had come to town, and who furnished him with the depositions taken by the magistrates, and gave him other information as to the facts of the case. As far as he was able to judge, the removal of the two women seemed to him to have been entirely in accordance with the law. There was no regulation as to the necessity of a female accompanying paupers under such circumstances. They were required by law to be properly attended and accompanied. As a matter of fact, a skilled female nurse did accompany the two female paupers in question during the night passage from Holyhead to Dublin, and only during the three hours' journey from Dublin to Limerick were they left in the company of a male attendant. It was true that Mr. Nugent had complained to the Nottingham Board of Guardians that he was assaulted by the porter of the establishment; but it was understood the assault would be made the subject of an investigation before the magistrates, and until it was concluded the Guardians did not think that it was proper to interfere in the case.

NATIONAL BOARD OF EDUCATION (IRELAND)—INSPECTORS REPORTS.

QUESTION.

MR. MELDON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he would explain to the House why it is that contrary to the practice heretofore adopted, the Reports of the Head and District Inspectors of Irish National Schools are omitted from the Appendix to the Report of the National Board of Education; and whether for the future these Reports will be included; whether there is any objection to grant, as an unopposed Return, the omitted Reports; what was the cause of the Appendix to the 41st Report of the National Board of Education having been delayed more than six months; and, whether steps will be taken in future to secure the publication of the appendix within a reasonable time after the presentation of the Report?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: The annual Reports of the National Board of Education have become quite overloaded with appendices, one result being the annual production of a very large volume, at considerable public expense, containing much information not of very general interest; and another being, either that the publication of the Report itself was delayed, in order that the appendices might be published with it, or that the appendix, as in this instance, was not published until some time after the Report to which it related. Under these circumstances a Departmental Committee of Inquiry, appointed under the late Government, recommended that the Reports of the Head District Inspectors, which extended over more than 200 pages, should be presented to Parliament in future only triennially or quinquennially, instead of with each annual Report; and after some correspondence between the National Board of Education and the Government, to which is mainly due the special delay in the publication of the appendix to the 41st Report, this course was adopted for the future. If any special reason could be alleged for the publication of these Reports for this year, I would consider whether they could be given in the shape of a Return; but I have heard of none at present.

CUBA—CHINESE COOLIES.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the statements made in a Report of the Commission sent by China to ascertain the condition of Chinese Coolies in Cuba are confirmed by Her Majesty's Consuls; and, whether, in that case, Her Majesty's Government intend to remonstrate with the Spanish Government on the cruelties brought to light in this Report?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that two years and a-half ago the Chinese Government suddenly put a stop to the exportation of Coolies to Cuba, owing to reports of great cruelties having been inflicted upon the Coolies, both before they left China, during their passage, and after they arrived in Cuba. Under these circumstances, Her Majesty's Minister in China suggested to the Chinese Government that the most desirable course would be to issue a Commission and send it to Cuba to inquire into the condition of the Coolies. That Commission was sent, and it was composed of three officers—one a Chinese, one an Englishman, and the other a Frenchman—and Her Majesty's Consul at Havana was directed to give the Commission all the assistance in his power. The Commission arrived in 1874, they spent some months in Cuba, and returned to China about this time last year. They subsequently drew up a Report, and presented it to the Chinese Government. As the Report was in Chinese Sir Thomas Wade had directed it to be translated, and it had not yet reached Her Majesty's Government officially. But privately a copy did reach the Foreign Office the day before yesterday. He had read a portion of it, and he must say that he never read a more painful report in his life; indeed, the word "painful" did not express at all the intensity of his feeling on the subject. He had received a despatch a short time ago from our Consul in Havana, and, though it did not come up to the statements in the Chinese report, in many particulars it corroborated the Chinese report. The hon. Member for Chelsea asked if the Government intended to remonstrate with the Spanish Government. The Government had not taken the matter into consideration, for this reason—that the Report of the Commission had not yet been received from Sir Thomas Wade, and that the question did not affect Her Majesty's Government, but the conduct of a European Power in regard to subjects belonging to an Eastern Potentate. It was therefore no part of the duty of the Government to remonstrate; but the subject had assumed such serious magnitude that the whole thing would be taken into consideration by Her Majesty's Government when they received the Report.

METROPOLIS—INDIAN MUSEUM.

QUESTIONS.

Mr. FAWCETT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether, before any charge is thrown upon the revenues of India for the erection and maintenance of an Indian Museum in London, the House will be afforded an opportunity of considering whether it is just to make the people of India contribute to the expense of erecting and maintaining such a Museum?

Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, that at present no definite proposals were before the Secretary of State for India as to the erection and maintenance of an Indian Museum in London, and therefore the Question of the hon. Gentleman was, to a great extent, hypothetical. He might add that the Secretary of State would not give his sanction to any scheme by which the whole cost of erecting and maintaining such a Museum would be thrown on the Indian revenue. It would only be in the event of some arrangement being made by which that cost would be shared between the Imperial and Indian exchequers that the Secretary of State would sanction any disbursement on that account from the Indian revenues. In such a contingency a Vote would have to be taken in this House, and the hon. Gentleman would have full opportunity of expressing his opinion upon the whole subject.

Mr. FAWCETT wished to know whether, if the Secretary of State entered into any arrangement by which part of the cost was thrown on the Indian revenues, the House would be afforded an opportunity of discussing the expediency of that arrangement?

Lord GEORGE HAMILTON said, the procedure under which money from the Indian revenues could alone be voted was laid down in the Act of Parliament, from which the Secretary of State alone derived his powers, and he saw no reason why in this particular case there should be any departure from the practice of the past 18 years.

Mr. FAWCETT gave Notice that on the earliest opportunity he would move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is unjust to make the people of India contribute wholly or partially to the erection or maintenance of an Indian Museum in England.”

METROPOLIS—THE NATIONAL GALLERY—THE TURNER PICTURES.

QUESTION.

Lord FRANCIS HERVEY asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is not the case that a large number of pictures by J. M. W. Turner are stowed away in cases on the basement or ground floor of the National Gallery; whether these pictures were not bequeathed by the painter to the nation on condition that they should be exposed to public view; whether, practically, the public have ever enjoyed access to them; and, whether any steps will be taken now that the Gallery is enlarged to render these pictures accessible to the public?

Lord HENRY LENNOX: I presume my noble Friend alludes not to the pictures—for there are no pictures of Mr. Turner which are stowed away in the manner he speaks of—but to a certain collection of important water-colour drawings, which for some years were shown in the full light; but, at the request of Mr. Ruskin, they were framed and glazed, and placed in the position they now occupy, where they can be seen by any one who will apply to the director or secretary of the National Gallery. It is to be hoped that later on some position may be found wherein they might be shown with more facility to the public than at present, without endangering them to exposure to the full light.

ARMY MOBILISATION—THE RESERVE.

QUESTIONS.

Sir HENRY HAVELOCK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the fact that the number of men of the Army Reserve whom it is proposed to call out at the forthcoming mobilisation of the Army Corps has already been reduced from 5,800 (the number originally proposed to be called out) to less than 3,600; and, whether this has been done in consequence of difficulties raised by the employers of these men as to turning them off if so called out; and, if so, whether he will take steps to reassure those employers of labour, by notifying to them, by circular or otherwise, that the men will be called out for seven days only?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: The number of 5,800 was taken from the Quarterly Return of January last. Since then a considerable number of men have been discharged from the Reserve, while all those who have joined the Army Reserve this year have been excused from this year's training. The number also included soldiers belonging to Cavalry, Artillery, and Engineers, none of whom have been called out this year. Some exemptions have been granted also on grounds of public service. In the few instances when objections have been made by railway companies and other employers, letters have been addressed to them expressing the Secretary of State's hope that the short period of training may not be allowed to injure the men concerned; and the answers that have been received have been satisfactory.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether in the forthcoming mobilisation of the Second and Fifth Army Corps it is intended to assemble the entire strength of those corps, or of either of them, at one place before the conclusion of the mobilisation, so as to give an opportunity of ascertaining to what extent their strength in numbers and their condition as to service equipment has been brought up to what would be required in actual war?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: It is intended that the Returns of the actual strength of each Army Corps as it stands on the 17th of July shall be forwarded to headquarters. The deficiencies will also be shown. The Second Army Corps will be assembled at Aldershot on or about the 22nd of July; but the Reserve men will not then be present, as they will only be called out for seven days.

Sir Henry Havelock

INDIAN COVENANTED CIVIL SERVICE QUESTION.

MR. LOWE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, What steps the Government have taken to remedy the block of promotion now existing in the Indian Covenanted Civil Service?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, that shortly after the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman on this subject last Session a despatch was sent to India calling the attention of the Indian Government to the facts which the right hon. Gentleman then stated. The Government appointed a Select Committee to inquire into the block of promotion existing in the North-West Provinces. A very elaborate Report, containing important suggestions, was made by that Committee, and received by the India Office in April. The question was one of some difficulty, because whatever might now be done would undoubtedly form a precedent for the future, and so affect the whole promotion and retirement of the Indian Civil Service. Certain proposals had been for some time under the consideration of the Secretary of State, and had been embodied in a despatch, which was now awaiting the sanction of the Council, and he hoped that in the course of 10 days at the latest the despatch would be forwarded to India.

MR. LOWE: Has the noble Lord any objection to lay the despatch of which he spoke on the Table?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: No.

INDIA—DEBTS OF THE EX-KING OF OUDE.—QUESTION.

MR. W. MARTIN (for Mr. WANDY) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Papers relating to the debts of the ex-King of Oudh, as far as respects the claims of the heirs of the late Sufdar Ally Khan, and to the passing of Act 13 of 1868 by the Legislative Council of India; and to any decision on the claim of such heirs by the Governor General of India in Council and Secretary of State for India in Council?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, there was no objection to the production of the Papers except the expense of printing them, as they were very bulky. If the hon. and learned Gentleman who had given Notice of the Question would see him on the subject he thought he should be able to satisfy him that there was no need to publish the Papers unless he was prepared to found a practical Motion upon them.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. W. E. FORSTER wished to put a Question to the First Lord of the Treasury with regard to the course of Public Business. It was the impression of many Members that the Education Bill would be taken as the first Order of the Day on Monday, but he now observed that the Prisons Bill was put down as the first Order. It would be convenient to the House if the right hon. Gentleman could state positively whether the Elementary Education Bill would be taken on Monday next?

MR. SERJEANT SIMON wished to know what arrangement it was proposed to make with regard to the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill, which he understood was fixed for a Morning Sitting to-morrow?

MR. J. G. HUBBARD also asked when it was proposed to take the Crossed Cheques and Valuation Bills?

MR. DISRAELI: With respect to the Question of the hon. and learned Serjeant, I have to say that it is not the intention of the Government to ask for a Morning Sitting to-morrow, and I thought that that was pretty well understood. Therefore, we could not deal with the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill to-morrow. But I propose on Monday, the 10th, as the first Order of the Day, to proceed with the Education Bill, and from that time de die in diem until it is passed. I quite agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard) that the Crossed Cheques Bill and the Valuation Bill, to which he alluded, relate to subjects which are very interesting; but it is quite out of my power at present to make any arrangement with regard to them.

In reply to Mr. NEWDEGATE,

MR. DISRAELI said, it was the intention of the Government to proceed with the Prisons Bill as the first Order of the Day on Monday next.

In reply to Mr. MORGAN LLOYD,

MR. DISRAELI said, it was proposed to proceed with the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill on Tuesday, after the Public Works Loans Bill.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked whether there was the slightest chance of any of the five Scotch Bills on the Paper being brought on that night?

MR. W. H. SMITH feared there was no chance whatever of their being reached.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD ELCHO said, he wished to put a Question to the First Commissioner of Works, and as it was one in which the public took an interest, he hoped that he might be allowed a little latitude in doing so. The Question he desired to put had reference to the Volunteer Review, and related to a matter which materially affected the convenience and comfort not only of Members of Parliament, but of their families and of the public generally. As he understood, there were to be no stands, but there were to be a certain number of separate inclosures, into which Members and their families would be turned as into so many pens. It would be impossible that ladies could stand for two or three hours during the march past. He could not help thinking that it would be a great convenience if a certain number of chairs were allowed to be placed in the inclosure. Again, if people on horseback were allowed to stand behind the inclosures they would see a great deal better; and with regard to the public, although the alignment would be nearly altogether occupied by persons who held tickets, still, if they were admitted to the flanks of the alignment, he thought their convenience would be much better provided for than under the present arrangement.

LORD HENRY LENNOX: In answer to the Question of my noble Friend, I have to say that after conferring with His Royal Highness the Ranger of the Park, I am happy to be able to state that I have made arrangements whereby the whole of the front row of the inclosure, from one end to the other, shall be furnished with four rows of seats, which will enable the ladies to sit in front, and theory account for the existence of tenant-right on his Ulster property, and not on his lands elsewhere? The custom has, for many generations, prevailed throughout the Northern Province, and (roughly speaking) nowhere else; and its explanation and justification, as it seems to me, are, to a great extent at least, to be found in the peculiar circumstances and history of Ulster. The Province is now so cultivated and prosperous that it needs an effort to realize its condition some two centuries and a-half ago, when colonized chiefly by Scottish settlers under the Plantation of James I. At that time not only Leinster (as having been so long the Province of the English Pale), but also Munster was, in comparison with Ulster (as Sir John Davis tells us), "well inhabited and cultivated."

"'Munster,' he writes to Cecil, 'has three ancient and well-built cities, besides divers towns, not inferior to the better sort of market towns in England; whereas Ulster is a very desert or wilderness, the inhabitants thereof for the most part having no certain habitations in any towns or villages, and never indeed building any houses, or making any gardens or orchards.'"

"Again," he says—

"Munster was divided into shires 300 years ago—an argument that our law hath as long been current there—but on the other part Ulster hath ever been such an outlaw as that the king's writ did never run there, until within these few years it was cut into several counties by Sir John Perrott—and no justice of assize ever visited the Province before the beginning of His Majesty's reign."

So, too, Sir Arthur Chichester describes Ulster to Cecil as "inaccessible to strangers as China;" and in 1610, when the Plantation Commissioners were going down to divide the escheated counties into lots for the "adventurers," he says he fears they will be unable to endure the hardships that await them in a region "where no houses or other shelter can be had, but such tents as they may carry with them." Ulster, to quote the words of another contemporary writer, Camden, whom the right hon. Gentleman opposite has taught us all to recognize as an authority even on higher matters than the title of Ulster farmers to their tenant-right, was at that time a country "interspersed with many very large lakes, and shaded with immense forests." Why, Sir, a noble Lord who has contributed much to the literature of the Irish Land Question, tells us that according to the tradition of his family, when they settled in the County Down, a squirrel could go from one end of the estate to the other without once touching the ground. But we have further evidence bearing on this point. Even at a later date, when another series of adventurers were advancing money to the Government of the day to assist in stamping out what remained of the Rebellion of 1641, the rated value of 1,000 acres of land in each of the four Provinces of Ireland was as follows:—Leinster, £600; Munster, £450; Connaught, £300; and Ulster only £200—that is to say, nearly half a century after the plantation, land in Ulster was worth only one-third of land in Leinster, less than half as valuable as land in Munster, and not within one-third of the value even of land in Connaught. The Province then, Sir, being by far the wildest and most unreclaimed part of Ireland, the escheated counties were divided into small lots to suit adventurers of very moderate means. Putting aside the county of Londonderry, which we all know was separately treated, the maximum extent of any grant was 2,000 acres, whilst the greater number were of 1,000 or 1,500 acres, representing, at most, values of £200 or £300. Now, these small adventurers were bound by the terms of their patents to bring over settlers from England or the lowlands of Scotland, to give them land for definite estates and at fixed rents, and to see that they were properly armed and ready to attend the general "hostings" of the Province. Well, they brought the settlers over—chiefly from Scotland—and let them do the best they could with the "wilderness or desert" (to use Sir John Davis's language) on which they planted them. The patentees did not undertake, probably had not the means, to reclaim the wastes, and place their tenants in suitable farms and farm-houses. This was all done by the humbler settlers for themselves. It was they whose labour and industry gradually changed the face of Ulster; who built the farm-houses, cleared the forests, and reclaimed the wastes; making the Province now the richest and best cultivated, instead of, as once, the very poorest and wildest part of Ireland. And, Sir, recollecting this, and also bearing in mind in how many ways these settlers were identified in interests with their landlords; and further, that they were the only armed force that existed in the country, or could be relied on for protection in case of need—for hon. Members will recollect that we had no Royal Irish Constabulary or even standing Army then—it is not, I think, very difficult to see how this tenant-right arose, and grew, and finally became established throughout all Ulster, based, as it was originally, on principles of natural right and justice. It was not the result of negligence on the part of the Ulster landlords. It was not even the result of their generosity merely—though I do most cordially, aye and with pride, admit that recognizing the righteous origin of the claim, and feeling bound by it as the authoritative tradition of their Province, the Ulster landlords did, without legal compulsion, universally acknowledge it, and until of late years never thought of trying to undermine or restrict it. It was, then, Sir, no “confiscation” when the Legislature, in 1870, gave this Ulster usage of tenant-right the force of law; and it would be no more “confiscation” now if it gave the Ulster tenant all reasonable facilities for obtaining the benefit of this ancient and now legalized custom.

Next, Sir, let me refer briefly to some provisions of the second part of the Bill. I find there a clause proposing that no merely new letting of a farm shall be considered a break in the continuity of the tenant's title, so as to forfeit his right to compensation for improvements. This, I apprehend, is proposed to remedy what I am sure most hon. Members will admit is a hardship arising out of the construction put upon the Land Act. Thus, if a tenant holding by lease has erected valuable buildings, and on the expiration of the lease comes to take the farm anew, either with or without alteration of its extent, it would, I think, be only fair to assume, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that his right to payment for his buildings remains unaffected; though, on the other hand, it is equally just to provide, as my hon. and learned Friend proposes, that if the new contract of tenancy expressly negatives the right to compensation, or if it can be shown that the improvements were taken into account in settling the amount of rent, or were otherwise in substance paid for, the right to compensation shall be regarded as extinguished. Again, by another clause it is proposed that tenants evicted by title paramount shall be entitled to payment for their improvements just as if evicted by the person from whom they took the land; and this too, I think, cannot be deemed a very unreasonable suggestion. Proposals such as these proceed on the principle of better carrying out the main provisions of the Land Act, and, as such, would, I think, well deserve the attention of the House. So much, then, for the first and second parts of the Bill, which, however, I must add, contain, along with these reasonable provisions, some others of a more questionable character, and even some which, I frankly say, I do not think could be accepted by this House.

But now, Sir, turning to the rest of the Bill of my hon. and learned Friend, we find a totally new departure. Here, Sir, is no amendment of the Land Act, but a proposal that every occupying tenant of land in Ireland shall be enabled to obtain from the Chairman a declaration of tenancy which shall make him and his successors for ever absolutely irremovable from his farm, save for non-payment of a rent to be assessed from time to time by neighbouring farmers with similar interests, and, of course, similar prejudices. I know it is declared that the estate thus to be conferred on the tenant shall be a tenancy “from year to year.” But, Sir, this is only our technical jargon. We can none of us enjoy property but from year to year, aye, from day to day, or even hour to hour. By the rules alike of common law and common sense the perpetual right to the profits of the land is the fee-simple of the land. The property must be in some one; and if we were to secure the possession of the land, and the enjoyment of its profits to the tenant and his successors for ever, subject only to a rent, we should, in effect, no matter how we try to disguise it, transfer the property of the farm to him, and change the present landowner into a mere rentcharger. I may observe, too, that this Bill does not provide, as used to be suggested by my hon. and learned Friend and others in similar proposals, that persistently bad cultivation, or sub-letting, or sub-division, without the consent of the so-called landlord, shall involve a forfeiture of the holding. Take sub-letting, for instance, or sub-division. The landlord is in such cases to be permitted now to sue for damages merely; and supposing him to succeed in satisfying a probably not very willing jury that there has been such sub-letting or sub-division as he complains of, why he must just be satisfied with so much compensation as they may think fit to award him. It is, however, provided that neither letting the land in con-acre, nor for grazing or meadowing, nor even letting part of the dwelling-house, shall amount to a breach of this nominal obligation; and recollecting how sub-division commonly arises in Ireland—sons marrying, but continuing to live under their father's roof, and farming jointly with him—it is easy to see what facilities are thus provided for indefinite sub-letting and sub-division of the land. Why, Sir, the evidence given before the Committee of this House, in 1865, showed that, in the words of one of the witnesses, "the advantage taken of long leases was usually that of sub-letting, which the tenants did in spite of all the landlord could do." Take, as an example, Lord Palmerston's case. He had demised a farm of 250 acres; but when the lease expired he found it cut up into such miserable patches that there were actually 135 tenants on one townland containing 200 acres! Can we wonder that natural laws thus disregarded at last avenged themselves? or need I say that, when the year of famine came, the kindly landlord had to spend more than three years' income in keeping the wretched people alive? Well, Sir, if landlords found themselves powerless to check this perilous practice of sub-division, though forbidden by their leases—aye, and by statute too—and technically entitling them to evict the tenant, what prospect would there be under the new regime of my hon. and learned Friend, of the landlord being able, in the very smallest degree, to check this fatal tendency, the only power left him being to bring actions for damages against the tenants? Nay, Sir, why after all should he trouble himself to make the attempt? Reduced by the State to the position of a mere rent-charger, he might not unfairly ask the State, at least to guarantee his rent-charges, and let the State see after its new proprietary, and save them from the consequence of indefinite morselling of the land, if it could. But the Bill proposing practically to give to every agricultural "occupier as such" the perpetuity of his holding, it further provides that every contract that would interfere with that paramount object shall be absolutely void. Now, the result must therefore be that even the favoured occupier, who thus gets the perpetual interest, cannot, under pressure of ill-health or other necessity, nor if he dies leaving infant children, can his family make any letting of the farm (even with the rent-charger's consent) to any other person, without thereby enabling this new occupier in turn to appropriate the perpetuity of the land, and convert the last owner also into a subordinate rent-charger. Only imagine the confusion and entanglement of titles into which we should thus be inevitably plunged—not to speak of the fearful dangers to which indefinite sub-letting and sub-division of the land would again expose the country. We have, with difficulty and after much suffering, just now emerged from such a sea of troubles; and I own I have too painful a recollection of the past to be willing to join in a scheme that I believe would be calculated to reproduce the like misery. But let us realize the effect of this measure from another point of view. There are in Ireland, it is said, nearly 600,000 agricultural holdings. Of these about one-half—that is, 300,000—consist of less than 15 acres, and 120,000 of them contain less than five acres. Now, Sir, in all the proposals that were formerly made for "rooting the Irish tenant in the soil," there was always a minimum of acreage below which it was said to be unwise to go. Fifteen acres was admitted to be the lowest point, and even this to depend on the land being good. Such was the opinion expressed to Mr. Maguire's Committee in 1865 by Mr. J. B. Dillon, then a Member of this House, and the trusted champion of the Irish tenant; and I see that even my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mallow, before the Lords' Committee of 1867, when suggesting that every Irish tenant should have, not a perpetuity, but a 60 years' lease at a fair rent, excepted from his proposal the small occupiers. Now, in speaking thus I do not mean to make any dogmatic assertion upon the vexed question of large or small farms or properties. What I do object to is a law which compulsorily settles the question one way or the other. I strongly object to laws which seek to favour big estates, and I equally object to laws which would force small ones on us. What I desire is that things be left absolutely free to find their natural level, because I have no manner of doubt that thus the best solution of the question will be arrived at. Perhaps, however, I may be permitted to suggest that, at a time when very competent authorities tell us that in agriculture no success is, in the long run, possible without mechanical appliances, it would be a rather dangerous experiment to establish, by force of law, a system which, so far as it is operative, must keep the agriculture of the country entirely in the hands of those who cannot obtain help of this expensive kind; and which must, in short, practically divorce capital altogether from the cultivation of the soil. My hon. and learned Friend, in the Preamble of his Bill, refers to the existing law as a "hindrance of agriculture." Well, Sir, I will not adopt as my own the forcible language of Philocelt, a well-known Irish writer, in reference to "fixity of tenure," which, he said, would "smite Ireland as with a curse;" but I do very much fear that under the stereotyped, perhaps I might even say paralyzing system, that these proposals would fix upon us, the last state of poor Ireland, would, in respect of agriculture at least, be worse than the first.

But, Sir, there are still other ways in which we may regard this proposal. I cannot but believe that the landlords now converted into rent-chargers—with little interest in what were once their estates—would cease to live on them. They would, I presume, disappear from the country, and become absentees and loungers here and in other great cities. This, Sir, I think will hardly be deemed desirable even by the followers of my hon. and learned Friend. Absenteeism used formerly to be the bête noir of Irish politicians—and yet a measure is now calmly proposed which would tend to make every country gentleman in Ireland quit its shores, and leave his estate and its occupant-owners to shift for themselves. Sir, I believe there is no country in Europe in which a resident gentry is more to be desired than in Ireland, and for this reason also I regard these proposals of my hon. and learned Friend as unsuitable and unwise. But let us consider for a moment the justice of the measure. The landlord is to be practically expropriated, and given in return for his ownership of the land, a rent measured by arbitrators or by a jury—by arbitrators who, according to the Bill, must be practical farmers of the district, or by jurors who, as a matter of fact, will be substantially of that class—that is to say (speaking roughly), the landlords of Ireland are to get for what is now their land, whatever amount of rent the tenants of Ireland think fit to give them. But, this which, let me say, Sir, is no mere matter of detail, as my hon. and learned Friend would represent it, but is really the most important part of his scheme, the central principle of his measure, has been sufficiently criticised already, and by none more acutely than by my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon (The O'Connor Don) when he pithily asked his farming constituents how they would like to have the price of their fat cattle fixed by a committee of butchers. Again, Sir, this measure would be unjust not only to the landlords, but also, as has been pointed out already, to all other classes in Ireland that desire to take land. Consider the farm labourers. They are in number nearly equal to the farmers, and we know their very proper ambition is to become farmers themselves. Or, take again the small shopkeepers, and many others on the look out for farms. What have all these people done that they are to be debarred by law from getting what they want and are willing honestly to pay for? My hon. and learned Friend complains that "outsiders" are, in many instances, ready to bribe the landlord to evict the present tenants, offering to repay him all that may be awarded for disturbance or improvements, and to take the land themselves on higher terms. Well, supposing such cases to be common, what do they prove? Simply that there is a keen competition for farms, and this my hon. and learned Friend would seek to check by force of law! I own I thought legal attempts of this kind had long ago been wholly abandoned as alike impolitic and futile. Why should all these "outsiders" be forbidden to become farmers? Nay, is it not plain as light that in the end those who are ready to pay the highest price will get land as well as anything else. Naturam expelles furca tamen usque recurret. Things will thus adjust themselves as surely as water rises to its natural level; and the only difference will be that the increased value will have been transferred from the present landowner to his more fortunate tenant. I have not yet, Sir, heard any sufficient reason advanced for entering on this legislative enterprize, nor can I myself discern any; though I think I do see that such an attempt would be unjust to the landlords as well as other classes of the community, and would also prove a real "hindrance" not only to the agricultural but also to the general improvement of the country. But, Sir, it is needless to criticise these proposals further. Such proposals have been made before. They were made during the discussions that preceded the introduction of the Irish Land Bill in 1870. They were referred to and examined in the luminous speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich when he introduced that measure. He there showed the injustice and the impolicy of any such virtual transfer of property as must be involved in the compulsory establishment of "fixity of tenure," and for himself and the Liberal Party which he led pronounced emphatically against it. Instead of disturbing and unsettling the foundations of property, my right hon. Friend and those who acted with him carried through Parliament the Irish Land Act, the substantial effect of which I have already stated—a measure which I do not say is absolutely perfect—none of us here pretend to be infallible, or to have foreseen, much less succeeded in providing for, all the difficulties that ingenious minds, sharpened by hostility, might create to obstruct the application of the Act—but a measure which was at least honestly designed to give, and which, so far as it has been loyally accepted and fairly carried out, has, I believe, given real security to the Irish tenant. For I contend, Sir, that the capricious eviction of which we have heard so much has been almost practically stopped in Ireland by the penalties which the Land Act imposes for any such unreasonable exercise of proprietary rights. If we refer to the last Irish judicial statistics, and look at the Return of civil bill ejectments carried out to actual eviction, we shall see that putting aside—as we must do for this purpose—cases of non-payment of rent, there were in 1874 ejectments for all other causes executed by the sheriff just 453, being, according to the same authority, less than nine for every 10,000 holdings exceeding an acre in extent—that is, less than one in every 1,100 such holdings; whilst if, as we ought to do, we include in the comparison all agricultural holdings of every size, we find that the evictions in 1874 for all causes other than non-payment of rent were about one in every 1,300 holdings. But even this proportion must be further reduced. The Returns do not distinguish whether these ejectments are by landlords against tenants; or, as constantly happens, and now more than ever, by one member of the family against another, to assert his right to the farm; by the purchaser under a sheriff's sale of the tenant's now valuable interest; or by other claimants. We cannot, therefore, I think, in fairness, assume the proportion of evictions by landlords, for other causes than non-payment of rent, to be higher than one in every 2,000 holdings. Putting it in another way, and, for the reason I have mentioned, reducing the number of these evictions from the gross 453 to 300, as representing cases of landlord and tenant, we get 300 as the number in 1874 for all Ireland; and taking the number of landowners as just returned to us to be about 30,000, showing an eviction by only one landlord out of every 100 in the course of the twelvemonth. Again, I find in the same volume that there were decrees made in land claims for compensation to tenants in 222 cases, and for sums amounting in all to nearly £20,000, being an average of £87 all round. Now, I think, in the first place, we may fairly assume that as to the balance of the number of evictions, they must have been either cases not between landlord and tenant at all, or, at all events, cases in which the tenant had no just cause of complaint. For we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that, as there may be bad landlords so there may be bad tenants, whom it is the interest of the country to have replaced by better and more industrious men; and, for the rest, I own it seems to me that an average fine of £87 is such a smart duty on the transaction as to amount to a virtual prohibition of, or at least a very substantial protection against, capricious or unjust eviction. It is also, Sir, somewhat remarkable that by far the largest number of land cases arise in Ulster. Thus, they were in 1874, in that Province, 39 for every 10,000 holdings above an acre; whilst in Leinster they were only 6; in Connaught 5; and in Munster just 4 in every 10,000 of such holdings—a result which I submit would rather tend to show that the Land Act has been even a greater success in the other Provinces than in Ulster. I may add, that in dealing with these statistics I have not based any of my calculations on the figures given us in the speech of the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland, on the first day of this debate. If these are to be relied on, the results would be still more striking than those I have just stated. He says he finds that in 1875 there were in Ireland only 686 evictions altogether; of which two-thirds must be deducted for non-payment of rent, leaving only some 228 for all other causes, or about 150 by landlords—that is to say, one in every 4,000 holdings, or an eviction by one landlord out of every 200 for the year. I confess, however, Sir, that I am not satisfied that the figures with which the right hon. Baronet has been supplied are correct; and, therefore, I prefer to rest on the published statistics, which have not yet gone beyond 1874, and are, I think, sufficiently significant for our purpose. On the whole, then, with this evidence before me, proving, as it seems to me, the almost virtual cessation of capricious eviction which alone has been relied on in argument as the justification of the proposal, I must repeat that I decline to vote for the transfer of the property in the soil from the landlord to the tenants of Ireland—first, because I believe such a measure would be unjust; next, because I believe it would impede agricultural improvement, instead of promoting it; and, finally, because I believe it would in many other ways check all progress in the country. And here I would venture to remind my hon. and learned Friend, and those who think with him in this matter, whether in this House or outside, of the wise words of the Bishop of Cloyne before the Committee of 1865, when he more than once expressed his deep regret that what he called “exaggerated claims” had been put forward by some for “fixity” of tenure, as distinguished from “security;” because he believed that such claims prejudiced the case of the Irish tenantry, and prevented the redress of real grievances. But, Sir, “fixity of tenure” being now once more put forward as desirable, if not necessary, for the interests of Ireland, and my hon. and learned Friend having embodied the proposal in a Bill, enabling us more clearly to see how such a system would practically be carried out, and in some measure to realize its effects, it becomes the duty of us who differ from my hon. and learned Friend, frankly to state our views. Well, this I have endeavoured to do, and whilst I have very freely criticized his proposals as the course most respectful to one of his great abilities and experience, I venture to express a hope that I have, at the same time, done so inoffensively, and I shall now only add that if my views or arguments are mistaken or unsound, I trust they will be corrected.

However, Sir, it may be asked, Is there nothing to be done to improve the conditions of land tenure in Ireland? My answer is, Yes there is much that may, and in my opinion ought to be done, and that speedily. First, I would say, provide for the Irish tenant a suitable local Court, in which he may obtain all necessary protection for his interests, instead of having, as now, no means of relief, save by the costly process of a suit in Chancery. Pass a measure giving the like equitable jurisdiction to the Irish County Courts, as was long since done in England. Reduce the number of Chairmen if you will, but furnish each with a Registrar, or such other assistant as will really enable him to do the business that awaits him. You pay 499 County Court Registrars in England, and possibly you might afford to pay some 20 or 30 in Ireland. Again, if defects have been discovered in the Land Act of 1870, which, it will be remembered, had, like other measures, to undergo much unfriendly handling in “another place,” and some even in this House, or if professional ingenuity has since succeeded in inducing the tribunals to create obstructions to its fair operation, let all such difficulties be removed by an amending Act. Finally, instead of forging new fetters for the land, in addition to what have been provided by the wisdom of our feudal ancestors, make the land of Ireland as free as you possibly can. We have abundant capital there ready for investment in the soil. Millions lie this moment in the various banks, on deposit at low interest, which the owners would gladly lay out in purchasing the fee-simple of the land. There are, too, landowners who would be willing enough to sell, but who, owing to "the complexity, delay, and expense which at present surrounds all dealings with real property," fear to make the attempt. Such a condition of things was pronounced in Her Majesty's most gracious Speech, two years ago, to be "a disgrace" to England, and an Act has since been passed with the object of taking away the reproach. I would again ask the Government, as I did in 1874, to give us a similar measure for Ireland. Let us, too, have an Act for the registration of titles and facilitation of the transfer of land. Every condition exists in Ireland to invite such a measure. We have a land tribunal to work it, we have a cadastral survey to form its basis, and we have, as I have just said, abundance of money ready to be thus invested, and so gratify that longing which, I rejoice to say, the Irishman has, to be absolute owner of his bit of land—a sentiment which, I own, appears to me to be as natural and healthy as it is Conservative, in the best sense of the word. It is a pity to let more time pass without doing this easy and needful work. We have, within the last 25 years, passed some £50,000,000 worth of Irish land through the crucible of the Landed Estates Court. The titles thus cleared are gradually, by the mere lapse of time, becoming clouded again; and, finally, under the provisions of the Irish Church Act and Irish Land Act, we have created some 6,000 or 7,000 small fee-simple proprietors, to whom, with the present state of the law of real property, this ownership is a very doubtful boon. I would, therefore, earnestly ask the Government to give us, at least, such a measure as has been passed for England; or, if practicable, a still bolder measure—an Act to facilitate the transfer of land in Ireland from those who may be willing to sell to those who wish to buy, and, as far as may be, to free the land from all artificial fetters of every kind. Let us have measures such as those—an Amendment of the Land Act based on, and carrying out, its real principles, the establishment of efficient County Courts, and a bold measure to simplify titles and facilitate the transfer of land—and we shall then, I believe, have done nearly all that legislation can do to settle what remains of the Irish land question. And now, Sir, I have but to thank hon. Members for their kind attention, and to repeat that for the reasons already given I must vote against the second reading of this Bill.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING gave the fullest credit to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) for his efforts in passing the Irish Land Act; but the measure as the right hon. Gentleman introduced it, and as it passed the House of Commons, was not now the law, because some of the most material clauses of the Bill were eliminated from it in "another place." The present Bill was intended to give the people of Ireland the protection which the Land Act of 1870 failed to afford them. He supported its principle, but was opposed to many of its details; and he was authorized by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Butt) to state that he did not intend to stand by that part of the measure which provided for the rent being estimated in certain cases by a jury. The hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. Herbert) had strongly opposed it, and the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) had invoked even the shade of Lord Palmerston to frighten them; but the noble Lord's arguments were of such a character that he felt satisfied they carried very little weight with the House. Many deliberative Assemblies, acting under responsible Ministers, had sanctioned measures even much stronger than that which they were then discussing. What was the object of the Bill of 1870? Did not the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich say it was to stay the evil of notices to quit, and evictions which fell as fast as snow flakes? But these notices had fallen far more thickly since the passing of that Act. After the Act of 1870, when questions were raised as to compensation to the tenants in the North of Ireland, a rivalry manifested itself in both Houses of Parliament as to who should be first to amend the law. He made a proposal to amend the Act, but it was opposed by the late Liberal Government. He was now prepared to bring before the House the cases that had been described, and which would prove that some legislation was necessary to prevent the system that was now being carried out. In the Province of Munster especially there was a general movement to increase rents, and tenants who were not prepared to pay an increased rent were told that if they did not do so there was another tenant ready to take their place. He held in his hand a list of cases in which tenants who were ready to pay the highest rent were, nevertheless, turned out capriciously at the will of the landlord. Did the House think that tenants thus left open to eviction, and only getting three years' rent for disturbance instead of 15 or 20, as they would get in Ulster, were likely to be contented? Ought not the State to protect men of that description? A well-known Chairman of Quarter Session said the other day that from the number of ejectments going on there was reason to believe the Act had done more harm than good, and so it had. There were many cases of hardship which the public never heard of. He knew a case where a widow named M'Carthy was the tenant of a mountain farm which had been in the family more than 50 years. About 40 years ago she got some addition to her land, and made an excellent farm of it, dividing it between her two sons, and building a house for each upon it. She paid a rent of £70; but when the Land Act of 1870 was about to be passed, she was sent for by the landlord's agent and told she would be turned out, unless she consented to pay an increased rent of £102. After having built two houses on the land the woman and her sons were called upon to pay higher rents and a very heavy fine. As it was impossible they could do so, they availed themselves of the privilege of demanding an arbitration, and a valuer selected by the landlord fixed the rents at £64 and £52 instead of £70 each, and did not require the payment of any fine at all. The landlord then refused to be bound by the award of his own arbitrator, and served notices to quit. Could any Representative of Ireland justify conduct of that kind? Ought not the law to be amended so that acts of this kind, tyrannical, oppressive, and dishonest, might be put an end to? He had verified the statements made as to the treatment which tenants in Cork had experienced. A company was formed to buy land and distribute it among the tenants, by helping them to become the owners; but the result had been that the company sold the land to the butler, who, not content with 6 or 7 per cent for his money, had made a re-valuation and had raised the rents enormously, as was shown by these illustrations, in the cases of as many tenants—from £3 8s. to £10 5s.; from £4 7s. to £13; from £3 15s. to £10; from £20 to £32; and from £11 10s. to £31. Thus a once happy tenantry had been made miserable merely because a landowner would have an enormous interest for his money. All that was asked for was due protection from the tenant against such conduct as this. If the Bill would deprive him of any of his rights as a landlord he would not support it; but it would not take away anything which as a landlord he ought to possess. All that the Bill would take away was the power of arbitrary eviction and of demanding excessive rent. An Act was passed in 1868 which did for the ryots of India all that was now asked for the tenants of Ireland. The India Act said that no landlord should raise his rent without stating the grounds for doing so, and that the rent should not be raised to an amount out of proportion to the rents paid by the surrounding tenants. In Prince Edward Island, in 1872, notwithstanding violent opposition, a Bill was passed compelling the landowners to sell their estates, upon the award of a Commission, to the State, which desired to give them in perpetuity to the tenants. The principle of this Bill was fixity or perpetuity of tenure, which was essential to the people of Ireland, and without which there never would be peace. There ought to be a tribunal to regulate the rent and to put a stop to bad landlords endeavouring to get more from a tenant than he could extract from the land. In his own county (Cork) there were as good landlords as there were in England. He had never known of a capricious eviction on their estates, and the Bill certainly could do them no harm; but it would deter and prevent owners of a different class from inflicting the hardship and injustice and causing the misery and crime which were too often found under the present law. Of course, they all deplored the existence of agrarian crime in Ireland; but the cases he had cited, mostly from official Papers and documents, showed how these crimes were the natural outcome of a sense of oppression and injustice. Though the Bill might be defeated he believed it would, if agreed to, be most beneficial to Ireland.

MR. KAVANAGH: I will ask the indulgence of the House for a short time while I say a few words upon the subject of this Bill, and while I endeavour to put it before them in the light in which it appears to me. To do so I must ask the House to consider with me some of the remarks which the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) made when moving the second reading of it. I must ask them to consider the main provisions in it, and weighing both together—the proposals in the Bill, and the speech by which it was introduced—I will ask them to consider what may be the probable effect of such upon the minds of the ignorant and excitable portions of the Irish people. I was not present on the 29th of March when the hon. and learned Member for Limerick moved the second reading; but it will, I am sure, be in the memory of those who were that he then told the House that he had formed his opinion on this Land Question from information he had acquired while conducting the defence of the Fenian conspirators. From them he had learned that the past history was confiscation, and that there never would be peace till the Land Question was settled, which expression, interpreted by the provisions in this Bill, means till there was more confiscation. In my opinion, the hon. and learned Member could not have adopted a more appropriate preface. He referred to the history of confiscations that have passed, and he proposes now to cure them by adding another chapter of a similar kind. The introduction may be suitable and proper; but I question both the efficacy or justice of the proposed means of cure. The true reparation for confiscation consists in restoration; but to effect that cure the property confiscated must be restored to those from whom it was confiscated. The Fenian conspirators forgot to teach the hon. and learned Member that part of the chapter, and he follows their teaching truly, for he now proposes to confiscate the land of the Irish landlords, and to hand it over to the occupiers, few of whom could be proved to be the lineal descendants of the ancient owners of the soil. He proposes now to confiscate the property of men, many of whose titles are from time immemorial, and who never held by tenure of confiscation. I claim to be among that number myself, and with every respect for the hon. and learned Member's knowledge of Irish history, and notwithstanding the statement made by Lord Clare in the House of Lords, I must inform him that although I am not the descendant of any of the five or six old families of English blood, I hold my property by immemorial right. But immemorial right, prescriptive right, or any other right, human or Divine, only weigh as chaff in the minds of some when they interfere with other aims. I must now come to the proposals in the Bill itself, and I feel that I need not occupy much time in endeavouring to describe what they are. The Bill is clear in its object, and there is no chance or danger of mistaking its intent. It is divided into three parts. The first deals with the custom of Ulster tenant-right, which, I believe, means that the tenant having paid a sum of money for the possession of his farm shall be entitled to receive that back, or more if he can get it, when he leaves the farm. Now, on the presumption that the landowner originally received this price of possession, I have nothing to say to that. But I object strongly to the efforts which are being assiduously made to obtain for the Ulster tenant the right to be repaid that which he never paid, or to sell that which he never either owned or bought. And that is, as I read it, the real object of this part of the Bill. The second part deals with details, some clauses of which are only so slightly imbued with the principle of confiscation that one is inclined to wonder how they ever found their way into its pages. But in the third part we come to the real pith of the Bill. Clauses 26 to 42 provide for the conveyance, without purchase or without price, of the property of the landlord to the tenant "subject to a head rent." And Clauses 43 to 60 hand over the settlement of the amount of that head rent to a jury of tenant-farmers from the locality. The simplicity is charming. It is only necessary for a tenant to be seized with a desire to possess his landlord's property, and the Chairman of the county is to give him a certificate that he does so. He

and only feel aggrieved by the amount the head rent to which it is subject, but he may have a jury of his friends to use or abolish it. It is something empowering the consumer to regulate the price of bread and meat, depriving the butchers and the bakers of voice in the matter, although it cannot be denied that it does concern them little. I think the House will go with me when I say that I do not describe this Bill by too hard a term, when I call it a measure of confiscation. I need dwell longer on its provisions, they are so plain that those who run may see them; and I will now ask the House to go on with me while I endeavour to put before it what appears to me to be the most important bearing of the question. As I confess, with feelings of unmixed regret that I apply myself to this portion of my task—regret, not caused by any reason as to my personal interest as a landlord, which would no doubt be swept away and confiscated were this Bill ever to become law—not caused by any apprehension that let the exigencies or desires of parties be ever so imminent or threatening a proposal of this extreme nature could ever meet with the sanction or approval of a British House of Commons, and that I admit, considering measures that have been passed through this House within the last few years under such circumstances, is a false assumption. But it is nothing of that kind that causes the pain to which I have referred. It is the knowledge of the effects which wild and extravagant proposals of such a nature are likely to produce upon the minds of those men whom they are only intended to attack, and the discontent and ill-feeling the creation and incitement of which I believe, their sole aim—they are, by being thus brought forward, calculated to engender and increase. The hon. and learned Member in his speech says that no one can understand the subject who does not take into account the past history of the country. I say that no one can understand the subject who does not, not only, know, but consider the present position of those concerned, the condition of the Irish landlord as well as that of the Irish tenant. In 1800, when the Land Act was passing through this House, it was urged on behalf of the Irish tenant that he was helpless, so ignorant, so imbecile, that it was absolutely necessary for the Legislature to step in to protect him, not only against his landlord, but against himself. The Land Act passed, and he was placed in a position which no English or Scotch tenant-farmer ever dreamt of. He was then secured by law in the tenure of his holding against the capricious action of his landlord by a penalty on eviction on a prohibitory scale, graduated in proportion to the supposed helpless nature of his position. He was then secured by law in all the improvements not only which he has made, but which by presumption he can be assumed possibly to have made. I must ask is this, either on its own merits, or compared with the conditions of any tenure in the world, short of the possession of the fee-simple of the land, a weak position? Secured in his own improvements, given freely and without purchase, a certain vested interest in the land which he occupies, he now shows his helpless imbecility by clamours for the fee-simple. Having tasted blood he now, through the mouth of his advocate, cries for more, and proclaims in no uncertain tones that the possession of the land is the only price which will purchase immunity from outrage. I dismiss at once from my mind any apprehension that such an argument as is conveyed in the threat would for a moment bear any weight in this House; but I cannot dismiss from my mind the certain knowledge of the harm, the incalculable harm, that such ideas and notions will do in Ireland. The people, the majority of whom are, I regret to say, ignorant and excitable, instructed by those who lead them, have been already shown how the Fenian conspiracy achieved the Church and Land Acts. This Bill, for the purposes of agitation, embodies the proposals of those who would lead them further. Another conspiracy—a winter of agrarian outrage will show the meaning of the menace. I have now shown, to the best of my knowledge and belief, what is the legal position of the Irish tenant. I think I have proved that, protected as he is by law, his position is exceptionally more secure than that of his English or Scotch brethren. I shall now only say a few words as to what I believe his practical position to be, as that has reference to his relations with his landlord, which the law cannot touch. So far as my experience goes, and it is not a small one, I believe his position to be this, that he is regarded by the landlord as what I may term the natural occupier of the land, of the occupation of which, so long as he pays his rent—and on this point there is often great indulgence given and leniency shown—and farms his holding in a reasonably unobjectionable manner, he has no wish to deprive him. Further than this, ignoring the fact that he is secured by law in the rights to which I have alluded, it is the direct interest of the landlord to advance his tenant's interest in every way in his power—the wealthier the occupier the wealthier the owner of the land. On the plea of self-interest alone, leaving law and equity out of the question, the interests of the landlord and tenant are so identical and so bound together that he who regards the one preserves the other also—that is, as I have said, viewing the question from the point of self-interest only, assuming that the relations between landlords and tenants in Ireland are only governed by commercial principles, as hon. Members opposite would have us to believe. But I am happy to say—I am proud to assert without fear of contradiction—that there are, as there ought to be, higher principles and considerations which influence and regulate those relations. There are generations upon generations of landlords and tenants in Ireland tied by bonds of confidence and friendship more secure and more strong than law could ever forge, and I hope more true and more lasting than the assiduous efforts of agitators will ever be able to poison or destroy. I can speak from my own experience, and I am no exception to the rule. I am perhaps but a feeble type of the class to which I have the honour to belong. For 22 years I have occupied the position of an Irish landlord, and for 10 years out of that period I have been my own agent over the largest portion of my property. I have spent during those years considerably over £20,000 in helping tenants to improve their holdings, to roof their dwelling-houses and out-offices, for which I charge no interest, and during that time I have not had more than six cases of ejectment on title—that is, for other causes than non-payment of rent—and in those cases for non-payment of rent, there has seldom been less than three years' rent, with no prospect of the tenant ever being able to pay anything had I left him in his holding. This statement applies to a rental comprising over 1,200 holdings, with a small average rent of not £14 per holding. This will afford, I think, a fair answer to the assertion of the hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. Dunbar) made in the debate of 1874, on the Motion for the Second Reading of the Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill—that to relieve my property of rates I had cleared it of all the small holdings. It will, I hope, give a fair answer to the assertion of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick made in the previous portion of the debate which we have now resumed—that the Irish tenant could feel no security in his holding while his landlord retained the common rights of property. Facts are stubborn things, and it is as facts, the truth of which I am prepared to prove, that I refer to my own relations with my tenantry, and not from any wish to obtrude my personal affairs upon the notice of either this House or the public. In the majority of these cases the ancestors of these tenants lived on the same lands under my ancestors, and between them the same friendship and confidence existed which I fondly hope exists between their descendants and myself now. In days gone by their forefathers went to mine for help in trouble, for advice in difficulties, sure of a willing hand and a sympathizing ear, and now their children come to me with the same confidence, which, whatever may be my shortcomings, their kindly feeling and affection lead me to believe is not misplaced, and this is the state of things which the introduction of this Bill—the culmination, as I may call it, of this system of agitation—is meant to destroy. It has this recommendation—its aim is unmistakable—it is the effort to destroy the good feeling which I assert exists now between the Irish tenants and their landlords, and to sow broadcast discontent and distrust between those whose interests are indissolubly one. These efforts, if confined to speeches in this House, might be comparatively harmless, because the Communistic arguments upon which they are based are addressed to men of intelligence, who, no matter what may be the extent of Party feeling, can judge between right and wrong; but they have no such limit. The authors of this agitation understand their busi-

as well, and know the profitable tools in which to work, the kindred passions in which they can most easily play.

Ignorance and poverty they address themselves with specious promises that those who join in the game shall share the plunder. I am not far wrong in saying that to every chapel in the South and West of Ireland the emissaries of agitation have been sent, who, painting the landlord as the foreign aggressor, and the tenant as the lawful owner of the soil, present Petitions in favour of this for signature. I can speak again from experience, as I have been favoured by letters to my property from those messengers of peace. I know not, nor do I care to know, what their success has been—I do know is that when last I was among my people, about three weeks ago, I was received by them not as the tenant landlord, but as the welcome landlord, and as long as this mutual feeling exists between us, I care little for the efforts of our common enemy. To nearly every Union in Ireland I believe Petitions have been sent in favour of this Bill. By the Guardians of some who are capable of distinguishing the difference between meum and tuum it was rejected; but by some others, where the majority of tenant-farmers predominated, it was adopted—adopted by men who in their blind greed for the possession of property to which they had no shade of claim ignored the first principles of right and wrong, and forgot that if their wild dreams of spoliation were realized it might not be far distant when their own might come, and the labouring class having obtained a sufficient amount of political power, would covet their farms, and be at no loss to find an able learned Member to advocate their case with just as much justice as the present proposal is pressed upon us now. The landlord's property is to be confiscated and handed over to the tenants without purchase or without price, on the sole ground that the tenant covets it, and will commit outrage if he does not get it, what principle can there remain to protect any kind of property? What prospect of there ever being any kind of element or peace? The labourer, as we have said before, with equal right, if it can be called, will covet the farmer's possession, the consumer the merchant's, and so on, the requisite elements for success being the possession of sufficient political power and the absence of all just principle in pressing agitation to the proper point. I am now, I am sure the House will be glad to hear, very nearly at an end. I have shown, I hope, that the Irish tenant is legally in no weak position. I have given the House facts to prove that his relations with his landlord are not such as are described, and although I have not referred directly to the subject of evictions I have shown the House the manner in which my own property is managed, and I assert again, as I asserted before, that that is only a type of the majority. I believe most thoroughly that the large majority of Irish landlords are as averse to capricious evictions as I am, and that they possess, as they deserve, the trust and confidence of their tenantry; but I do not come here now only as the Representative of landlords. I am here also as the Representative of a large and respectable class, the tenant-farmers of the county of Carlow, who would scorn, as deeply as any of their English or Scotch brethren, unjustly to acquire the property of their landlords; and as representing them I am as ready now as I ever was, and as I hope I ever shall be while I hold that trust, to redress any grievance, to remedy any injustice in the present state of the law that presses on them. I hate speaking of myself, appearing to boast, as it were, of my own doings. But I must claim for myself that I have proved my sincerity by acts and not by words only, and this brings me to the last point upon which I shall touch. I was anxious to have the opportunity to offer these remarks, because I am forced to admit that, indirectly, I am in a way responsible for the continuance of this agitation, and for the present form which the question has assumed. In the year 1870, when the Land Act was passed through this House, I, in one respect, on one important point, severed myself from this Party, and supported the clause which placed a fine upon the landlord's free exercise of his undoubted right. I will not now go into the reasons which actuated me in taking that course, nor am I prepared to say that I now regret the line which I then adopted; but this I will say—that I am sorely and deeply disappointed at the results which it has produced. Results have proved me to have been politically will see that this is a blot which might very easily be removed in Committee. I presume that every one who has listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Kavanagh) has done so with the deepest interest, not merely because of the appropriate language in which the hon. Member expressed sentiments which are far from popular in the region where I stand, but because he is one of the best landlords in Ireland, and one of our most respected citizens. But at the outset of his speech I thought I detected a sentiment to which very few hon. Members would give their adhesion. If I understood him aright, he said he was not averse to the restoration of property which had been confiscated 300 years ago, if he could only discover the lineal descendants and heirs-at-law of those who were the victims of that ancient rapacity. I will not follow him into these dangerous speculations, and I say once for all that the promoters of this Bill have no notion of entering upon such a revolutionary undertaking in any shape or form. In the course of the debate, so far as it has yet proceeded, two classes of objections have been urged against this Bill. In the first place, my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Butt) is charged with an attempt to unsettle the Land Act of 1870, and, in the second place, with producing a bad Bill, irrespective altogether of anything that had gone before it. Now, as to the offence of being disrespectful to the Land Act, I should have thought that, in the opinion of Members opposite, that would have been no offence at all, and that nothing could have pleased them better than to see it unsettled, or even repealed. I am confident that if my hon. and learned Friend wanted to give vigour to any attack he was disposed to make upon the Irish Land Act, he could not do better than gather up the rhetorical projectiles which proceeded from the Conservative benches—especially from the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland—when that measure was under consideration six years ago. It seems to be the opinion of some Gentlemen, both inside and outside this House, that the work of those who occupy the Liberal benches is always very bad while it is in progress, but exceedingly good as soon as it is finished. If that be so, this Bill is only objectionable, because it is not yet law, and the best cure for it would be to carry it. I hope I may be permitted to say that we on this side of the House hold ourselves at liberty to reconsider and criticize, if we think fit, Acts of Parliament which owe their existence to the efforts of the Liberal Party. But in this case, as it seems to me, the charge of being disrespectful to the Land Act does not apply, for my hon. and learned Friend—and he ought to know what he is about—has defended his Bill on the ground that it does no more than work out the principles which were affirmed in the legislation of 1870; and, on my own behalf, I own that I support it because it does not unsettle the existing law, but offers to make firmer than ever the foundation on which our land economy rests. But the hon. Member for Carlow says this is out-and-out a bad Bill. How are we to know whether this is so or not? The same thing was said about the Bill of 1870, which now appears to be the end of all wisdom. I am not much concerned by the hard words of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), or of the Chief Secretary for Ireland; for some new vocabulary of dislike and horror must be invented before worse things can be said about the hon. and learned Member for Limerick now than those which were said six years ago about the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone). What does this Bill propose? It proposes to give increased security in their holdings to the farmers of Ireland, taken along with a fair revision of rents for the protection of the interests of landlords. The plan we recommend for doing this may not be a perfect plan; but it is, at all events, an effort to do a work which multitudes of intelligent men in Ireland believe necessary to be done—and among these I include the hon. Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland) who has his own little method for removing grievances—not to satisfy what the hon. Member for Carlow calls popular clamour and wild expectations, but to satisfy equity and secure contentment. A great part of the speech of the hon. Member for Carlow was taken up with florid references to the rights of property. What is the use of this? I should hope there is no man in this House so deeply sunk beneath the region of intelligence as not to know that when any encroachment is made upon the rights of property, the principal injury is always done to him who makes the encroachment, and not to him who suffers in the first instance, for time always takes reprisals for injustice and violence. We who stand here to speak for the masses of our countrymen have stood elsewhere and have fearlessly told the farmers of Ireland that if they attempted—which they have not—or if they succeeded in the attempt—which they cannot—to take anything from the landlords by unjust aggression, they would themselves be the chief losers, because they would inevitably be the victims of some future deeds of spoliation. I admit that this Bill touches some of the most difficult and delicate questions of political economy and social administration. It deals with the law of contract, and asks you to limit it; it deals with rent, and asks you to regulate it; and it deals with tenure, and asks you to secure it. Those who make these demands ought to approach the discussion of them in no spirit of levity, but under a sense of deep responsibility. As to the law of contract, the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire has asked whether it is to be a point in the new Liberal creed to interfere between landlord and tenant? It is too late to ask this question. Both Houses of Parliament have pronounced against the absolutely binding obligation of contract, and not only in the matter of land, but of ships, mines, factories, and other kinds of property, and they have so pronounced because there can be no freedom of contract where contract is not free; and anyone who now contends that every man must be eternally bound by every document to which he has been constrained to put his hand is really founding his argument upon an exploded principle of politics. It is not the freedom of contract, but the slavery of contract, which has been abolished by Act of Parliament; and the question we have now to consider is when and where to interfere, and how much protection we ought to give the weaker of two contracting parties against the injurious consequences of his own involuntary act. There are peculiarities in the case of Ireland which are not always appreciated or even thought of by Englishmen and Scotchmen. The physical condition of the country, the mode of making improvements on the land, the ideas and traditions of the people are all different. Our resources are nearly all on the surface of the ground, and, whether it be a question of wealth or of bare subsistence, the struggle for wealth or for existence turns upon the product of the soil. And this brings me face to face with the question of rent. The principal way a man has of making himself rich in Ireland is by raising the rent of his land. It is not so in England. Here we see money made by trade, manufacture, commerce, mining, or by floating of companies and mines which do not float long; and when the money is made there is a laudable ambition to invest it in land, the investor thinking that he has done very well if he gets for his investment as good a return as he would get from the public funds. But in Ireland men buy land, not to invest money, but to make money. They borrow money on the land-mortgage to trade in the land. It was stated by some one in the course of the debate that it pays better to be a tenant than a landlord in Ireland. If that be the case in the South, I can assure the House that it is not the case in the North. With us in the North, fortunes are increased and repaired by speculating in land alone. There is an estate in the county of Derry, which was sold within the last four or five years, and it is paying its present owner, through a rise of rent which the previous owners would have scorned to assent to, if proposed by their agent, an amount of interest on the outlay which would bring water to the mouth of any English or Scotch proprietor. I tell the House that it pays excellently to be a landlord in the county of Londonderry. And as the landlord gets his wealth out of the land, so the tenant gets his only means of livelihood out of it. Having no other outlet for his labour or enterprize, he is tempted to give a rent for his holding which is just compatible with bare life and no more. It is well known that rents are higher in Ireland than in England. ["No, no!"] When I say well known, I mean, of course, in well-informed circles. I do not mean to say that a farmer in Ireland gives more rent than the land is worth to him, because that would be a proposition which I should find it rather hard to defend. The truth is, the land is worth more to the Irish farmer than it would be to the English farmer, because he prefers paying a rent which brings him and his family to the verge of starvation, to emigrating, or to becoming openly and avowedly what he often is really—a day-labourer; and taking these preferences into account, the land is worth to him all that he pays for it. Besides, there is sometimes the calculation—Irish Members will understand me—that the tenant may, in the last resort, take a moonlight flitting where there is no tenant-right, carry off bag and baggage, and one or two years' rent into the bargain. More grim possibilities still enter into the minds of desperate men; but courageous landlords go on laying a few shillings per acre on the rent this year, and a few shillings another year, imagining that they can just stop before they have laid the last straw on the camel's back. Sir, this Bill deals with rent, and it would be the veriest sham that was ever laid on the Table of this House if it did not. But is it the first measure that has dealt with rent? Far from it. The Land Act deals with rent, not so avowedly. Well, but how much difference is there after all! This Bill would enact a system of compulsory arbitration; but then the Judges of the Land Courts have already almost compelled the litigating parties to submit to arbitration in disputes about rent. We ask Parliament to do what the Judges already may do. As to the rent-jury provided by the Bill, that is only a menace in reserve to compel the parties to submit to the arbitration; and as I do not believe it would ever in practice be called into requisition, I would ask my hon. and learned Friend to cut it out and hand it as a peace-offering to the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire. I have said that the law as it now stands interferes for the settlement of rent. I shall give proof of this assertion. [The hon. Member then referred in detail to a land case which came before Chief Justice Morris, in which the Chief Justice refused to sanction a rise of rent which was attempted by an agent. The agent having refused his consent to the rent proposed by the Judge, heavy damages, by way of compensation, were awarded on the spot.] I quote the decision of Lord Chief Justice Morris, not only because he is an able and fearless Judge, but because the defeated party could not possibly suspect him of a bias towards either the Land Act or the tenants on account of his political antecedents. That is the law as we now have it, and if we could always make sure of having as good law as that, we might not think it so necessary to come once more to the Legislature. What we now ask is a system of skilled arbitration, so that questions of rent may be taken out of the hands of the Judges and placed in the hands of carefully-selected men, who, in addition to high character for impartiality, will also possess a practical knowledge of the subject on which they are called upon to give their decision. The legislation of 1870 has made the position much better for some tenants, but it has not conferred material advantages on others. Previous to 1870—and I now speak of Ulster, with which I am best acquainted—it was quite the exception to find a harsh, or, as the country people called him, a driving landlord. The most of them, indeed, were lively and energetic at election times. Their predecessors in title had got the worst of it in the conflicts with their tenantry in the last century, and they had become tolerant of the custom of tenant-right which prevailed over the Province. And here I must help to correct and remove a delusion which appears to have settled down on the benches behind the Ministry. It has been said several times by the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) that the Ulster custom was due for its origin to the generosity of the landlords. My right hon. and learned Colleague (Mr. Law) has effectually dealt with this strange misconception; but I must add one or two words to his. No, Sir, the tenantry of Ulster fought bitterly for the preservation of their rights, and it was only when the landlords of Down, Antrim, and Donegal had their counties on the verge of a civil war that they desisted from their attempts to abolish that ancient tenant-right which the people still enjoy, and for the safety of which they have only the pluck of their ancestors to thank. Let us get rid, once for all, of these namby-pamby compliments to the generosity of men long since in their graves, for they only call up historical reminiscences which had far better be left to sleep under the green sward that covers the dust of the insurgents of the 18th century. As I have said, it was only here and there a bad case cropped up;

but when it did it created alarm over a whole barony or county, and justly so, for it suggested the possibilities of severity which lay hid under the then state of the law. Two or three bad landlords in the county Donegal spread consternation over the whole length and breadth of that great county, for the farmers saw that, however good their present landlords might be, a change of owners might any day land them in distress and penury. They wanted legal protection against wrong, and they partially got it. But the very law which has done immense good to the tenants of harsh landlords has not done much for the tenants of the more indulgent class of owners. Men who were willing to be generously equitable without compulsion are now disposed to stand upon their rights, and are saying—"Our tenants were not satisfied with our good-will; we shall now give them as little of it as we can;" and the consequence is that the people in many places are harassed more than ever. The Legislature has gone far enough to irritate, and whenever power is irritated the only cure for it is to disable it. Therefore, it is necessary for Parliament to complete its work, and to make the rights of landlords and tenants so hard and fast by statute that the one shall have no power whatever to encroach upon the privileges of the other. I have heard a good deal said during the last two Sessions of Parliament about the propriety of assimilating the laws between England and Ireland. I confess I never could fully enter into that view, for I am far more anxious to have laws adapted to the exigencies of each country than to have them assimilated in all. I was never more forcibly struck with the soundness of this political doctrine than in reading an able paper from the pen of the Duke of Argyll in a recent number of The Contemporary Review. The noble Duke says—

"Neither in England nor in Scotland are the persons competing for farms mere peasants struggling for the only means of living within their reach. On the contrary, they are shrewd, sagacious men of competent substance, which they are anxious to embark in this business."

Just so; but then in Ireland the persons competing for farms are very often just what the Duke of Argyll says they are not in Scotland—they are mere peasants struggling for the only means of living within their reach. They are not shrewd, sagacious men, for few of them are Scotchmen; but they are impulsive and hot-hearted Irishmen, who would pay down the last sixpence in their pocket, and let the last drop of sweat ooze from their brow, that they might be allowed to spend their days in their own country, and cultivate the piece of land which their fathers held before them. Again, the Duke says—

"30, 40, and 50 per cent of the whole rental, and this continued for many years together, has been, and still is, a not unfrequent rate of outlay on many estates. There are some, as is well known, on which for more than one generation sums greatly in excess of the whole revenue have been lavished on improvements."

I suppose it may be so in Scotland, for aught that I know to the contrary; but I can only say that Ireland in general is unacquainted with this state of things. There the tenant does whatever is done—he builds, he drains, he fences, he puts up gate-pillars, erects gates, and if a landlord were thinning his wood, it is only in the rarest instances that he would give his tenant a few larch poles to help him to erect a shed for his cattle. I do not wonder that the Duke of Argyll sums up his argument with the following candid admission:—

"It is never wise to presume that systems of tenure which have done well in one country or district can therefore at once be introduced into another where they are not indigenous."

Your Scotch and English systems of tenure are not indigenous in Ireland, and because you have transplanted them across the Channel they are fading away rapidly in our alien atmosphere to make way for another system which has its roots in the ancient history of our country. As to the part of the Bill which specially deals with tenure, I may observe that in Ulster, in the last century, nearly all the land was held under lease, and when the owner refused to renew the lease, the refusal was regarded, and justly so, as a breach of the custom of tenant-right. In truth, the right of renewal was one of the deepest veins in the heart of the Ulster custom. In proof of this, I refer the House to the speeches of the late Mr. Sharman Crawford, whose memory is revered in our Province; to the writings of the late Dr. M'Knight, of Londonderry, who has just passed away from a life of usefulness and honour; to the Report of the Devon Commission; and to the works of my hon.

and learned Friend the Member for Limerick. The lease was included in the custom, and a lease no more destroyed the tenant-right than a parenthesis destroys a book. By continuous occupancy, we in the North did not understand the absolute irremovability of the tenant; but we meant, and we do mean, that the tenant has a right to remain until the landlord has some better reason than his own whim for putting him out. I want to be candid with the House, and to keep nothing back. Now, my hon. and learned Friend aims at giving to the rest of Ireland what we claim to have in Ulster. The Bill empowers the Judge to declare the tenant to have a right of continuous occupation; but it only proposes to do this on the footing of a revision of rent. Some hon. Members profess to be alarmed at the words fixity of tenure; but we who live in Ireland can tell them that landlords—and some of them gentlemen with no redundant generosity in their nature—are beginning to consider whether it will not be for their own advantage to give their tenants perpetuity leases on a re-valuation of the rent. And whilst I myself should regard a system of perpetuity leases as the outcome of a wise and patriotic policy, I do not know anyone who proposes to hand over property from one man to another without payment; and, therefore, I am unconcerned by the remonstrances of indignant virtue which have been addressed to us by the hon. Member for Carlow. All those eloquent apostrophes to the rights of property are but the truisms of debate, and are ludicrously irrelevant. It is not a question of property, but a question of policy; and what you will have to decide sooner or later is, what is the policy you must pursue towards Ireland and the millions of an agricultural population. The division of to-night will not decide that question, for it will come up right through the crust of your hard majority, and demand for itself a hearing in the councils of prudent statesmen. If my hon. and learned Friend proposed to stereotype the present rents in perpetuity, there might be some ground for charging him with the attempt to re-construct a vast proprietary out of the ruins of the present ownership. But he proposes nothing of the kind. Security of tenure with periodical revision of rent—that is the principle of the Bill, and by that we stand. Attack that principle, and we shall have nothing to complain of in the issue you have raised; but you need not be surprised if we defend it to the last, as fair to the landlord, just to the tenant, and essential to the peace of our country.

MR. PLUNKETT said, if hon. Gentlemen opposite did not like the Act of 1870, he was sure there were numbers of Members on that side of the House who were not enamoured of it, if hon. Gentlemen opposite wished to have it repealed. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) said that he was authorized by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) to withdraw portions of the Bill; but the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. R. Smyth) said those portions were the essence of the Bill, and he insisted upon having them. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick, in introducing the Bill, said in every case where a tenant asked for virtual perpetuity, the Bill would make him pay the utmost value of the land. But in no possible case did the Bill provide that; it provided, on the contrary, that after a very short time he should pay nothing at all. That had been so conclusively shown that the hon. Member for Cork got up and withdrew that part of the Bill. The Bill not only robbed the landlord of his land, but it robbed him also of back and future rent. Suppose the Bill to become law, a tenant might refuse to pay rent; he might deliberately break every contract in his lease; the landlord would take steps to evict him, that proceeding would occupy from a year to 18 months; but at the last moment the tenant went to the clerk of the sessions and got a 6*d.* form; he served that upon the landlord or his agent, and thereupon all proceedings to obtain an eviction were stayed. But that was the mere starting-point of the tenant. For an outlay of 6*d.* he was entitled to receive the land in perpetuity; he was not made to pay the back rent which he owed. Clause 63 provided that in case of an application under this measure a tenant who owed any arrears of rent should not be liable to pay in respect of arrears more than the amount of one year's rent. The Bill provided that a tenant might have his rent assessed by his fellow-tenants. The fair test of the value of a farm would be to ascertain what would be given for it in an open market. But that was not the case which this Bill adopted. It proposed that tenant-farmers should, without personal inspection of the land, award what rent should be paid, and unless their award were impeached for fraud, it would be final. Every one knew how impossible it was to detect fraud. Whenever fences were well kept and farms were well tilled in Ireland, it would be found that the property was cultivated by the large landowners or by the large and substantial tenant-farmer who paid a high rent for his holding; while on the farm the poor tenant, holding under a long lease and at a low rent, the fences were full of gaps, the land was covered with weeds, and the hovel in which he lived was tumbling down. The hon. Member opposite had painted a moving picture of the thrifty tenant being turned out a pauper upon the road at the end of his lease. But he should like to know how it was that the thrifty man who had first received a considerable sum in compensation of his being turned out suddenly became a pauper. Under the Scotch system the land was sometimes re-valued every 19 years, and the rent of the tenant raised occasionally as much as 25 per cent without causing discontent; but if periodical re-valuation were made in Ireland with a jury of tenant-farmers to adjust the rent, depend upon it it would become lower and lower. It was a mistake to assume that the general class of the Irish tenantry were as poor as they had been stated to be. The fact was that, in many instances, they were a healthy class. Looking to the principle of this Bill he wished to know why if he lent one man money and another man land, the former was bound to repay the money, but the latter was not bound to return the land? It had been so long a custom to indulge in statements against Irish landlords and to cast imputations upon them that people had almost come to believe these allegations. He wished that every transaction between every landlord and every tenant in Ireland was fairly known to that House. All means let them prevent bad landlords from bringing discredit on the great majority of the body to which they belonged; but let not a slur, which they did not deserve, be cast on all Irish landlords. But for this Bill there was nothing to be said. It was a Bill that would bring ruin to the landlords, starve the labourers, and that was already proving dangerous to the tenants by the agitation to which it gave rise. The truth was, that this Bill was the last resource of a man who had cut himself off from the hope of gaining distinction in his own Profession. What was the Land Question? It was merely this—that the hon. and learned Member for Limerick had persuaded a certain number of the tenant-farmers in Ireland that if they were only sufficiently disaffected this Parliament might give them that to which they had not even a shadow of title. Such a measure as this sapped all notion of honour and of justice in the Irish tenant-farmers, who had rejected this Bill, not because they scorned to have a finger in such a thing, but because it did not go far enough. The hon. and learned Member had said that he hoped that Parliament would give security of tenure before the tenant was driven to retaliation. That was the hon. and learned Member's appeal, not to this House, but to the assassin. The hon. and learned Member had appealed to outrage and to murder.

MR. BUTT: Sir, I rise to order to protest against this most extraordinary statement. It is utterly false to say this.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the expressions used by the hon. Member for West Gloucestershire exceeded the ordinary limits of debate, and he called upon the hon. Member to withdraw them.

MR. PLUNKETT said, that if he had used expressions in the heat of debate which he should not have done, he had much pleasure in withdrawing them. He appealed from the hon. and learned Member for Limerick to the honour and justice of a British House of Parliament.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, before dealing with the question to which he wished more particularly to direct the attention of the House, he must protest against the article by the Duke of Argyll in The Contemporary Review, to which the hon. and learned Member (Mr. R. Smyth) had referred, being accepted as a correct picture of the state of matters in Scotland. So far as he (Mr. Barclay) was aware, there was no material difference between the practices of landlords in Scotland and in Ireland in regard to tenants' improvements; for though some landlords had expended large sums of money on their estates, this was in Scotland, as in Ireland, a rare exception. Neither was the tenure of land in Scotland materially different in principle from what it was in Ireland. If there was any difference it was in favour of the Scottish tenant, for there was no doubt that the clansmen originally held as good a tenure to their holdings as the chief of the clan; and considering how the change had been brought about, the assumption of absolute possession in the land came with bad grace from the Duke of Argyll. He did not mean to criticize the paper referred to at present, but hoped to have an opportunity of doing so when the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Bill came on for discussion. He probably should not have taken any part in this debate but for the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), when the Bill was previously under the consideration of the House. He was always much pleased when the noble Lord addressed the House on the Land Question. The noble Lord, as he (Mr. Barclay) thought, went to the root of the matter. He had constituted himself the champion of the landlords, and appealed to the principles of political economy. If the issues raised went far, it was not for him (Mr. Barclay) to cavil with the chivalry, he would not say rashness, of the noble Lord, but to take up the challenge he had thrown down. When the Bill was previously before the House, the noble Lord had described its provisions as an invasion of the rights of property in land, which, the noble Lord asserted, were as absolute and complete as any right of property whatever in anything could be, and he challenged opponents to point out any difference. He joined issue with the noble Lord, and hoped to make clear that the so-called right of property in land was a tenure of a qualified nature, and by no means unconditional, as the noble Lord asserted. There were two kinds of property, with broadly distinctive features. Every man had an absolute right of property to the labour of his hands or of his head, and in the produce thereof, or in what he received in gift from others of the produce of their labour. This right of property he did not hold by any title or charter, but from the fact of being born a freeman, and herein lay the difference between the freeman and the slave. One of the principal objects of society was to secure to the individual the possession and free use of this right of property, so far as he did not injure his neighbours. But there was another kind of property to which the right was of a very different and qualified kind. These were what might be called the gifts of Providence which were common to all—the air, sunshine, land, and all that lay under it—the natural objects by which man lived, or on which he expended his labour for his comfort or advantage. No one could with any reason say that these were gifts only to the few; but as it was impracticable for each one to have directly a share of certain of these gifts, and as one proposed that they should, they might be assigned by the State to certain individuals in exchange for certain services or payments for the general benefit. It was evident that the right of possession in this description of property could not be of an unconditional nature, but that possession was to be used not exclusively for the benefit of the individual himself, but for the general advantage. These views were not his alone. He might refer to the writings of various political economists and philosophers, but would confine himself to one quotation from Locke, who says—

“Though the earth and all inferior creatures be common to all men, yet every man hath a property in his own person: this nobody has a right to but himself. The labour of his body and the work of his hands, we may say, are properly his. Whatever then he removes out of the state that nature hath provided and left it in, he has mixed his labour with and joined to it something that is his own, and thereby makes it his property.”

According to political economy, to which the noble Lord appealed, there was thus a distinctive difference in the right of property in one's own labour or its produce, and in the so-called right of property in land. But, in fact, both according to the Constitutional law of England and to practice, however much it had of recent years been kept out of sight, the land of England was held upon the tenure indicated. Blackstone laid it down conclusively that there was no allodium—absolute property in the land of England. After the Conquest the land was held by the landlords of the lord paramount—the Sovereign—on feudal tenure, and on that tenure it was still held. The landlords were vassals

for it was not a tax, but rent land, into a fixed sum payable fixed rental, and so it continues till There is no doubt as to the history e transactions. It is written in ous Acts of Parliament, and this x, more properly rent-charge, is id, except in the cases where, by wasteful process, it was redeemed nparatively trifling payment. He t about to enter at present into the n whether Parliament ought to he old rent-charge on the new on as almost all other rates were evied ; but if the noble Lord . to raise this point, he was prepared to meet him on a fitting occasion. His object at present was to show that there was an essential difference between property in labour and the tenure of land, and if he were not able to convince the noble Lord, he thought the public would have no difficulty in forming their own judgment. Now what had happened since this rent-charge was fixed? The land had increased 20 to 30 times in value, due principally to two causes—first, to the mercantile and manufacturing prosperity of the nation; then to the labour and capital expended by the tenants in improving the land; and lastly, to a certain extent, he was willing to admit, to the expenditure of the landlords; but whether due to general prosperity, or to the exertions of the tenant, or to the landlord himself, all the increase had been appropriated by the landlord. The Bill before the House did not propose to interfere with the appropriation by the landlord of the increase in rent due to the first cause. To this the tenant laid no claim, but its object was to secure to the tenant his right of property in the increased value of his holding due to his own industry and capital. The statement might look absurd to those who had considered the assertion by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bright) before the abolition of the Corn Laws, that Free Trade would raise the rent of land; but he had no hesitation in saying that this Bill might fairly and properly be described as a measure which would tend to raise rents, to increase the value of land, and to give peace, prosperity, and stability to society in Ireland. They all knew how much the tenant-farmers in Ireland—and he believed farmers in Scotland even more—had done to improve their land even under an insecure tenure. How much more would they not do so when that tenure was secure, and the tenant believed that the holding on which he was spending his labour would be his home for life! A new value would soon be superadded by the tenant's industry on the landlord's capital, and as in the event of bad times the tenant's capital in his improvements would have to be first exhausted, the landlord's capital would be rendered more secure and of a higher value, while the general prosperity would not be without its effects in giving the landlord a reasonable claim to a fair increase of rent. He was dealing with the principle of the Bill, and did not mean to discuss its details, which were for consideration in Committee. He considered the speech of the right hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. Law) to be in favour of the Bill, because he had not objected to the principle, but confined himself to criticism of its machinery. The principle of the Bill was to give security to tenants for their improvements, and that could only be done by giving security of possession, because the greatest and most important manurial improvements of a farm, on which its fertility principally depended, could not be determined by any practical or chemical or microscopic investigation which had yet been discovered, and tenants would not invest money in permanent manures to the extent necessary to fully develop the resources of the land unless they were certain of security of possession to enable them to reap the fruits of their industry and capital. The Bill had been called revolutionary and Communistic. No one was more opposed to revolution than himself, or more anxious for steady and continuous progress based on justice and right; but what was more calculated to produce violent change than the persistent refusal to redress an injustice, after it was recognized to be an injustice by those who suffered from it and saw no hope for redress of the grievance under which they suffered? He had never seen defined what Communism fully meant. He understood, however, that one highly objectionable feature of Communism was that one individual appropriated to himself the results of the labour of others without making any return; but if the complaints which the Irish tenants made, and which he made on behalf of Scotch tenants, were well founded, he asked where did the Communism lie? Objections had been taken to the jury proposed to be appointed under the Bill to assess the rent; but if that was objectionable, he had no doubt that tenants would agree to a fixed rent to be raised in settled proportions at determined periods. That would be, or ought to be, perfectly satisfactory to the landlords, whose rights in the land it would respect, while it would at one and the same time afford security to the tenant and stimulate his industry in the improvement of the land. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) had said that this Bill would take away from the landlord all that the possession of land was valued for. He had shown that that Bill would raise the value of land by the additional security of the tenants' improvements, and tend to increase rents by the increased prosperity which would follow. What, then, did the noble Lord mean? Did landlords value the possession of land for the power it gave over the tenants? He admitted that the Bill would deprive the landlord of the power over the fate and future of his tenant which he now possessed, but which it was unjust and most inexpedient in the best interests of society that he should possess. He did not wish to deny, nor did he think it an objection to the Bill, that it would deprive the landlord of the power of expatriating his tenant, or, if not of expatriating him, at any rate of turning him out of the home of his childhood, the home with which all his associations were connected, the land which he had enriched by his industry and the expenditure of his capital. He quite admitted to the noble Lord that the Bill would have the effect of preventing arbitrary ejection; but he maintained that the power of which the landlord would be deprived was of a kind which no man in this free country and in this enlightened age ought to hold, or ought to be assisted by law to exercise over his fellow-man. That power, he thought, however consistent it might be with the ideas of the past, was one which could hardly be seriously contended for in that House at the present day. At any rate, whatever might be the opinion entertained or expressed by that House, he had no hesitation in saying that if the question was put to the country the country would return no doubtful, or hesitating, or uncertain answer. He could not conclude without offering his grateful acknowledgments to the Prime Minister for giving the opportunity for this debate. It was not for him to scrutinize the motives. The Bill would no doubt be defeated by an overwhelming majority; but the Prime Minister must know that no division in the House would put this question to silence or defeat the object of the Bill so far as founded on justice and right. He preferred, with the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), to believe that in this question at least the right hon. Gentleman had been, was, and would be a good, sound Radical; and although he himself could not venture to educate his Party on such a delicate subject as the tenure of land, he was not averse to a discussion of the subject, which could not fail to have its effect on hon. Gentlemen behind him and on the country. But whatever the fate of this Bill might be, he had no doubt that the arguments adduced would assist in drawing the public mind to the consideration of what he considered a subject of vital importance, and he had confidence that the people, when fully informed, would do justice to the cultivators of the land, and awaken to a sense of their own interest in the soil of their country.

MR. MORRIS said, that individually, and not speaking for his constituents, he much disliked the political economist coming from Scotland, and if anything were necessary to induce him to vote against the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt), it was the speech which had just been delivered by the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay). The Bill, as it appeared to him, took a very wide scope indeed. It was a measure to make the tenant farmers partners in the ownership of the soil. To that he had no objection, for the Act of 1870 had made the tenant farmers joint proprietors in the soil. He did not mean to say that there were not bad landlords in Ireland, nor did he intend to vindicate them as a class; but although the conduct of some of them might be harsh he believed that the Bill would do more harm than good. Whilst he admitted that there were oppressive and grasping landlords in Ireland, he denied most emphatically that the old landlords—the landlords whose ancestors had lived in Ireland for centuries—belonged to that class. And when he heard the philosopher who had last addressed the House, and the remarks of those who considered themselves the regenerators of Ireland, he must say that from that class had sprung the worst landlords in Ireland, and he hoped there would be no further importation either of Scotch philosophers or Scotch proprietors. There was a class of proprietors in Ireland who had for many generations lived on the most amicable terms with tenants. But he would ask whether the present Bill was likely to promote that good feeling which had so long existed between landlord and tenant. It would not compel the bad landlord to do that which was done by the good one voluntarily. Whether he was returned to Parliament at the next Election or not, he would not vote for the transferring of the rights to property from one man to another, and, as he believed that this Bill would do that, therefore he should vote against it; but if the hon. and learned Member for Limerick had brought in a Bill that would have given every farthing to the tenant for improvements and that would have increased the number of years for disturbance without just and proper cause, he would have supported it. The Bill by giving great facilities for increasing rents would lead to heartburnings, dissensions, wars—and almost civil wars—between landlords and tenants. If this Bill could inflict on the bad landlords of Ireland—who were in a minority—the greatest punishment possible on man he would have supported it; but it would be most mischievous, because the first thing done under it would be to raise rents, the landlords thinking they had no interest in the country other than to get as much money as possible out of it. He regretted the number of absentees, some of whom rarely visited their tenants, whilst others appointed trusty agents, and as one of the latter class he objected to this Bill.

THE O'CONOR DON: Whatever may be our opinion as to the merits of the Bill now before us, it would be difficult, I think, to over-estimate its importance. We are asked by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick not merely to amend or to extend the Land Act of 1870, but practically to pass another measure in its stead, and a measure involving principles of such enormous magnitude that I trust the House will pardon me if, in dealing with them, I am obliged to trespass on its attention for some time. Much as the Land Act of 1870 has done for the tenant-farmers of Ireland, in securing them against being thrown out on the world deprived of the value of the improvements they may have made, it has not worked without some counteracting disadvantages. It has had a tendency to place dealings in land more upon the footing of pure commercial transactions than heretofore, to diminish special acts of generosity on the part of landlords towards their tenants, and, in a word, to make them more exacting in all their rights. Indeed, both parties—the landlords and the tenants—know their legal rights better than before, and both are more ready to exercise them. This has naturally produced a feeling of dissatisfaction. Too much of unmingled good was expected from that Act, and its want of realization has produced a revulsion of feeling and created the opinion amongst a large portion of the tenant-farmers that permanent security in the occupation of their farms is what they must seek and use every constitutional means in their power to obtain. These, Sir, are the facts we have to look in the face, and when we recollect that nearly all the Irish Representatives owe their seats in this House to the will, and are dependent on the votes, of the tenant-farmers, I think it will be admitted that I have been guilty of no exaggeration in saying that the importance of the question cannot be over-estimated. For myself, I can most truly say that I approached the consideration of this Bill with the most anxious desire that I might be able to support it. No man in the House owes more to his constituents than I do. I asked from them a very large amount of confidence, it was freely given to me, and I feel all the more bound to prove that that confidence was not misplaced. Sincerely desirous to see an independent class of yeomanry established in Ireland, secure in the occupation of their farms, I would gladly support any measure calculated to accomplish this object, if it were founded upon principles of justice and fair play, and I would willingly vote for the second reading of a Bill, from many of the details of which I differed, if I believed that its principles were just. In dealing then, Sir, with the Bill of my hon. and learned Friend, I will try to avoid anything like a minute criticism of details. Passing over Parts 1 and 2 of the Bill which deal with the Custom of Ulster, and certain amendments of the Land Act—the utility of which I cannot discover, for if Part 3 became law Parts 1 and 2 would be wholly unnecessary—I come at once to Part 3, and here it is—I am sure my hon. Friend will agree with me—that we find the true principles of his measure. Those principles appear to me to be two-fold. First, that there should be established in Ireland compulsory fixity of tenure for all existing tenants, whether large or small, resident or non-resident, no matter what were the terms on which they entered on occupation, or whether it had been of long or short duration; and, secondly, that this continuous occupation should be held at a rent mainly determined by farmers resident in the district. Now, while ready to admit that it might be of advantage to the country that the majority of the real tillers of the soil had a secure and permanent interest in it, I am not at all prepared to extend this principle to all accidental occupiers, and especially am not prepared to extend it to the class of large non-resident farmers, who are often more wealthy and independent than their landlords, and who came into occupation on the extermination of the old residential inhabitants. The granting of perpetuity of tenure to such men, coupled with the provisions in the Bill as to the sub-letting of farms, would simply result in the revival in Ireland of one of the worst features of former days—namely, the resuscitation of the destructive system of middlemen, who would become the real owners, the present proprietors being transformed into the owners of a rent-charge. Fixity of tenure to all ancient residential occupiers is, as an abstract idea, one that commends itself to our best feelings; as a matter of fact it exists on many of the large estates in the country, and it would often be difficult, even where the owners can trace back their ownership for centuries, to discover whether the ancestors of the owners or of the occupiers had been longest in connection with the soil. The real difficulty in establishing this perpetuity by law rests in the second principle—namely, the adjustment of rent; and the moment you interfere with this compulsorily, that moment you destroy the very essence of ownership. I will say nothing, Sir, as to the tribunal selected for adjusting the rent—that has been sufficiently dealt with by other speakers—but the Bill not only provides the tribunal, but lays down a standard on which the rent is to be assessed—that standard being “the highest rent which a solvent and responsible tenant could afford to pay.” To act up to this standard the farmers, arbitrators, or juries are to take an oath of the most solemn character, and of course the whole justification of the proposal rests upon the assumption that they will conscientiously discharge the duties thrown on them impartially and without prejudice. Looking, then, at the Bill from the point of view of those who consider the tribunal a fair one, we are justified in assuming that they think the rent will be determined according to this standard. My hon. and learned Friend proposes to give to the tenant absolute perpetuity of tenure, he proposes to take from the landlord all the rights of ownership inconsistent with this perpetuity, and, in lieu of these rights and in consideration of their abandonment, he proposes to secure to the landlord the highest rent that a solvent tenant could afford to pay. I hope, Sir, I have fairly stated the proposal—now let us look at its consequences. As the greatest diversity at present exists between rents in different parts of the country, between rents on different estates in the same district, and even between rents on different holdings on the same estates, it is evident that if the Bill were put into immediate and general operation there must be a great deal of levelling up or a great deal of levelling down. All the disparities and differences as to rent must disappear and all must arrive at one dead level of uniformity. Now, Sir, I would ask any hon. Member from Ireland whether he could not, in his own neighbourhood, at once place his finger upon certain townlands, the rent of which is considerably over the average rent in the district, and yet which is a rent that has been paid for years by solvent responsible tenants, who, if they wished to leave the land and got permission to sell their interests, would be able to find many purchasers competing for those interests? Well, Sir, I would ask are all the rents in the neighbourhood to be raised up to the level of these, or are they to be reduced? If they are to be reduced, you will have to face difficulties and claims for compensation of which you have no idea, and claims which it seems to me cannot be honestly overlooked. Take, for instance, the case of an estate upon which the rents were raised some eight or ten years ago, and subsequently the estate was sold in the Landed Estates Court, and purchased on the faith of the Acts of Parliament, which guarantee purchases made in that Court. Suppose that those rents have since been most regularly paid by solvent tenants, that family settlements have been made, jointures and younger childrens' portions secured, and mortgages raised upon these lands on the strength of these rents, could you, I ask, justly upset all this, lower these rents and injure these securities, without at least granting the most ample compensation to those who, upon the faith of your Acts of Parliament, invested their money? And if these rents cannot be reduced, upon what principle can you refuse to raise all the rents in the neighbourhood to the same standard? The value to the tenant, which is the only point to be considered by the tribunal, does not in the least degree depend upon the necessities or arrangements of the landlord; and if it be just to charge the tenants, upon the ideal estate to which I have alluded, the high rents they at present pay, it would be equally just for all the surrounding landlords to claim the same. I know that my hon. and learned Friend has seen this difficulty, and he proposes to meet it in this way. He does not provide in his Bill for a general re-adjustment of rents, nor does he contemplate that all holdings will be at once subjected to its provisions. Apparently he leaves this to the discretion of the tenant. Where the tenant is satisfied as he is, he need not take advantage of the Bill, or seek a "declaration of tenancy;" and as the landlord is not to have the right of going into Court and claiming that the Bill be put into operation, my hon. and learned Friend seems to imagine that in all cases where the rents are low things may go on as they did before, and no change be made. I may say, in passing, that every principle of reciprocity and fair play seems to me to dictate the conferring on the landlords similar rights of appealing directly to the Court; but even although this be not granted, it must be evident that the landlord can, through the instrumentality of a notice to quit, compel the tenant to go to the Court. This being so, what ground have we for supposing that if a landlord's rent were low he would refrain from raising it to the very highest figure he could get? What would he gain by not adopting this course? If he could secure thereby that his estate should be free from the operation of the Act, we could perhaps understand his forbearance. But such will not be the case. The very moment such a Bill as this became law, every estate in Ireland, so far as the landlords were concerned, would be subject to it. The landlord could not sell his estate or deal with it in any way except subject to this right, and every disadvantage that the law could entail on him would be placed on him at once. A landlord with his rents at a low rate, after the passing of this Bill, would be very much in the same position as one who had promised in writing a lease for 999 years to a tenant at an increased rent but who had not executed the lease. Why should he not execute it? He must do so whenever the tenant wished, and every day he refrained from doing so merely caused him a loss of rent. The case of landlords under this Bill was even stronger than this, for not only would they lose the additional rent to which they might be entitled, not only would they lose the advantages of periodical re-valuations, but they would run a great risk of never having their rents increased at all; for in the end when the tenants did seek for the declaration of tenancy it might very fairly be urged that the rents having been allowed to remain for so long a time at the low rate this was conclusive proof that it was fair. At all events, the landlord would run a great risk of this; and why, under the circumstances, he should refrain from at once demanding his full rights, I am quite at a loss to conceive. Yet unless the great bulk of the landlords do so, the Bill, if fairly carried out, must lead to a very general and, in some cases, a very considerable raising of rents. If this were to be its consequence—and I say, if fairly carried out, it must be its consequence—then I have no hesitation in saying that the Bill would be one of the most unpopular measures which ever passed this House. But, Sir, we know that this could hardly be its result. I have no wish to say a word derogatory of the tribunals to which the hon. and learned Member would refer the question of rent; but giving them credit for the possession of all the virtues usually enjoyed by mankind, it would be contrary to human nature that a tribunal of farmers, or, indeed, any tribunal, would be able to withstand the indignation and uproar with which such a proposal as the general simultaneous raising of rents would be met, and therefore I believe the Bill could not be fairly carried out. In considering the Bill it seems to me we are placed in this dilemma, either it would give to the landlords that which it promises them—the highest available rent, in which case we should have a very general raising of rents throughout Ireland—or it would fail to do so, and then the promise is a delusion and a deceit. Probably the result would be to stereotype existing rents, as was suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay), and it is needless for me to point out that by this the chief sufferers would be the kind and indulgent landlords, who would have their low rents fixed at this rate for ever, whilst those who had previously exacted high rents would be rewarded by having those rents equally secured to them. Moreover, in the course of a very few years, the indulgence of the good landlord would have been sold away, and upon the estates where rents were lowest there would be found tenants who had paid to their predecessors, or it might be to their brothers and sisters, the full value of this comparative lowness of rent, so that the actual occupiers would not entertain on account of it the slightest feelings of thanks or gratitude to their landlords. Well, Sir, I say if this were to be the result of the Bill it would be monstrously unfair to those who least deserved this treatment, and the very demand for it holds out the strongest inducements to all landlords in Ireland to look to their rents in time, and hence we cannot wonder at the symptoms already showing themselves in this direction. Again, there is another disadvantage which this Bill would bring upon the occupiers. Let the books of any large proprietor be taken up, and I venture to say that it will be found that in allowances made to tenants in one form or another, in assistance given for making improvements in the dwellings or on the farms, in remissions of rent or advances for temporary wants, considerable sums of money are given away. Of course with the passing of such a Bill as this, all this would cease. No mere rent-charger ever does anything, or is expected to do anything, for his tenants. His whole connection with his property is to get out of it a certain sum in the year, and when he has got that all his interest and concern in it ceases. Then turning to the case of the owners of property, the change to them would be a most vital one. We all know that the very best secured rent-charge is not of equal value with absolute ownership, and upon what principle of justice can we at once change the character of a man's property without at least giving him the choice of compensation? Within the last 20 years thousands and thousands of acres have been bought and sold in the Landed Estates Court, millions of money have been invested in purchases upon the faith of Acts of Parliament, and can we upon any principle of justice take from the purchasers that which they purchased—namely, absolute ownership, and give them in place of it a mere rent-charge, without at least offering them compensation for the change? Parliament, it is true, may be supreme over the land of the country; but I submit it cannot justly give an absolute right to-day, on the strength of which large sums are invested, and then to-morrow take that right away or alter it without at least compensating those whose rights are thus interfered with. This Bill may be defended upon the ground of public policy—it may be said it is necessary to give the occupiers of the soil a property for which they never paid and to take from the present owners that which they purchased; but, if so, call the Bill by its proper name and accompany it with compensation. Moreover, if this great and radical change be necessary let it be made boldly, once and for all, and let the occupiers, who would then really be the owners, have all the rights of ownership. Do not attempt to tie up and hamper transactions in land for ever. The whole effort in other countries, where great and radical changes have been made, has been to free the land from restriction. Here in this Bill exactly the opposite course is taken. Were it to become law no one henceforward could do anything with land except subject to complicated legal restrictions, and probably a reference to a Court of Law in every case. The tenure of land, the rent of land, the very size of farms is to be regulated by Act of Parliament; and not alone is freedom of contract to be done away with in regard to the present owners and occupiers, but it is to be done away with altogether. Instead of freeing land we are asked to bind it up and hamper it with new restrictions unheard of in any other country, the chief result of which would be for the benefit of the legal Profession, whose members would probably reap a rich harvest, if, by any chance, this measure became law. Now, Sir, I trust my hon. and learned Friend will not think that I have criticized his Bill with any feeling of hostility towards the object he has in view—namely, increasing the permanency of the interest which the occupiers have in the soil of the country. I have tried, as far as I could, to confine myself to the principles of his Bill, and I have not endeavoured to produce a hostile feeling towards it by carping at details. Those principles I regard as principles of restriction, and interference by law where freedom from interference should be the rule. Principles which would reward the bad landlord, who had exterminated his tenants, by increasing the value of his property, and injure the good one by diminishing the value of his, and which, if fully carried out, might benefit one tenant in a 100, but would raise the rent upon the other 99. I am as anxious as my hon. and learned Friend to bring about a lasting settlement of the Land Question; but I think more effectual aid will be given towards the accomplishment of this object by fully and fairly canvassing the merits and demerits of proposals laid before us than by silent, grudging, I might almost say—in my own case could certainly say—servile acceptance of any scheme which might commend itself to popular favour. I have always thought that we were here to do something more than record our votes in favour of proposals that might be approved by our constituents. There is a thinking and an unthinking approbation, and it is our duty to try and assist in bringing out the former. It would be very easy for me to invent an excuse or to give a plausible reason for voting for the second reading of this Bill. To the Bill in its present shape I could not give an assent; but it might be said it can be altered in Committee, and in voting for the second reading you only pledge yourself to the agreeably vague proposition that something ought to be done. Sir, we all know that the Bill will not go into Committee—we all know perfectly well that it will never pass a second reading; perhaps some votes will be given for it, for this very reason; but, at all events, this is the only vote on it which we can get the possibility of recording. Under these circumstances, no matter how conciliatory my

hon. Friends the Members for Cork and Londonderry Counties may be in promising to secure the withdrawal in Committee of almost every essential detail, yet the only fact officially recorded in the proceedings of this House will be, that every man who votes for the second reading will have voted for a measure transferring to the present accidental occupiers of the soil, part ownership in the same, without any provision for compensating the present owner, and for establishing by compulsory valuation the price to be paid for the hire or use of a certain commodity, that valuation, in the main, being left to the decision of a tribunal selected from amongst the body of the hirers. Sir, I cannot vote for such a measure; to vote for it with a mental reservation that I was voting for something else would not be honest; to vote for it even with the publicly expressed declaration of voting for something else would not be commendable; and I have come to the conclusion that I assist the attainment of the object which the hon. and learned Gentleman has at heart more by frankly stating the objections which I entertain to his scheme than by any attempt at subterfuge or equivocation to cloak over or give a gloss to a vote which, straightforwardly and on its own merits, I could not defend. But, Sir, whilst I say this, for which I may have to pay the penalty of being misrepresented, I cannot say that on public grounds I regret that this Bill was introduced here. It is far better that the question should be discussed here than reserved for meetings in Ireland, where false and delusive hopes might be raised and fostered. The hon. and learned Gentleman told us when introducing the Bill that he placed it before the House as the demand of the tenant-farmers and that it embodied their views, views which many of them have been taught to believe to be founded in justice, and which I most distinctly say should not be met with mere denunciations and cries of confiscation and robbery. They deserve at our hands a patient and respectful consideration, and every motive of public and political policy compels us to give them, not alone this consideration, but to meet them only by fair and legitimate argument. Here, Sir, let me remark upon a statement made, I think, by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), that we might see in this Bill

one of the great dangers to be apprehended from the establishment of Home Rule. The noble Lord asked—"When such a measure as this was proposed in the Imperial Parliament, what might not be expected in an Irish one?" Sir, I say, with the clearest conviction of its correctness, that such a Bill as the present would not have a chance of passing in an Irish Parliament, and further than that, I do not believe it would ever be introduced there. If we consider what is meant by Home Rule as defined by my hon. and learned Friend, and elaborated at the Conference in Dublin, we will see that it would place all Irish legislation absolutely under the control of a Chamber composed exclusively of Irish Peers, or, in other words, of Irish landlords; and is there any one who really imagines that a Chamber so constituted would be likely to entertain, I will not say to pass, such a measure, especially when the alternative of refusal, even if it resulted in an altercation with the Irish House of Commons and a consequent dead-lock, would at the worst lead simply to the abolition of Home Rule and a return to Imperial Parliament? No, Sir, an Irish House of Peers never would pass such a Bill as this, it is contrary to common sense to suppose that they would do so; and the very knowledge of this fact, the knowledge that the mere raising of the question would lead to probable disagreement between the two Houses, would be the surest pledge that even in an Irish House of Commons this proposal would not be made. Indeed, Sir, I doubt very much myself whether even the Land Act of 1870 would have been passed by an Irish House of Peers, and I would say to my noble Friend that he has far more reason to fear the necessities and wants of English Parties than anything that could happen in an Irish Parliament. But whilst an Irish House of Peers would certainly never pass such a Bill as the one before us, they would meet the question of land tenure in a fair and conciliatory spirit and for their own sakes, if for no higher motive, would endeavour to place that question on a more satisfactory footing than it stands at present. There is no class in the community more interested in having the present state of the land laws and the results of recent legislation investigated than the landlords; and blind indeed will be to their own interests if they things to drag on unchanged as have been during the last few years. ing to my mind could be more ous to the landlords than a suc- a of little petty amendments and ions of the Land Act of 1870, , in reality, would give no satis- a or security to the occupier; and this point I am obliged somewhat er in opinion from my hon. Friends embers for Longford and London- There are principles contained in and Act which might lead, step by to the most extraordinary con- ces, and treading in this path is dangerous progress. For myself, I much prefer to look to the end we propose to reach, and if it be tablishment in Ireland of a class of iers secure in the occupation of their , to try whether this could not be ac- ished at once upon some principles ice and fair play. I believe that a deal may still be done in the direc- stimulating voluntary agreements, would lead to practical fixity of e, advantages and inducements be held out to landlords to give and facilities afforded to tenants to it. When the Land Act of 1870 before the House, I regretted that such scheme as that originated by Longfield and proposed in a ied form by the late Sir John Gray ot adopted. I do not despair of its revived in some shape or form. At ents, none are more interested in a nent than the owners of land, and arse could be more suicidal than ng this Bill with a mere negative, llowing things to drift on as they been drifting. Opposed as I am, o this Bill in principle, and ob- nable as I believe many of its s, I regard it with far less appre- on than the petty tinkering legis- which, if the subject be not red into, may very probably take ace; and if my words have any nce with hon. Gentlemen oppo- would say to them, look to this ion and look to it in time, do not ne that the mere rejection of this an settle it, or that meeting with npt the demands of the occupiers and to remove misapprehensions; this Bill if you will, but in ng it and defeating it try to ace the judgment rather than coerce the will of the tenant-farmers of Ireland.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: The op- position to the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt), which has come to-night from the right hon. and learned Member for the county Derry (Mr. Law), seems to me to be quite unjustifiable. The right hon. and learned Member for Derry traced for us the history of Ulster tenant-right, and recounted the wonderful achievements of the tenantry of that part of Ireland in reclaiming the forest and making the bare mountain side smile with abundant vegetation; but I would ask the right hon. and learned Member does he for a mo- ment suppose that the work of improve- ment, which was begun in Ulster so many years ago, would have continued down to our time, if the Ulster tenant had not been secured in the possession of his farm? Certainly not. The right hon. and learned Gentleman's speech is a sufficient answer to my question; and everything he has said in favour of Ulster tenant-right may be said with equal force in favour of fixity of tenure in the other three Provinces of Ireland. I can tell the right hon. and learned Gen- tleman that the tenantry of the West and South have not been wanting in the qualities of industry and perseverance, to which, he says, the prosperity of the Northern farmers is mainly due; but they have never yet received that pro- tection and encouragement, without which no amount of industry can bring to the tenant either contentment or pros- perity. But the impression conveyed to me by the right hon. and learned Member's speech was that there was scarcely anything in the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick that he would not be willing to accept, pro- vided only that we could manage to en- graft it on the Land Bill of 1870, so as to make that famous Whig measure the beginning and the end of all legislation on this subject. The Bill before the House has been opposed also by the hon. and gallant Member for Longford (Major O'Reilly), and the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don.) The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Smyth) disposed in one sentence of the groundless opposition of the hon. and gallant Member for Longford; but the course of the hon. Member for Roscom- mon is, I think, particularly objectionable; for, after condemning the principle of the Bill, and finding fault with almost every one of its details, the hon. Member concluded an eloquent speech without throwing any light whatever on the difficulty with which we have to deal. The hon. Member is always ready to plunge his dissecting knife into the body of every Irish Bill; but he does not appear to gain much practical knowledge from such exercises, else we should be indebted to him for some one act of practical statesmanship. Now, it would be well if the hon. Members for Longford and Roscommon put their wise heads together and framed a Bill themselves that would include all the main objects of the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, while being free from its objectionable details. If they did this, they would receive my humble support; and I should rejoice to know that they were capable of something greater than analyzing and criticizing the work of others. It has been said that some of us are not quite competent to discuss this question, because we have no land; but I should think that those who have nothing to do with land, and who are, therefore, free from the selfish considerations that might naturally influence both landlords and tenants, are just the very people who ought to be able to take an impartial view of the question. When a discussion arose last Session on a kindred subject, the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Clive), after recounting his own services to his Irish tenantry, wanted to know whether I had done anything to root the Irish tenants in the soil. Well, I was not in the House at the time the hon. Member addressed this question to me, and I had no opportunity of answering him. I would now simply say that if I have done nothing to root the Irish tenants in the soil, I have done nothing to root them out, and if every landlord in Ireland could say the same, our country would to-day be supporting, in comfort and happiness, more than double its present population. There can be no doubt on the mind of any one who will take the trouble to investigate the condition of Irish society, that the peace and prosperity of Ireland depend upon the settlement of the Land Question, and that the settlement of the Land Question equally depends upon guaranteeing fixity of occupation to the tenant as long as he is willing to cultivate his farm and pay his rent. I do not say that when the Land Question is settled there will be a truce to political agitation; but the social war which has raged for centuries between landlords and tenants will be superseded by social peace, founded on mutual interests, and sustained, therefore, by mutual good-will. As to political agitation, we have arrived at an age when it appears to be a necessity of every country that is in a state of progressive freedom. You cannot dispense with it in England. Why, then, should you expect us to be able to do without it in Ireland? Every great reform inscribed on the Statute Book was effected through its agency. When the masses of the people become conscious of a grievance, they do not at first call aloud for redress. They bear their wrongs in sullen silence, and nurse their resentment until it ripens into disaffection; but when the storm of agitation sweeps over them it calls forth an expression of their discontent, and then good statesmanship steps in and allays the storm by removing the oppression which was at once its justification and its cause. If the House puts this question aside as unworthy of serious consideration, it will, in effect, be telling the exterminating landlord and the midnight assassin to fight it out between themselves; but it will not effectually shelve the question. From these benches you will hear fresh protests against landlord tyranny, and from the Treasury benches, perhaps, fresh demands for more coercion. Now, the tenure of Irish land is a subject upon which successive floods of light have been thrown by the Reports of innumerable Commissions and Select Committees; and there is no subject with which the House is likely to be called upon to deal that has been so thoroughly investigated by statesmen of all Parties, and political philosophers of all schools. It is, therefore, a subject which is fully ripe for legislation; and that legislation must, I admit, be of a sweeping character, which aims at doing common justice to the 600,000 tenant-farmers who occupy the Irish soil. We boldly advocate fixity of tenure, because we are determined to be perfectly candid with the House. Anything less than fixity of tenure would be less than justice to the tenantry, because it would leave the property, which they have rested upon the land, insecure, and it would be less than justice to the country large, which is now anxiously looking forward to the increased prosperity that must ensue from the increased industry the part of the tenant which fixity of tenure alone can promote. The system land tenure which obtains in Great Britain and Ireland is anomalous in its character; but it does not affect the prosperity of the former country as it does that of the latter. Great Britain, with far greater manufacturing industry, finds ample employment in her towns for the evicted population of the fields; whereas since you destroyed all our principal manufactures, with the exception of the linen, by repressive enactments, we have had to depend on agriculture as the national industry; and hence the Land question, which excites so little agitation in England, is vital to the population of Ireland. There is one thing certain, at all events—that is, that we are not proposing an untried experiment. There is not a country in Europe that has not had to encounter this question at one time or another, and it has been dealt with, I believe, in every instance either by giving the tenantry fixity of tenure, or erecting them at once into peasant proprietors. Sometimes this result has been accomplished peacefully by the courageous statesmanship of a Stein or a Hardenberg, as in Prussia. Sometimes—as in the case of France—it has been achieved only when the oppressed peasantry, by combining their millions, elevated a social war to the dignity of a national revolution. But it is worthy of note—and the landlords of Ireland might profitably reflect on the fact—that in no case did the struggle terminate adversely to the interests of the tillers of the soil. Our method of dealing with the Irish Land question is suggested, I think, by the soundest principles of economy—by principles which are axiomatic—and it is sustained by evidences of the plainest expediency. Let us consider, for a moment, what Mr. Mill says on this subject—

“The land of Ireland, the land of any other country, belongs to the people of that country. The individuals called landowners have no right, as morality and justice, to anything but the rent or compensation for its seasonable value. It is the duty of Parliament to reform the landed tenure in Ireland. There is no necessity for depriving the landlords of one farthing of the pecuniary value of their legal rights; but justice requires that the actual cultivators should be enabled to become in Ireland what they will become in America—proprietors of the soil which they cultivate.”

Mr. Mill's position I hold to be perfectly sound; and the application of the principle he lays down can only be a question of expediency. There is no such thing as absolute property in land? How could there be under a Constitution which declares that the Queen has no absolute property in the Crown which adorns her Royal brow? Her Majesty possesses the Crown conditionally on her observance of the Constitution which is the expression of British liberty and the interests of the State. Property in land is held, conditionally, in the same manner, and whenever it conflicts with the interests of the State its tenure ought to be reformed by Parliament. The first thing we have to do in advocating a thorough reform of the landed tenure is to purge the territorial mind of the pernicious and absurd notion that any handful of the community have a right to do what they like with that which God provided for the sustenance of the whole. They have no such right. I, for one, distinctly and emphatically repudiate it. Least of all does that right belong to that handful of the Irish community, nine-tenths of whom have derived their property from robbery and confiscation. Listen to what Paley says on this point, in his Moral Philosophy—

“The introduction of property was consented to by mankind upon the expectation and condition that there should be left to every one a sufficiency for his subsistence, or the means of procuring it. And, therefore, when the partition of property is rigidly maintained against the claims of indigence and distress, it is maintained in opposition to the intention of those who made it, and of Him who is the Supreme proprietor of everything, and who has filled the earth with plenteousness for the sustentation and comfort of all whom He has sent into it.”

Acting on the principles here laid down the statesmen of Prussia, in 1807, revolutionized the whole land system of that country, and gave a fixed tenure to the agricultural class; and it is notorious that from that year may be dated the rise of Prussian power, and the development in her people of those great mental and physical qualities, which have made the soldiers of Prussia invincible on the battle-field. From the first moment that bold conception of the sweeping change entered the minds of the Prussian statessents a large share of Conservative opinion, the convenient argument that, as the price of produce increases, so must the price of land increase also. But The Standard took no note of the fact that if the farmer gets a higher price for his produce now than formerly, he has, at the same time, to pay a higher price, not only for the labour he employs on the farm, but for the coat he wears on his back, and for all the necessities and comforts of life which he is obliged to purchase. Of course, it will not be pretended that the increased price of agricultural labour is a proof of agricultural prosperity. The political economist who puts forward that opinion must be very short sighted indeed. The rate of wages is no test of prosperity in an economic sense. The only reliable test of prosperity, in my judgment, is the facility with which food, clothing, and shelter may be obtained. Now, I would like to say a word on the Land Act of 1870. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) told the Liberals of Retford that after the passing of that Act Ireland had no more grievances, that the measure of English justice had filled to overflowing. Will the right hon. Gentleman show me that the Land Act has stopped eviction? Has it prevented the landlord from exacting 100 per cent more than the valuation rent for his land? It has done neither of these things; and it has, therefore, failed to touch even the fringe of that difficulty which has contributed so much to the impoverishment of Ireland, and the expatriation of its people. The right hon. Gentleman took, however, an enlightened view of the situation in depicting the hopeless prospects of the Liberal Party, and I can give him the assurance of one Irish Representative, that he is quite right in not counting on Irish support. Speaking for myself, I can promise him that a Liberal Party ruled by Whig counsels such as his will not only have to encounter Irish neutrality, but Irish hostility as well. A Liberal Party with illiberal leaders is a "mockery, a delusion, and a snare." I would rather, ten thousand times, contend with the open foes I see on those benches before me, than accept the ignoble toleration which the right hon. Gentleman might think it prudent to extend to me, for I should feel in that case that I was standing on solid ground, not resting on a Liberal quagmire. The accursed land system of Ireland is wasting away the nation's life. It is despoiling the homes of the industrious poor, who have as good a right to life and liberty in their own land as the proudest aristocratic idler who sets his foot upon their necks, and sends them outcast over the face of the earth. I allude to what is of daily occurrence. What can be more worthy of Christian sympathy than the position of a peasant father under sentence of eviction, as he sits the last evening at his humble fireside? His children, nestling at his feet, look up at him, and behold with wonder the once cheerful face marked with the traces of sorrow. Oh! what a saddening, maddening thought for him, that this night is to be his last in the home of his fathers, beside the hearth where he first saw the light of day, and where he trusted that, by honest endeavour, he might rear his tender offspring! While fields within sight of his cabin door are running to waste for want of hands to cultivate them, political economy will proclaim the base and cowardly lie that there is no room for him in his native land. But the peasant knows and feels in the depths of his grief-torn heart that he is the victim of cruel injustice sanctioned by law. Thrust out on the roadside, he may remain to wreak vengeance on the head of the individual exterminator; but if he quits his native country rest assured he will carry with him an undying hatred of its rulers, and a resolve to join the very first movement designed to hurl them from power. The social disorders that break out in Ireland occasionally are not to be wondered at. The extraordinary patience of the Irish people under untold oppressions is what strikes impartial foreigners visiting our country with unutterable surprise. No wonder that there are occasional rebellions and perpetual conspiracies, and that you are driven to maintain your rule in Ireland by force of bayonets rather than by force of law. No wonder that John Mitchel, the most powerful genius that our country has produced in modern times, should declare, with his dying breath, that he had made no peace with England. Truly there can be no lasting peace that is not based on justice. I invite the House to lay the foundations of social peace in Ireland by doing justice

the tenant-farmers of that country, are not less worthy of legislative consideration than their taskmasters, because they have to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow.

MR. GIBSON, having listened to the remarks of the hon. Member who had sat down, would readily admit that that Bill was to be carried by the language of menace, and if the House were to be convinced by arguments founded on animosity, that hon. Gentleman had made a most cogent speech. He had spoken of civil wars that might be raised, of conspiracies that might be hatched, of revolutions that might not be far off, and of the disturbance of the social order that might break out, if such a measure as that of the hon. learned Member for Limerick (Mr. St. John) did not pass; and he also added that if that Bill was rejected another of much worse character could easily be introduced and ultimately forced on the lords of Ireland. [MR. O'CONNOR: I say a better Bill.] The hon. member might call it a better Bill, but interpreted that to mean a worse Bill in his mind. Having the good fortune to be a resident Irishman himself, he would state that the tenantry of Ireland were at present exceptionally prosperous, and the country also was prosperous. He asserted further that if Ireland were only let alone it would be thoroughly contented. But it was extremely difficult for the tenant farmers—a most respectable as well as a tolerably independent class of men—not to be a little misled by the proposal of Bills like the present one, and it was only surprising that they were not debauched by the temptations held out to them. The hon. member for Limerick had entered into a historical review of the various confiscations in Ireland; but those transactions were centuries old; and what was the use of raking them up now unless it were to lay the foundation by way of precedent for some further confiscations? When that Bill was characterized as one that would give security of tenure and fair rents to the landlords, that description was not borne out by the Bill itself, because it would destroy the landlord's tenure and make his rent absolutely insecure; while as regarded the tenants, it might render them a little doubtful whether their rents might not be raised under certain possible conditions. He should only discuss two or three of the broader features of the measure; but he must protest against the language which had been used in support of the Bill, because when it was desired to discuss the broad principles and salient sections of the measure hon. Members called them details or slips in drafting. This Bill was an attempt on the part of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick to redeem pledges given by him months ago to various constituencies in Ireland. The Bill was the work of an able lawyer and an eminent literary man, and it would be idle to say that it was not the result of thoughtful preparation. Would any man dream of asserting his right to the Ulster tenant-right custom if the third part of the Bill were carried, which would make that tenure utterly worthless? Therefore, no part of the Bill need be discussed except the third part, which the hon. and learned Member for Limerick said contained the principle of the Bill. The Act of 1870 set forth the desirability of interfering as little as possible with contract; and under Section 12 of that Bill it was stated that tenants who held farms of a certain value should be able to contract. That freedom of contract rested on the principle that it was not desirable to restrain contracts except where absolutely necessary, and yet this Bill swept away even this freedom. Suppose a grass farm had been let for 10 years at a rental of 1,000 a-year to a tenant who was bound by his contract not to make any claim under the Act of 1870; if this Bill passed he could at once serve on his landlord a claim which would put an end to the solemn contract between them; he could turn the 10 years into a perpetuity, and draw his pen through the contract which prevented him from making a claim under that Act. Take another case. Many gentlemen who did not care to cultivate a farm let it, but wished to retain the exclusive right of shooting over it. A tenant might have bound himself by the most solemn contract in the world to give the exclusive right of shooting to his landlord; but under this Bill, by serving a notice upon his landlord he could turn his tenancy into a perpetuity, and get the right of shooting for himself and his friends. Take another case. A man desirous of providing for an old retainer and friend of his family put him rent free into a small cottage and into a small farm, intending that for the short time he should live he should have it on very easy terms. That tenant might serve a notice under this Bill, and turn his tenancy at will into a perpetuity. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick shook his head at that, and he (Mr. Gibson) did not wonder at his being a little startled at the consequences of his own Bill. Every person who was entitled to claim compensation under the Land Act of 1870 would be entitled to avail himself of the provisions of this Bill. He could understand revolutionary changes suggested in the future by a vigorous thinker like his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick; but it was rather too much to ask the House to adopt clauses which would absolutely sweep away freedom of contract, not only in the future but in the past, and which placed freedom of contract outside the pale of the law altogether. Important social consequences would be the result of teaching men that they could violate a most solemn contract in this way. The necessary consequence of the Bill would be substantially to offer a premium to tenants for being dishonest. He did not like to make a charge against the hon. and learned Member that he had framed this Bill in the interests of tenant farmers because they had the majority of votes in the counties; but under his Bill the landlords would be robbed, the agricultural labourer was ignored, and the class that had the votes was given power over the property of those people who had property to take away. He did not quarrel very much as to the principle on which the hon. and learned Member would fix the rent, which his clause said should be as much as any other tenant without collusion would agree to pay. But that, if fairly and judicially applied, would lead to the raising of rents in every part of Ireland—a result which would not suit those the hon. and learned Member desired to please, and so it became necessary to add on certain sections, so contrived as to lead necessarily to the lowering of rents all over Ireland. It was obvious that the hon. and learned Member for Limerick did not intend by this measure to raise the rents all over Ireland, and it would be unfair to the good landlords to leave the rents where they were at present, because that would be giving a premium to the bad landlords who had screwed them up to the highest possible point, while it would be punishing the good landlords who had allowed their tenants to have their farms upon easy terms. It was perfectly clear from the provisions of the measure that its whole policy was to lower the rents. What was the machinery appointed to carry the Bill into effect? The scheme of arbitration so carefully put forward in the front was doomed to certain failure. Under that scheme the tenant was to name one arbitrator and the landlord was to name another, both arbitrators to be selected from among the neighbouring tenant farmers, and then the two were to agree upon a third, who was to act as umpire. But in the not improbable event of the arbitrators not agreeing in their selection of an umpire the machinery of a jury—a jury of tenant farmers—was to be put in motion, and that was the tribunal which was to determine the question finally and without appeal between the tenant farmer and the landlord. This was not a mere slip on the part of the draughtsman. This measure had been for months under the consideration of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, and, therefore, it must be taken that it was the deliberate policy of that hon. and learned Gentleman that such a tribunal was to regulate the land laws of Ireland. He asked whether that was not a monstrous measure to submit to a British House of Commons. Hon. Members opposite objected to the words “robbery and confiscation” as being too strong and as being un-Parliamentary, and therefore he would not use them, especially as he had already uttered them. After what he had said it was almost amusing to refer to the Preamble of the Bill. The hon. and learned Member had a great touch of humour in his composition, and, having prepared a measure of this description, he quietly introduced into the Preamble the statement that this Bill was intended to secure the rent to the landlord. Moreover, the direct and obvious effect of the Bill was practically to confiscate the arrears of rent. It provided that if an action of ejectment was brought against a tenant who owed two or more years of rent he might paralyse that ejectment and stay the hand of the law by giving a notice under this Bill. True it was that the Bill authorized the Chairman, if he should think fit, to award to landlord payment of the arrears due him, but to the extent of one year's only, thus almost confiscating for the benefit of the tenant the remainder of the arrears, whatever they might be. There was something even more alarming behind, because although the sheriff might order the tenant to pay one year's arrears, there were no means whatever of compelling the tenant to pay, the latter had only to go on serving notice after notice upon his landlord to stop paying his rent at all. He did not wonder at the emotion of the hon. and learned Gentleman at finding what the consequences of his Bill were. It was not possible to gainsay the proposition that under the Bill which was now being considered, if a landlord who had received a year's rent proceeded to eject a tenant by ejectment for its recovery, the tenant could stop proceedings by giving a notice in the terms of the Bill. So that if a landlord allowed two years' rent to become due, his claim could be defeated as to half; and if he proceeded to recover the amount due to him at the end of one year, he would bring out his ears all the epithets which the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) could command at a moment's notice. The tenants of Ireland were a sober and intelligent race, who knew that it paid better to be tenants than landlords, and they would remain in the position of tenants in the hope of being able to take advantage of the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Wexford, or of that other measure whose provisions had been sketched by the hon. Member for Mayo. He could find no possible justification for the measure that had been proposed. No justification could be found in the present state of the country, for it must be well known that the savings banks were teeming with the millions of the people. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members might dissent from his statement; but the published Returns in reference to savings banks would prove the accuracy of what he had said, and a further examination would show that the people generally of the country were eminently prosperous. Reference had been made to the number of ejectments which had not been served, but nothing was proved by that without it being shown who it was that served the ejectments. It was well known by anybody who went Circuit that since the Land Act the great number of ejectments were brought for the purpose of bringing about family arrangements, and in nine cases out of ten he was happy to say that they were settled without going to trial. The point to look at was the absolute number of evictions that took place; and the figures of the Chief Secretary for Ireland upon this point had not been answered in the course of the debate. The number of evictions which were traceable to the landlords was ridiculously small, and furnished no foundation for any such Bill as this. What parties in Ireland, he asked, were favourable to the Bill? Not the landlords, certainly. The agricultural labourers had not been mentioned; and they did not seem to have given any opinion. Were the tenant farmers themselves satisfied? He ventured to think not. A great many said that they were not, because they said that the Bill did not go far enough. The Return which was placed that morning in the hands of hon. Members showed that out of all the Unions in Ireland only 29 had passed resolutions in favour of the measure, and those resolutions in many cases were not unanimous. A great many bodies outside the Guardians had also expressed opinions which were not favourable to the Bill, and among them the Club in London called "The O'Connell '82 Club." The members of that Club passed a series of resolutions, in one of which they said—"The Bill of Mr. Butt now before Parliament is vicious in principle," and the reason it gave was racy of the soil—it was that instead of giving fixity of tenure it only "ensured litigation renewable for ever." He imagined that the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) must know something of this Club, for many of the phrases which he used were also used in the resolutions of the Club. They concluded magnificently by saying—

"We on the part of an oppressed and dissatisfied nation, offer those fair terms to the present landlords of Ireland, and thereby place on record for the future historian the honesty and moderation of our proposals."

He trusted that the Bill would be rejected by a large majority.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was anxious to make a few observations before the House divided, but he would endeavour to economise the time of the House as much as possible, and he must say that his task had been made easy by the admirable speech of his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Law), who had well expressed the views he entertained in reference to the Bill. He should like, before the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) replied, to say that he thought it was incumbent upon him to explain that part of his speech in introducing the Bill to which reference was made more than once in the course of the debate, in which—as a historical argument—he said that the land of Ireland had been more than once confiscated. If the Bill professed to be a measure of restitution of the soil to its rightful owners he could understand the relevancy of the statement; but it was not asserted that the present occupiers claimed to be in any sense or degree the representatives of the victims of any of those confiscations, and therefore he did not see with what object the Bill had been introduced with such a statement. There was one intention with which such a statement might have been made, which he hoped was not the intention of the hon. and learned Member. It might have been his intention to convey to the House the impression that a policy of confiscation had been a traditional policy with reference to land legislation in Ireland, and that that policy was still pursued by the landlords of Ireland. He trusted the hon. and learned Gentleman did not intend to convey any such imputation. If he had done so he would have felt it necessary to accompany the imputation with some more conclusive proof than he had given that a policy of confiscation had ever been, or was at that moment, pursued by the landlords of Ireland. It was perfectly true that before the passing of the Land Act, owing to social and economical causes—owing, he thought, to the unfortunate mismanagement of their estates by a large number of Irish landlords, a state of things had arisen which was in many respects most unfortunate. What was the state of things that had arisen? A class of tenants had been allowed to grow up who were so small and dependent that the most ordinary rights of the landlord could not be exercised without inflicting upon them the most cruel hardships and depriving them of the means of existence. Another circumstance was that, owing to the dependent position of that class, customs which in England and Scotland had obtained legal force and validity had not obtained legal sanction in Ireland. Under these circumstances, what did the Land Act do? It improved the position of the tenants in any legal proceedings that might be taken against them. It gave the sanction of the law to everything in the shape of custom, and gave the tenant the presumption of the law in claiming compensation for any improvements he might have made. It further gave to the tenant many advantages, and in the event of the landlord proceeding to evict him it imposed a heavy pecuniary fine upon the exercise of that right, and prevented the tenant from being turned upon the world altogether penniless in the event of the loss of his holding. The House had been told that in these respects the intention of the framers of the Land Act had failed; but no sufficient proof of the accuracy of that statement had been given. The figures quoted by his right hon. and learned Friend as to the working of the Land Act and the number of actual evictions that had been made conclusively showed that there was no reason to suppose there had been any policy of confiscation of the property either of the tenants or of the landlords. He would recommend that all doubt might be put an end to by further Returns from the Judicial Statistics; because, valuable as those Returns might be, they did not, as had been pointed out, contain a sufficiently clear and distinct account of the causes tried under the Land Act, and did not give a Return of those which were properly landlords' evictions and those due to other causes. What were the objects proposed to be attained by this Bill? He did not think the actual occupiers were entitled to any historical consideration at the hands of the House. He had no doubt the hon. and learned Member who introduced this Bill was actuated by considerations, not of restoring such rights to the present occupiers of the soil, but of conferring some public advantages on the agricultural community. He no doubt thought that by conferring security upon the tenants they would be induced to invest their capital and industry in the soil, and that thereby the produce

if the soil would be increased, and the political contentment of the country in every way promoted. With regard to that point, he should like to know whether it was the fact that the tenant did not possess to a very great extent security of tenure at the present moment? Was it not the fact that in 99 cases out of 100 the tenants who gave their landlords proof that they were either prepared to apply capital to the soil or their own industry to their holding were able to obtain from their landlords almost any security they might require? Was it not a fact that a tenant who could give his landlord proof of his good disposition would easily obtain a lease? He believed landlords were not so indifferent to their own interests as to lose the opportunity of receiving good tenants. Further, it had not been proved that in the case of landlords who were less intelligent and less alive to their own real interests, the legislation of 1870 had not given practical and sufficient security to tenants for their holdings. One provision in the Bill had not been much dwelt upon, and that was the 39th clause, as to which he hoped he should not now be told that it was not an essential part of the Bill, and could be got rid of in Committee. It provided that farms of 60 acres might be sub-divided. He knew there was in the previous part of the Bill a provision against the sub-division of smaller holdings, but it had been pointed out that it was slight and illusory, for when you had deprived a landlord of the power of ejectment, it became extremely difficult to say what control he could have over his estate. The words of the Bill provided against the sub-division of smaller holdings; but the 39th clause positively invited the tenants of larger holdings to sub-divide their farms where the result would be a valuation of not less than £30. A calculation had been made showing that between 8,000,000 and 9,000,000 acres of land would come under the operation of this clause, and might at the will of the present occupier be sub-divided. The effect would be to establish that which had been one of the worst curses of Ireland, a system of middlemen, to which Judge Longfield attributed much of the country's misfortune. He could not conceive that Parliament could do anything more likely to effectually bring back that system than by the proposal contained in that clause. He did not deny that there was a gradual and steady progress going on in Ireland in the increase of rents, and that by legislation they could give temporary protection to the present holders against the competition that was going on for the occupation of land. They had been informed that the competition for the occupation of land in Ireland was as keen and sharp as ever it was, and he did not suppose it was desired to prevent changes in occupation. It had been urged as a great evil in this country and in Ireland that there was so much difficulty in the transfer of land from one owner to another, and he did not suppose it would be considered a less evil to make the transfer of occupation impossible. He did not suppose it was desired to prevent the transfer, under proper circumstances, of the occupation of land. If that were so, and if it was admitted that there was a keen competition for land, could legislation prevent land rising in value, either in the form of rent or payment for goodwill? Could any legislation prevent a man who desired to occupy land from paying money for the occupation of it, and going into occupation for that money? The effect of the Bill in regard to rents would simply be that where there was competition, if the landlord chose to strain his rights to the utmost, the whole value of the increase in price would go into the pocket of the landlord; whereas at present it went partly into the pocket of the landlord and partly into that of the tenant in the form of payment for goodwill. By the legislation now proposed, the whole of the additional price to be obtained by competition for land would go, not into the pocket of the landlord, but into that of the existing occupier. He was unable to see how the agricultural community in Ireland could benefit by such legislation, either now or in future. On the contrary, it would probably do much to unsettle the prosperous state of things which was admitted on all hands to exist at the present moment. He regretted, for various reasons, that the present measure had been brought forward. He believed, with others who had spoken, that it had no prospect of obtaining a second reading in that House, and he was much inclined to agree with the hon. Member for Roscommon (The O'Connor Don) that it would not have a much better chance of passing in an Irish Parliament; but, at the same time, it was to be regretted that such proposals had been brought forward, whether they were likely to become law or not, because they were likely to be believed in by farmers in Ireland, since their effect would be to place sums of money, not belonging to them, in the pockets of the farmers without any exertion on their part. When such prospects were held out to them, was it likely that they would devote themselves with steadiness, energy, and industry to the legitimate means of improving their holdings? Reference had been made to certain clauses in the Land Act. He believed they would all have been glad to see the ownership of land distributed among a larger number of persons in Ireland; but was it not probable that one of the reasons for the comparative non-success of the clauses known by the name of his right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) was the hope held out to tenants that they would be brought into practical possession of their holdings without payment? Objectionable as the Bill was, however, he was glad it had received an ample discussion. He believed the time thus occupied would not be lost; but that the strong expression of opinion which had been heard not only from English but from Irish Members against the Bill would not be without a salutary effect in Ireland.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) agreed with the noble Lord who had just spoken in thinking that the ample discussion of the Bill which had taken place was matter for congratulation. It was difficult to treat the subject seriously, so preposterous were the proposals which the House were asked to adopt. There could be no doubt that a considerable number of Irish Members had pledged themselves on the national platform to fixity of tenure, free sales, and value of rents as the result of an agitation which had been increasing for the last five or six years. The question was one which had, in that form, been taking hold of the minds of the peasantry. But when they came to read that debate, and learned that by an overwhelming verdict of English, Scotch, Welsh, and Irish

Members the Bill was pronounced to be unjust, and fraught with danger to the community, he believed they would be as unanimous in condemning the measure as they had been in supporting it. He concurred in the eulogium passed on the people of Ulster, and he went entirely with the observations of his hon. and learned Friend as to the propriety of considering the various parts of the Bill which dealt with Ulster tenant right. If proposals were made with the view of remedying some of the shortcomings in the Act of 1870, he considered that would be a fair subject for consideration on the part of the Government and the House. As to the three proposals made with the view of settling the Land Question, he doubted very much with regard to the first for a land register whether, considering the admirable arrangements of the Land Estates Court, they would gain much by it. As to the second, that relating to amendments in the Land Act, he thought they might consider it, and as to the Civil Bill Courts Bill, he was as anxious as anyone could be to facilitate the progress of that Bill. But it was perfectly easy to see how artificial was the excitement created in Ireland on this subject. How long had it been growing and how had it been fostered? It was the unfortunate legacy of the excitement attending the Act of 1870. If they examined into the history of the Bill of the hon. and learned Member, they would see how with leaps and bounds he had advanced to meet the demands made on behalf of the tenant-farmers of Ireland. He held that the demand of the Bill was an unreal demand, and when the tenant-farmers of Ireland were assured by the result of that night's proceedings, as they would be assured, that Parliament had no intention of granting their wild and extravagant demands—when they no longer entertained the hope that some political Party, on the pinch of necessity, would grant them—they would regret that they had been led into this agitation. He now understood that the hon. and learned Member for Limerick had given up the clauses with regard to the fixing of the rent, but it would not do for the hon. and learned Member to have two political voices. He must not tell the people in Ireland that nothing less than this Bill would satisfy them, and then say in this House that this sembly. Was there no hope that this artificial, vicious, dangerous, and injurious agitation would die away? Yes, there was such hope for it now in Ireland as there had been never before. There were influences at work in Ireland more powerful even than the advocacy of his hon. and learned Friend, or than the most able and skilful agitators. Education and prosperity were walking through the land, bringing with them civilization; silent and unseen, but irresistible as the forces of gravity and attraction. Appeals made to class interests, to old traditions, to past wrongs would then no longer be made with success. We should then see the happy day for which true Irishmen had long looked, though often with a trembling and fitful expectation, when the peasantry of Ireland would rely on their own enterprise and industry for their prosperity, wealth, and happiness, and not upon the spoliation of classes or the prospect of obtaining property which was not theirs, and when they would be as contented, as happy, as loyal, and as prosperous as the peasantry of any other portion of Her Majesty's dominions.

MR. BUTT, in reply, said the violence of assertion could be applied to this Bill, its existence would be imperilled indeed. He deprecates the caricature given of the provisions of the Bill by more than one of the speakers, and with regard to the clause which would prevent the landlord from covering arrears of rent, he said that it did not interfere with the remedy which the landlord had in the enforcement of the principle of the Bill was to secure fair rents, which could be obtained by valuing the property, was a detail. He said that the statement of the speaker that there was no clause in the Act of 1845 to this effect in many quarters, the clause was there, mere words, that the clause was from the Statute, the clause was in the new Bill, the clause was in the Statute, the clause was in the Statute.

the men—first in Ulster, and afterwards in Dublin, to which city the venue had been removed by the Government. Ultimately, Lord Donegal renewed the leases, without a fine, according to the tenant right custom. It had been calculated that £24,000,000 of property was held by the tenure of that old custom, which had since been recognized by the Act of 1870. Again, Parliament had sanctioned the principle that the tenant had a property in the improvements he had made. How was that principle respected all over Ireland? He would tell them it was made away with. Agreements had been sent round on large estates. [“Name!”] He would name—the Duke of Leinster’s, the Marquess of Lansdowne’s. Agreements had been sent round on the Duke of Leinster’s estate, dexterously drawn up, altering the rent, varying the tenure; and the tenants were told that if they did not return next morning to the office and give their consent, notice to quit would be served. There was not one of those agreements which did not confiscate the rights which Parliament had conferred on the tenant. All over Ireland—not in consequence of this Bill, the Bill was in consequence of it—landlords were raising their rents. Mr. Edward O’Brien, himself a landlord, said that under the Act of 1870 the security for the tenants’ improvements totally broke down, and that it provided no guarantee, direct or indirect, that the rent should not be screwed up until the tenant was reduced to the verge of ruin, and the value of the improvements became the property of the landlord. He repeated, the landlords in Ireland were increasing their rents, doubling them, and in many cases even doubling the valuation. This was general all over Ireland, and the effort of the landlords to increase their rents was attended with the utmost cruelty. Last year he had asked for a Royal Commission on this subject, but he was refused. He now repeated the demand for a Royal Commission, and he called on the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Kavanagh), and those who sympathized with him, to vindicate the honour of the class to which he belonged from the odium which was being brought upon them by the proceedings of some of the Irish landlords. As long as there were landlords who exercised their power in doing injustice and wrong it would be necessary to give the tenantry protection against it. He did not say the system he recommended was perfect, but he insisted in the first place that the land should be held in perpetuity. An eminent judicial authority held that the Land Act had done a great deal of mischief to the tenants although he had thought at first it would do them good, because there had latterly been a great number of ejectments under notices to quit. For himself, he wished that he could devise any means by which they could really protect the tenant and give him security for his improvements, and yet give the landlord the power of arbitrary eviction; but his ingenuity failed to enable him to do so. Eviction was ruin in Ireland; no compensation that they could give would make it anything but ruin to many tenants. He proposed to meet that state of things by allowing the tenant to ask for perpetuity of tenure. He believed, however, that the effect of the Bill, if passed, would be that in a great many instances the landlord and tenant would go on as they were now doing. The tenant would be afraid to ask for perpetuity, because if he did so there must be an increase of his rent; and, on the other hand, the landlord would be afraid to increase the rent because the tenant would apply for perpetuity. The matter would be arranged by arbitration. It was not true that the arbitrators who would fix the amount of rent under this Bill would necessarily be tenant-farmers. The landlord could appoint his own agent or the agent of any other landlord or any person engaged in farming an arbitrator on that matter. He was told that he was going to increase rent all over Ireland. The only time he had spoken on this question out of the House was when he was requested at a meeting of the Farmers’ Club to take the Land Question in hand. He told the meeting that if he brought in a Bill on the subject they must leave him to settle the clauses himself. He was asked to explain the Bill at a meeting of tenant farmers, and he distinctly said that the Bill he had prepared left it optional with a tenant to seek perpetuity of tenure; but he told them to remember that a great many of them held their land at a low rent, and that they could not get perpetuity unless they were willing and prepared to pay the highest rent that a solvent and re-

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY rose to move that a Select Committee be appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the prevalence of habits of intemperance, and into the manner in which those habits have been affected by recent legislation and other causes. His Grace said, he felt that he need make no apology for bringing this very important subject before their Lordships. What had induced him to do so at this particular time was especially this—that recently, in common with many of his right rev. Brethren and the Archbishop of York, he had received a Memorial signed by 10,000 of the Clergy of the Established Church of England, calling upon them in their place in Parliament to draw their Lordships' attention to the growing prevalence of intemperance, and to endeavour to ascertain whether any remedy could be found for the very serious evils of which the memorialists complained. This Memorial was the sequel of two important Reports—one drawn up by the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury—a Committee to examine into the subject of the Report was, indeed, appointed as long ago as the year 1869—and the other Report drawn up in the year 1874 by the Convocation of the Province of York. The first of those Reports had been in the hands of the Clergy and the public generally for several years. It contained much information as to the spread of intemperance in the country, and also a great many valuable suggestions as to the best way in which that evil could be met. A venerable friend of his, who was at that time an important member of the Lower House of

Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, was mainly the author of that Report—the late Archdeacon Sandford. It was specially owing to his indomitable perseverance that this Committee was enabled to acquire the information which they had laid before the public. In the midst of the pressing avocations which the Clergy had in their several spheres—in the midst also of that controversy which he supposed was an inseparable concomitant of increased religious zeal, however much in itself to be deplored—it was refreshing to find that that venerable institution, the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, applied its attention to this important practical matter, and by a laborious and exhaustive process was able to supply the country with a storehouse of information on the subject. He was bound to say, also, that the Convocation of the Province of York drew up a Report in 1874 or the beginning of 1875, and therefore took cognizance of all the changes which had occurred since the year 1869, and had contributed further most valuable and important information on this subject. He was not surprised that the Clergy generally, feeling that their work as the established ministry of this country was greatly impeded by the evil complained of, should, in such large numbers, have memorialized the Bishops, and asked them to bring this subject before Parliament. It was only natural that men who felt that the very object of their existence as a class was interfered with by some growing evil should be more alive to the existence of that evil than, perhaps, any other class of men. It was not, indeed, to be taken for granted that all the allegations contained in these Reports were capable of being distinctly maintained. The very object which the Bishops had in view in asking their Lordships to grant a Select Committee was that those allegations might be tested—that they might see first whether the evil did exist to the extent alleged; secondly, what were the causes to which the existence of the evil was in a greater or less degree to be attributed; and, thirdly, what were most likely to be remedies for the evil. It was maintained that intemperance had greatly increased in the country. It was maintained that crime had been assisted by the growth of intemperance; that the Reports of all prison chaplains, or strates, and of all persons connected with the police with the repression of crime of the country was owing to intemperance. It was alleged also that crime might be greatly diminished throughout the country if it were not for widespread intemperance, and that

who had charge of the union houses in every part of the country testified to the fact that the ranks of paupers under their care were increased by the existence of that terrible

It was also alleged that much harm in the way of spreading disease, especially of that worst of diseases which showed itself in insanity, by that intemperance. Therefore, as the occasion was so grave, and had so much to do not only with the morality but with the social safety of the country, he felt obliged in asking their Lordships to inquire in the regular and appointed way whether these allegations were true or not; and whether, if true, anything should be done, either by direct legislation or by distinct appeal to the right of the country, to mitigate this evil. He was aware that questions connected with this subject had been mixed up with a great deal of controversy, and that exaggerated statements had been made. He was aware that it was not uncommon to speak, perhaps, in stronger terms than it was at all desirable for those who were engaged in what was only called the liquor traffic. He was aware especially that many of those who had embarked their capital as brewers or distillers felt very sensitive to the way in which they were spoken of by some of those who had interested themselves in promoting the temperance movement;—and certainly from his own personal acquaintance with gentlemen engaged in this trade, he thought there was great exaggeration, and an undue tendency to regard them as responsible parties which they were as anxious as ourselves to prevent. It might, indeed, be tortuous that all those engaged in the production of those things from which brewers and distillers formed their liquor were equally responsible; for certainly there were no malt and no hops there would not be a great deal of brewing. The men who were engaged in the liquor traffic, in its higher departments at least, he thought there were none who ought to be so much interested in such investigations as he asked their Lordships to give him as the brewers and distillers of this country. If it should be the case that by calling attention to the way in which their public-houses were disposed of a way might be found to mitigate this evil, he could not but feel confident that when their attention was directed to a matter in which as Christians and as patriotic Englishmen they were interested they durst not for conscience sake submit to take part in what was degrading and ruinous to the country, but would be as ready as any others to meet any proposal that was made in order to diminish the spreading. Still less could he assent to the allegation that it was the character and condition of the English working man that was the cause of this widespread intemperance. The English working man bore a high character in the civilized world. Most of the occupants of the Episcopal Bench were acquainted, through personal intercourse, with the labouring population of this country. As to the agricultural labourers, he should be surprised if it were denied that in the agricultural labourers of England were to be found many of the best specimens of English citizens. He should be surprised if any one denied that in almost every village you might find a man who lived by the sweat of his brow and the labour of his hands who was as much interested in the welfare and education of his children as any of their Lordships were, who was a regular attendant in his place of worship, and who cultivated those habits of frugality which had made working men in various parts of the country rise from the lower positions which they originally occupied to a place among the foremost of the land. He believed that our labouring population in the rural districts was not behind the labouring population of any country in Europe or in the world, and that therefore if intemperance had degraded the working men in the rural population of England, it was not from any defect either in their character or in the circumstances in which they were placed, but from some dangerous influence which it was possible to remove. Those of the Clergy who were acquainted with our urban mechanics knew that among them were men whose conduct and habits were irreproachable, and who were deeply interested in the welfare and the education of their children. If that were the case, how were the strange and somewhat piteous stories to be accounted for of the way in which the increase of wages had plunged the working man into every sort of reckless excess? A friend of his who had great experience of the habits of the population of Australia had made to him a remark which perhaps threw some light upon the subject. He told him that the first effect of the gold discoveries in that country had been to induce the people to plunge into vicious extravagance and intemperance, for they had no idea of any other sort of indulgence; but in the course of a few years matters had righted themselves, and men began to understand that there were better ways of spending their money than by indulging in drink and vice. The result, therefore, was that the people of Australia were largely and permanently benefiting by the rise of wages in that country. He trusted that events would run the same course in this country, and that we might anticipate safely that the ultimate prosperity of the working men would be increased by the rise in wages. In the meantime, however, we were bound to do all we could to protect the working man against temptation. And here he wished it to be understood that he was speaking not alone of the temptation as it affected the lower classes, but of the temptations to selfish indulgence and to vice that were offered to all classes of society. We lived in an age in which the luxury of the rich was largely upon the increase, and therefore it was not surprising that the working man or the agricultural labourer should seek for luxury in his own way, which led too often to his degradation. He would only slightly refer to the various modes which were pointed out in the documents to which he had alluded as being calculated to palliate or to remedy these evils—because it would be the business of the Committee which their Lordships would probably be kind enough to grant him to recommend the steps that should be taken to check intemperance. No doubt if we could by any means increase the comfort of the labouring population—if we could make their homes more suitable as the homes of English citizens—if we could secure for them good houses and more abundant and cheaper food—we should do much to check drunkenness;—because the man who lived in a comfortable home and ate plenty of wholesome food was not so likely to seek for amusement or for the palliation of his sufferings in unwholesome drink. He recollected that some years ago, when the Western Islands of Scotland were visited by famine, more whiskey was said to have been drunk in those Islands than had ever been consumed there before; and the conclusion he drew from the fact was that starvation, and not prosperity, was the chief incentive to drink, because people drank to enable them to forget their misery for a time. Therefore, he believed that by improving the habitations of the poor, and by giving them sufficient food, we should be approaching a great and beneficial result. Nevertheless, he urged that we were bound in the meantime to diminish the temptations to drink which were brought strangely near to the doors of every person under the present system. Enormous sums were expended in the erection of work-houses, and if it were true, as was alleged, that a large proportion of our pauperism was caused by intemperance, then we were being put to a large and an unnecessary expenditure in consequence of intemperance and of the temptation afforded by the unrestricted number of public-houses. He was given to understand that the adulteration of the drink of the people was in itself an additional incentive to intoxication, and was therefore one of the main causes of our pauperism and all its attendant miseries. Under these circumstances, he could not help thinking that it would be wise for us to look narrowly at the system under which our public-houses were licensed, and to consider whether some restraint could not be put upon adulteration of the drink sold in them. We should further consider whether beershops should be allowed to exist, and whether we should permit spirits to be sold at various shops, as was done under the existing law. We could not pass through any county in this country without seeing large lunatic asylums, and if the allegations made in the papers before him were accurate, a large proportion of the inhabitants of those buildings were the victims of intemperance. We were spending much, and were likely to spend more, in this country upon education; but there was a strange something in the public money being spent in erecting side by side schools, workhouses, and lunatic asylums—the former intended for the education of the people, and the two latter to receive those whose evil example tended to counteract the good that education would do. For these plain and common-sense reasons, which appealed to every man's experience, he felt confident their Lordships would not refuse to consider this very important question, but would, without hesitation, grant him the Committee he asked for.

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the prevalence of habits of intemperance, and into the manner in which those habits have been affected by recent legislation and other causes."
—(The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.)

LORD HOUGHTON said, he could not but think the inquiry proposed by the most rev. Primate was most desirable. He was glad also to hear in the speech of the most rev. Primate such testimony to the zeal of the Clergy of the Church of England in the cause of temperance, and they would be supported in their efforts by the ministers of all other denominations. One of the principal advantages which he anticipated as likely to arise from the inquiries of the Committee was that the opinions of the most competent medical authorities would be obtained on the subject. He attached the greatest possible importance to the results of medical experience, and it was in this direction more than any other that he looked for a remedy likely to correct an evil which all deplored.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE said, he looked upon the Memorial to which reference had been made as of the greatest possible importance—it was signed by many of the most eminent clergymen in this country. But he desired to remark that although the Clergy had taken up this question very strongly, it would be a mistake to regard it as an exclusively clerical question:—it was practically a lay subject. All ranks of society, from Members of Parliament down to the ranks of the working classes, had of late years evinced a lively interest in the checking of intemperance; and he had been greatly struck by the enthusiasm with which the subject had been taken up by large numbers of working men in that part of the country with which he was immediately connected. He might go further, and say that the publicans themselves, or some of them—for there were respectable members of that as of all other trades—had shown a desire to diminish the evils which were clearly traceable to the sale of intoxicating drinks. He thought that the inquiry asked for in the Memorial of the Clergy could not in so many terms be granted. A measure intended to deal in any form with a restriction of the trade he would not say would have a very bad chance of success, but would come with a certainty of failure from what was called the right rev. Bench. They might, however, well ask their Lordships' House to appoint a Committee to inquire into the subject. What struck him, in looking at debates in the House of Commons, was the extreme uncertainty which often existed as to the facts of the particular question under consideration. For instance, in the recent debate on Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Bill the question whether temperance was or was not on the increase was—the assertions on the subject were so much opposed—left in doubt. It was important that they should know which way they were going. If the great increase of intemperance they had heard of was due to the higher rate of wages received by the working classes, and would decrease as that rate went down, the case was not so bad as if the increase went steadily on. Inquiry would throw light on this important matter. For himself, he trusted that as education spread, as men became more civilized, as they had more opportunities of improving their minds, and knew better what to do with their money, intemperance would more and more decline. But it was well to look the case in the face. He altogether disbelieved in the notion of making men temperate by Act of Parliament; but still they might make men intemperate by Act of Parliament. One point of the inquiry should be as to the effect of what was called the system of grocers' licences to sell spirits. From the accounts that had reached him, under that system women had an opportunity of obtaining spirits which they had not before, and many families had been made wretched and placed in poverty in consequence. Inquiry should also be made as to the result of the present system of treating persons taken into custody and imprisoned on charge of drunkenness. Then, again, he believed that a great deal of illicit drinking took place in what were called "hush houses," where intoxicating liquors could be procured after the public-houses were closed. A great amount of drunkenness was, he believed, to be traced to that cause. It seemed to him and to all to whom he had spoken on the subject that a Committee of their Lordships' House was the best tribunal to conduct such an inquiry. By a fair, impartial, and elaborate investigation a mass of facts might be secured which, whether they led to legislation or not, could not but be most beneficial to the country, and invaluable to those who sought to advance the cause of temperance.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN said, that the desire for inquiring into the subject under their Lordships' consideration was not confined to any part of the United Kingdom. Petitions had been presented from Scotland praying for a searching investigation; and though they suggested a Royal Commission, he was sure the Petitioners would be altogether satisfied with a Committee of their Lordships' House. The nation, he thought, was greatly indebted to the 10,000 clergymen of the Church of England who had presented the Memorial which had been referred to, and to the most rev. Primate for having brought the subject forward.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH said, that when the subject of temperance was brought before their Lordships on a former occasion he obtained an unexpected and undesirable notoriety in consequence of an observation he then made. As, however, he retained very strongly the opinion he then expressed, he feared he must incur still further unpopularity by stating that his opinion was unchanged—and, indeed, strengthened—by what he had heard since. Nothing but a very deep conviction of the soundness of those opinions would induce him to incur fresh unpopularity by repeating them on the present occasion. He had ventured to say—not as a simple and general proposition—that he preferred freedom to sobriety—as if there would be any natural antagonism between freedom and sobriety, and as if a man could not at the same time be perfectly free and perfectly sober—but that if he should ever be compelled to make his choice between freedom and sobriety, then in that case he should prefer freedom. He never could support unwise or injudicious legislation which tended in the direction of suppressing freedom, even if by that legislation were gained the advantage of sobriety. He might gain this advantage of sobriety by imprisoning every man and woman and keeping them on bread and water; but that would be a degree of interference with the liberty of the subject which would induce the strongest advocate of temperance to say that he preferred freedom to sobriety. Upon this question of legislation in regard to intemperance he could not too heartily thank the most rev. Primate for having, with his usual moderation and wisdom, refrained from attempting any hasty legislation. It appeared to him that this kind of legislation for the suppression of intemperance had reached a very dangerous point. Every one was saying that the Legislature ought to do something, but no one was able exactly to say what the Legislature ought to do. When this was the case the Legislature was extremely likely to do something that had better be left undone. He remembered, for example, that some of the measures now complained of as tending to promote intemperance were passed originally in the interests of temperance. That fact ought of itself to "give us pause," and make the Legislature very careful how it tried legislative experiments over the whole country upon so large and difficult a social question as the enforcing of sobriety. He did not say this in order to deprecate the appointment of the Committee, which he trusted their Lordships were about to grant, because one of the results of the investigation would be clearly to show what were the possible limits of legislation on this subject. He believed for himself that there was too great a tendency in the present day to clamour for legislation—too great a tendency on the part of those who were gaining political power in the State to believe that legislation could do everything for them, and that as little as possible was to be done by themselves. And this very class, from their habits and many of their associations, were perhaps less sensitive upon the point of personal liberty than others. So far from working men being jealous of their personal freedom, the habits acquired in Trades Unions led them to sacrifice that feeling for other things. They were, from their connection with Trades Unions, too apt to regard the State as a great Union, and were too willing to give up their own freedom and endanger the freedom of their neighbours by bringing about some larger and sweeping action on the part of the State. He could not help feeling great anxiety when he saw the deep enthusiasm which this question had stirred in the minds of the working classes, and observed how many of them were pressing on the attention of Parliament measures that were crude and dangerous. For these reasons, he was anxious that any legislation should be based on the most careful and exhaustive inquiry that could possibly be made. The difficulty attending upon all legislation on this question of temperance was the difficulty specially attendant upon all legislation when it was directed, not for the suppression of crime, but for the suppression of vice. There was no class of subjects so difficult and so dangerous for the Legislature to meddle with as that class in which the law was called upon to deal with vice, or that debatable and ill-traced ground where vice may be on the verge of passing into crime. The difficulty was this—that if the vice were widespread and national it would have, not one cause, but many—perhaps very many; and if they attempted to reach it by wide, sweeping, and stringent legislation they would not, probably, carry with them the public feeling and opinion of the nation. Then legislation would in that case be in advance of public opinion, and it would be in danger of provoking a perilous reaction in favour of the very vice which they desired to suppress. If, on the other hand, public opinion was so hostile to the vice that it was prepared to accept measures sufficiently drastic to deal with it, then the nation hardly needed such measures at all. That was not a reason against all legislation, but a reason why they should be extremely cautious how they did legislate. It seemed to him that the legislative remedies lay between two extreme limits, either of which might be logically supported, and either of which would be effectual if it could be carried out. One was the system of free licensing, which was tried at Liverpool, followed by severe penalties against adulteration, disorder, and drunkenness. It always seemed to him that there was a great deal to be said on behalf of that system; but our modern system of licensing had raised up a powerful monopoly which it was extremely difficult to deal with. The other equally logical way was by the total suppression of the liquor traffic by the Maine Liquor Law, and which, if it could be effectual, would certainly suppress the traffic. He did not believe that this would involve any interference with freedom, because the nation had the right to forbid, if it thought fit, the sale of any article whatever which it believed to be injurious. He thought, however, that neither of these plans would be successful, because it would be impossible to carry the public sentiment sufficiently in taking the measures necessary for their adoption. The matter then became one of police, for the regulation, and not for the suppression, of the liquor traffic. It would be out of order to discuss a Bill not before their Lordships; but he had been a great deal taken to task by the advocates of the Permissive Bill—who reserved all their intemperance for their speeches—and he should, therefore, like to say in a few words why he opposed this measure. His objections to the Permissive Bill were three. He believed it to be absolutely immoral, thoroughly unconstitutional, and thoroughly mischievous in its operation. It was absolutely immoral to say of a trade that it was poisonous, murderous, and destructive to society; and then to say that if two-thirds of the inhabitants wished to have this murderous, poisonous, and wicked thing in the midst of them they should have it, whether for good or for bad. That was a strange way of proceeding. When Parliament legislated against infanticide in India they declared infanticide to be wrong, and forbade it everywhere. But what would have been thought, if Parliament had passed a law declaring that if two-thirds of the people in any village in India wished for infanticide they should be allowed to have it? Surely the liquor traffic was either right or wrong. If it were right, they should allow it everywhere; if wrong, they should forbid it everywhere. But to make the right or the wrong to depend upon the majority in the streets appeared to him to be perilous to morality, if not positively immoral. It also seemed to him to be decidedly unconstitutional that men should be governed, not by a representative government, but by a personal government—by a plébiscite and by a vote of the streets. How could this system work? Let him give an instance. An eminent ecclesiastic of whom he wished to speak with every respect—Cardinal Manning—advocating the Permissive Bill on a great platform, said that the ratepayers ought to exercise the same rights as the owners of property, and ought to forbid anything being done in their town which any individual might forbid to be done on his own property. Now, he had been living for three years in a town the inhabitants of which had little fear of liquor, but had a great fear of the Pope. He was certain that the majority of the inhabitants would not assent to the suppression of the liquor traffic; but if that eminent ecclesiastic had been a lodger in that town, and if the ratepayers had been asked by a two-thirds majority to expel him, he greatly feared there would be no doubt that they would have expelled Cardinal Manning. That would have been in accordance with the principle of the Bill, which is, that a majority of ratepayers may exercise those rights which belong to the owners of property. He protested against the liberty of any one being trusted to a vote of the streets, and he claimed for every one in this Kingdom the right to be governed by representative government, which was the essential condition of freedom. Such a measure would be mischievous, because of the secret and illicit intemperance it would provoke and the incessant quarrelling it would produce in every town of the Kingdom. Having shown that he was not altogether that apologist of intemperance and defender of abandoned publicans which he had been described, in consequence of the speech to which he had referred, he would say a word as to the other causes of intemperance which were referred to in the Resolution. He was satisfied it was far more to those other causes we must look for the prevention or the cure of intemperance than to any legislation with respect to the licensing of public-houses. The causes of intemperance were very many—they were social, economical, educational, and in some senses touched upon religion. It was to the elevation of the sanitary, social, religious, and moral condition of the poor far more than to laws respecting the licensing of public-houses that we must look for the suppression of intemperance. The advocates of teetotalism told the poor man to drink nothing but water; but was he always sure of getting water to drink? Men were told to drink water, and in many places for water they were given diluted sewage. The poor man was told to stay at home and enjoy the society of his wife and children; but what manner of home was it he was to stay in? What sort of place was the one room where the man wearied with toil was to spend his evening in the presence of a wife as weary with toil as he was, and of half-educated children? What sort of attractions were there at such a home compared with those of the public-house, from which the poor man was rightly asked to stay away? We hardly did justice to the heroism and self-denial of any poor man who did stay away from the public-house. The man who did that denied himself of much which many of their Lordships could hardly bear to be deprived of. Many of them would bear with less equanimity banishment from the club, though they expected the poor man to bear banishment from the public-house. As far as this was a question of education, we must elevate men to the enjoyment of higher pleasures than the mere indulgence of the appetite. It might also be a question touching upon religion and suggesting inquiry how far we might relax our ideas of the relaxation to be allowed to the poor man on Sunday. All these questions—social, religious, economical, and sanitary—reached very far and deep under the complicated roots of our modern civilization, and he believed the hopes of those who were opposed to intemperance lay in the very diversity and extent of these causes. For that reason we never could tell from what source help might come to us. As the sources of intemperance were many, so would the remedies be various. He was quite sure it would be through the labours of the Clergy, who had signed the Memorial, in their parishes and schools, and in efforts to elevate the condition of the working classes and purify and make beautiful their weary labouring lives, quite as much as through passing Acts of Parliament, we should at last grapple and, he trusted, by God's blessing, destroy the great curse of our nation, intemperance.

THE EARL OF BELMORE was glad that the most rev. Prelate had brought this Motion forward. The subject was one which had excited much interest in Ireland, and had occupied the attention of the Synods of the Irish Church. He hoped that the Committee, if granted, would extend its inquiries to that country. He agreed with a good deal that had fallen from the right rev. Prelate who spoke last, and he was sensible that this matter involved questions not only of temperance, but also of Revenue and of social convenience. He thought it well, therefore, that there should be an inquiry into the subject by a Select Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, they were indebted to the most rev. Primate for the very moderate and temperate speech in which he introduced a subject which was peculiarly fitted to excite angry discussion. It was idle to treat those who produced and distributed spirituous liquors as if they were in a position morally worse than any other members of the community who might be employed in producing and distributing articles for which there was an innocent demand. We might just as well make accusations against a man who sold powder and shot, because somebody bought powder of him for the purpose of committing a murder; or depreciate the character of those who sold arsenic for poisoning rats, because occasionally it was used for other purposes. The most rev. Primate very rightly disclaimed any sympathy with those attacks upon the labouring classes of this country which were occasionally associated with this discussion. He did not think, considering their numbers compared with those of the rest of the community, there was any ground for saying—if we looked over a very long period of time—that they had any monopoly of the vice of intemperance. No doubt the subject was surrounded by the greatest possible difficulties. No one who kept his eyes or his ears open could deny the existence of the evils of which the memorialists complained. This was not in any sense a clerical question. It was not from clergymen alone that they heard of the evils which had been caused by drunkenness:—they heard of it in every direction—magistrates on the bench, Judges of Assize, who were best conversant with the classes out of whom our criminals were mainly drawn, assured them that by far the largest part of the crime of this country was due to intemperance. He thought also that a great deal of the pauperism that existed was attributable to the same cause. It was also charged with the increase of lunacy. That, no doubt, was to a certain extent true; but it was a moot point with the best authorities. The scramble of our modern life—the pace at which we all lived—was supposed by many to have had a large share in the increase of that terrible curse. If it had pleased Providence that no such thing as alcohol should have ever existed, the world might perhaps have been the better for it; but it was a great step from that to say that Parliament ought to make the world the same as if alcohol did not exist in it. It did exist, and it must be taken into account. We could not make our Legislature play the part of a paternal Providence. The general arguments against paternal legislation were so well known, and they had formed part of the political inheritance of this country so long, that he would not waste their Lordships' time by repeating them. But the Legislature had tried its hand at paternal interference on that particular question, although on other matters it ordinarily abstained from it; it had done its best to make the people sober, and after every effort it had made there had been a great outbreak of intemperance—whether in consequence of those efforts he could not pretend to say. The Duke of Wellington's Government in 1828 thought to effect a great reform by the creation of beer-houses; and they had heard ever since of nothing else but that the beer-houses were the great source of intemperance in this country. Then, a few years ago, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson brought in a measure to diminish the number of beer-houses; and now it was said that that was the cause of the recent outbreak of intemperance. Mr. Gladstone in 1860 also had his specific for the cure of intemperance. It was one of a somewhat recondite and subtle character—namely, allowing brandy to be sold by grocers; but great reliance was placed on it at the time, and much ridicule was cast on those who suggested that it would produce greater insobriety than before. He was not censuring Mr. Gladstone's measure, because he had himself agreed with it, and thought it would be a good one. But now they heard that the sale of brandy in grocers' shops was introducing an amount of intemperance, not at the public-houses, but in the homes of the working classes which threatened the most serious consequences. It was, moreover, not a species of intemperance which was confined mainly to one sex, but it could be indulged in secret, and they were told that the opportunity had been used to a terrible degree by women. With those failures, then, before them, they must look to legislative proposals with some caution and apprehension. Even if they could reconcile themselves to the doctrine that it was the business of the English Government to be paternal, and to correct—if he might say it without irreverence—the action of Providence in the creation of alcohol, the wrecks of their past failures, should warn them of the difficulty of the task they had undertaken. Another danger which a right rev. Primate had eloquently indicated was the falseness and viciousness of the principle which any careless or despotic legislation on that subject would introduce. It was not merely that they were asked to direct their legislation against vice—that would be a sufficiently dangerous innovation—they already punished drunkenness; but they were asked to go a step further and punish people who did that which was innocent that the guilty might not fall into vice. They were asked to prevent the use of those liquors in order that those who could not restrain themselves should avoid their abuse. Whether that was right or wrong philosophers might dispute, but certainly it was an absolutely new principle in our legislation. They were all very anxious to prevent the vice of gambling, and they had legislated against it. No doubt gambling carried frightful evil to many homes; but what would be thought of a proposal to put a heavy penalty on the possession of a pack of cards? What, again, would be thought of a law rendering it penal to make a bet on a race-course, because such practices sometimes ruined families? Unless, therefore, they looked carefully where their principles would land them, they would find themselves venturing upon dangerous paths. He mentioned these things to indicate the difficulty which surrounded further action in that matter rather than to depreciate the proposed inquiry. The Government did not entertain any very sanguine hopes from that inquiry, or they would have suggested it themselves; but when it was asked for, as it now was, by such high authority, they did not think it right to oppose it. On the contrary, they would assist it as much as they could—especially as it was sought not so much with a view to legislation as to ascertain the facts. For himself, he did not look to legislation as the means of getting rid in any great degree of this great evil. The agitation on this subject, though originating in laudable feelings, was not wholly reasonable. No class could very well bear the sudden arrival of unexpected prosperity; and those who found their income suddenly and largely increase would be tempted towards indulgence. He could confirm what had been said as to the effect of the sudden accession of wealth caused by the gold diggings in Australia, for he happened to be there at the time. The first outbreak of intemperance was fearful, but the authorities put down drunkenness with the strong hand—the rough-and-ready expedient of burning down the grog shops at the diggings was resorted to; and as those interested in the grog shops naturally disapproved of such summary proceedings, sometimes sanguinary results ensued. But as soon as this was done it was found that all the roads leading to the diggings were covered with men lying in a state of intoxication; for when the grog shops were closed the digger went to the nearest town in quest of liquor, and there took in gross what he had not been allowed to take in detail. Sometimes the digger made his way to the nearest public-house, deposited all his money or a nugget on the counter, and said—“Waken me when I have drunk all that;” and when it was all exhausted he would go back to his work. That was an illustration not only of the futility of such legislation, but that any sudden accession of wealth would demoralize any class, and especially the class that was the least instructed. They should not, therefore, be too much discouraged if the great and sudden increase of wages in the North of England a few years ago had exposed the worklasses to some additional tempta-

RD ABERDARE said, he under- that one of the objects of the nittee would be to ascertain whether perance had increased or not; but ough the question of increase of perance was one that could not be d by statistics. No doubt mere s went to prove that such an in- e had occurred; but then it must membered that it was but a few that the new Act had been in tion; and that before it was passed egister of convictions was much loosely kept than it was now. For wn part, he would assert that of ears there had been a most marked vement in the moral tone of the ng men on the question of temper-and he had heard the same many employers and others with he had spoken on the subject. years ago drunkenness was hardly lered a vice by the working classes, ow it was scarcely mentioned with- a feeling of shame. Before the ng of the Act of 1872 there were 00 cases of drunkenness; and after assing of it they increased to 00, but that increase in the num- must not be attributed to more in- rance, but to the greater accuracy e statistics and to the more effectual tion of the law. No plan had yet been discovered by which drunkenness could be prevented. He did not think the number of public-houses had any- thing to do with it, and he did not believe it signified a bit whether in a town of 50,000 or 60,000 inhabitants there were 200 public-houses or 300. It was notori- ous that it was not in the towns which possessed the most public-houses that drunkenness chiefly prevailed. In Bristol, for instance, which abounded in public- houses, yet drunkenness did not exist to so large an extent there as in some Lan- cashire towns in which there were fewer. The fact was that temperature as well as climate had a remarkable effect, and if men wanted to drink they would find opportunities even if the public-houses were reduced one-half. The most effi- cient remedy he had heard of was in a town in Sweden, once notorious for drunkenness, where the public-houses were bought up, and then placed under the management of persons who had no pecuniary interest in selling intoxicating drinks. He was glad that the Govern- ment had acceded to the Motion of the most rev. Primate for the appointment of a Select Committee.

Motion agreed to.

L. Abp. Canterbury.	V. Hutchinson.
D. Westminster.	V. Canterbury.
E. Shrewsbury.	L. Bp. Peterborough.
E. Shaftesbury.	L. Bp. Exeter.
E. Onslow.	L. Bp. Carlisle.
E. Morley.	L. Penrhyn.
E. Kimberley.	L. Aberdare.
V. Gordon.	L. Cottesloe.

The Committee to appoint their own Chair- man.

SLAVE TRADE BILL.—(No. 135.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Read- ing, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK agreed with the noble Marquess that the rulers of the Native States as well as Her Majesty's Government were most de- sirous to suppress the slave trade. He did not know as to whether any corres- pondence had taken place on the subject between Her Majesty's Government and the Indian Government; but if there had been he thought it ought to be laid on the Table before their Lordships went into Committee on the Bill.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that the consent of the rulers of Indian States ought to have been obtained, and might have been obtained, for the jurisdiction the Bill proposed to assume; this was the more evident from what had been said by the noble Lord who had spoken last, since he said that the rulers of the Native States desired to suppress the slave trade. Great hardships might be caused by this Bill, since the term slave trade would affect not only the Banyans who advanced money in Zanzibar for carrying on the traffic in negroes, but also any Indian who might have in his house a woman that this Bill would call a slave, though she might form part of his family. Such a case had occurred; an Indian who was not a British subject had been sent as a prisoner to India, from Zanzibar, by the British Consul on account of a slave girl. This man had died a prisoner, and the case which had been related to him by Asiatics was looked upon by them as one of great injustice.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in reply, stated that the position of the Native Princes of India was not only different with regard to each other and with regard to the Queen, but was unexampled and unparalleled. He did not think that they would view with favour a revision of the existing Treaties on the ground put forward by the noble Lord (Lord Stanley of Alderley.) No correspondence had been had with the Indian Government on the subject of this Bill, and, therefore, there was not any to lay upon the Table.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

House adjourned at half past Seven o'clock, to Monday

QUESTION.

MR. FRENCH asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to the report of the Directors of Irish Convict Prisons for the year ending the 31st December 1875, and to the recommendation made therein in consequence of the uniform good conduct and very satisfactory discharge of their onerous and responsible duties by the officers of the convict prisons, that those officers should as regards retiring allowance be placed on as advantageous terms as county prison officials; and, whether he is willing to give effect to these recommendations?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: My attention, Sir, has been called to the recommendation as to retiring allowances to officers of convict prisons contained in the last Report of the Directors of Irish Convict Prisons. The warders of Irish convict prisons are superannuated on the same scale as the English convict prison warder, both coming, as Civil Servants, under the provisions of the Act of 1859. The question must, therefore, be considered as a whole, and I am not prepared to make any proposition with regard to it.

POST OFFICE—PROVINCIAL CONTINENTAL MESSAGES.—QUESTION.

MR. GRIEVE asked the Postmaster General, When it is proposed to alter the tariff for "Provincial Continental Messages?"

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that the question did not alone concern the English Post Office, but also foreign administrations and the Submarine Telegraph Company, and he could not, therefore, say whether it was proposed to alter the tariff. The matter was under consideration.

TURKEY—SERVIA—THE REVOLTED PROVINCES.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any truth in the rumour that the Grand Duke Vladimir of Russia is with the Servian Army on the Turkish frontier?

MR. BOURKE: So far as Her Majesty's Government can ascertain, there is no truth in the rumour.

FRANCE—SUGAR CONVENTION, 1875. QUESTION.

MR. GRIEVE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What answer, if any, has been received from the French Government in regard to their proposal to have a fresh conference on the Sugar Convention, and concurred in by England and the Netherlands; and, if no answer has been received, whether Her Majesty's Government will press for an answer?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that an answer having been received from the French Government, negotiations were going on as to the terms upon which Her Majesty's Government would accept a Conference, and when those negotiations were completed he would state what was their nature.

THE PRISONS BILL—PRISON CHAPLAINS.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If the account given in the "Times" of the 24th, of his reply to the Howard Deputation on the Prisons Bill, is substantially correct; and, whether that reply means that Government intend to deprive the local authorities of the power of appointing the prison chaplains, and also to deprive the local authorities of all control over the number, emoluments, and conditions of appointment of these officers?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that by one of the clauses of the Bill, the appointment of all the officers was proposed to be transferred to the Secretary of State; but by a subsequent clause the appointment to subordinate offices was vested in the Prisons Command not in the Secretary of State. He had said was that, as far as the appointment of subordinate offices was concerned, he had no objection to such appointments being left to the visiting justices. That, of course, did not apply to chaplains.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

AN IRISH PARLIAMENT.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. BUTT, in rising to move—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and report upon the nature, the extent, and the grounds of the demand made by a large proportion of the Irish people for the restoration to Ireland of an Irish Parliament, with power to control the internal affairs of that country," said, the Home Rule Motion that he brought before the House, by a strange coincidence two years ago that very day, was merely a preliminary to a direct Resolution in favour of a separate Parliament in Ireland, and no one could be expected to vote for the Resolution who was not prepared on going into Committee to support in one form or another the establishment of a separate Parliament for Ireland. He was on that occasion defeated by a very large majority; but the Resolution he now proposed was one entirely different in character, and one which might obtain the support of hon. Members who were not prepared to give any assent to the principle of Home Rule for Ireland. It was simply a Motion that a Select Committee should inquire into that which he believed the House ought to think demanded inquiry. He had demanded inquiry because this fact was unquestionable—that a majority of Irish Members had been returned to that House pledged to ask for a separate Parliament for Ireland. He confessed that was a fact which, considering the relations of that country, ought to call for the attention of the House, and to induce the House to grant the inquiry he asked. He might say he did not propose to refer to a Committee the question whether it would be right to give Ireland Home Rule. He merely proposed that a Select Committee should be appointed to inquire into matters with which it was necessary to be acquainted to enable the House to decide on that question. In olden times an inquiry of this nature would have been conducted at the Bar of the House, but he had no objection to the substitution of a Committee of Inquiry. It was not his intention to go into the general question of the Parliamentary relations between England and Ireland. He might take up the question at a very recent period, when the demand which was adverted to by the Resolution he was about to move was first made by the Irish people. After the fruitless suppression of the attempted insurrection in Ireland in the years 1866 and 1867, some gentlemen in Ireland believed the time was come when an attempt ought to be made to satisfy the wishes of the Irish people on the subject of the administration of their own affairs, without interfering in any way with the integrity of the Empire or shaking the securities that maintained the connection between the three Kingdoms. In November, 1873, these efforts resulted in the representative Conference of those who took the view of the originators of the movement, and he would ask the attention of the House to the requisition which was signed on behalf of that Conference. The requisition was signed by 25,000 persons, and no one who knew Ireland could deny that these signatures were eminently representative of the different localities of Ireland. The requisition declared that it was necessary for the peace of Ireland, and would be conducive to the welfare of the United Kingdom, that the right of domestic legislation over all Irish affairs should be restored to that country; that she should have the right and privilege of managing her own affairs by a Parliament assembled in Ireland, having the right of controlling the Irish resources of revenue, subject to the obligation of contributing their portion to the Imperial Revenue, but leaving to the Imperial Parliament the power of dealing with all questions affecting Imperial legislation, regarding the colonies and dependencies, and all matters appertaining to the defence and stability of the Empire, and in no way interfering with the Prerogative of the Crown. In accordance with the requisition a Conference was held on the 18th of November, 1873, which lasted four days, when the principles which he had just mentioned were unanimously adopted in the shape of eight resolutions, and in the demands made by the Irish people, whether they were right and expedient to grant or not, there was something very different from, and, in fact, directly opposed to, separation between the two countries. He believed the proposals embodied in the resolutions would, if passed, strengthen the connection between the two countries. There was also in the demand something entirely different from what was proposed by Mr. O'Connell. The proposal was, that there should be a Parliament in Ireland exercising over Irish affairs the same dominant control that had been exercised by the Parliament of Canada over Canadian affairs, and the Parliament of Australia over Australian affairs, and as was exercised in every colony by colonial Parliaments. It was also proposed that the House of Commons, constituted as now with an infusion of Irish Members, should continue exactly as it did now to administer the affairs of the Empire, everything relating to the Crown, our relations with the colonies, and all matters connected with Imperial defence. That, he believed, would be a better arrangement for Ireland than the state of things which existed before the Union, and he, for one, was not willing to give up his share in the power and government of that Empire, and really since the Union he did not see how it was possible to give it up. Since the Union the wars which had brought possessions to England had been carried on by the spending of Irish treasure and the shedding of Irish blood. India had been won by the British Empire in the same way, and Ireland had acquired with England partnership rights which it would be impossible to distribute, and of which Ireland could only have her share by continuing to be represented in the House. There had been, he would add, a long trial of the Union between the two countries, and he would confidently ask, after the experience of 76 years, whether the expectations which had been held out in 1800 had been realized? Ireland was then told that she would share the wealth and freedom of England, that Irish discontent and disaffection would vanish, and that if ever again that French came to our shores—for the French were then the enemies of England—they would find no ally in Ireland. Had that result been accomplished? His answer was, that at the end of 76 years of union with the richest country in the world Ireland was, in proportion to her capabilities and resources, the poorest country in Europe; and at the end of 76 years' union with a nation which he believed enjoyed a greater amount of rational liberty than any other, she was still subjected to severe coercive laws, though on this point he could not use language so strong as he could have used two years ago, for he was ready to admit that, partly owing to the exertions of Irish Members, and partly through the disposition shown by that House and the Government to mitigate the severity of those laws, the code which existed two years ago had been very much modified. Still, the House should recollect that two years ago there was no liberty of the Press in Ireland, that over a large part of the country a Curfew Law prevailed, and that the people were deprived of their right to bear arms. Had the Union caused Ireland to share in the content and loyalty of England? So far from that being the case, he believed that there was in Ireland at the present time more dissatisfaction than existed in any other part of Europe, not excepting the French Provinces which had been united to Germany. Again, Ireland was the most heavily taxed country in Europe in proportion to its resources. England extracted from the inhabitants of Ireland, in proportion to their means, just double the amount of taxes that was paid by Englishmen. Such were the results of 76 years' experience of the Union. The only inequality the Union had redressed was this — that whereas it was admitted at the time of the Union that if populations were taken as a test of representation, Ireland would be entitled to 170 Members, and the inequality in that respect had been rectified not by increasing the number of Members, but by the decrease of the population. He thought he had shown that there were good grounds for asking for a revision of the Union arrangements, for no one could say that the result of the experiment had been a success. An arrangement such as he proposed had never been suggested to Parliament until two years ago. After the Conference in Dublin the whole country was surprised by the announcement of the Dissolution of Parliament.

The sudden Dissolution was assumed to be favourable to those who had seats in the House, and the Home Rule Party had to displace many Gentlemen of influence, whose absence from Parliament was, in some respects, a loss to Ireland. However, Ireland returned at the last General Election 59 Members pledged to Home Rule in the way in which it was defined by the Conference. That was a fact that enforced the demand upon the House for some inquiry into the subject, and the Motion he submitted accordingly was one to inquire into the nature and extent of the justice of that demand. In dealing with the feeling of the Irish people on the subject, it should be remembered that the 76 years which had passed since the Union had not obliterated from the minds of the people the recollection of the prosperity enjoyed by their country during the brief period of its legislative independence. It was admitted that no country had ever progressed in prosperity as Ireland had done during the 18 years that elapsed from the declaration of independence to the passing of the Act of Union. Considering the decline in every department which followed the measure, could the people be blamed for attributing the poverty and misery of their country to the loss of their native Parliament? Nor could they forget the crimes by which the Act of Union was carried. It was a most unfortunate matter for both countries that the power of that House over Ireland avowedly and admittedly rested on acts of oppression, treachery, and crime as dark and as black as had ever disgraced any European Power. In proof of this assertion he would refer to a speech delivered by Lord Plunkett in the Irish Parliament, and a Protest against the Union signed by 20 of the most distinguished Members of the Irish House of Lords, headed by the Duke of Leinster. The present was the fourth occasion on which the question of Union had been formally brought before the Parliament of the United Kingdom. In 1810 Mr. Hutchinson, one of the Donoughmore family, brought it under the notice of the House of Commons. In 1834 it was again brought forward by Mr. O'Connell in a debate which occupied 10 days, and it was again brought forward a third time by himself two years ago. He thought everybody ought to feel satisfaction at having the question discussed, and, for his own part, he was not afraid of voting in a small minority. That lesson he had learnt from reading the speeches of Mr. Fox, who said it was a calamity to which he had become so accustomed that it had ceased to have effect upon him. Mr. Fox used this language only a very short time before he was at the head of the affairs of this country on the very same principles on which he had voted in those small minorities. With insignificant exceptions, the whole of the Irish people had adopted the plan of Federalism. Great meetings had ratified it; corporations had pronounced in its favour; Petitions had been presented on the same side; but, above all, 59 Members had been sent to this House, every one of whom was pledged to this programme. Now, he did not propose to refer to a Committee the question whether such a proposal ought to be adopted, because he should inevitably be told that he was sending the British Constitution to be dealt with upstairs. But he proposed that the Committee should collect information which would be of vital importance to the House, and which it was desirable the House should know. While he had confidence in the truth and justice of his own cause he believed it would prosper. In 1825 both Houses of Parliament appointed Committees to inquire into the state of Ireland, and the information thus collected broke down the prejudice against Catholic emancipation. In the same way the more Englishmen were brought into contact with the real nature and tendency of what Irishmen now desired, the more rapidly would existing prejudices against it be dispelled. Were a Committee appointed Englishmen would get rid of the impression that there was any wish for separation, or that he and others acting with him were not honestly endeavouring to strengthen the bonds between the two countries in that connection which was equally essential to the happiness and prosperity of both. Would the House, then, do well to refuse an inquiry which was desired by the Irish people? Did Englishmen distrust their own case, or were they going to tell the Irish people they held Ireland, not by reason, but by the strong arm of power, and that they refused every inquiry into their condition? Consider for a moment whether the Union as it now was gave to the Irish people the benefits of constitutional government? Constitutional government meant that there should be a Representative Assembly of the people, bringing the Executive Government into harmony with the feelings of the people. He asked Englishmen carefully and calmly to consider for a moment whether Irishmen had the benefits of constitutional government in Ireland? Were they wise in excluding the Irish from those benefits? Ought they not to remove that difficulty if they could? He meant no imputation upon the present Chief Secretary, to whom he gave every credit for his efforts to adapt the Irish Government to the wishes of the Irish people. But if the right hon. Baronet were to tell all he knew of the Castle of Dublin, and the prevailing influences there, he would probably admit that the highest principle of Irish statesmanship had been to thwart the wishes of the Irish people. In short, the British Constitution, as administered in Ireland, resembled the British Constitution in its integrity about as much as some of the caricatures in the comic papers resembled the originals; between the two there was a kind of hideous and grotesque likeness, which only made the contrast the more striking. The Irish people did not even benefit by that regard for the interests of Ireland which a despotic Government might supply—such as a despotic Government gave to Paris, and now supplied to Russia—for the Government was not composed of Irishmen. A Conservative gentleman, the late Rev. Charles Bayton, speaking in 1834, had said that there was no Government of Ireland, or for Ireland, and that Ireland was considered only as it furnished a battle-field for English parties. That was the declaration of a Conservative gentleman, made in the presence of an influential assembly, many of whom were Conservatives. The late Lord Clancarty, a man of strong Conservative opinions and of large landed property, had also pointed out how totally the Union had failed to yield the benefits expected from it; how backward Ireland was, as compared with England, in education and all that conduced to national life and prosperity; and how unfavourable was the 70 years' experience which Irishmen had of English and Imperial rule, because, whereas England enjoyed the advantage of being governed by those who were intimately acquainted with her interests, English Ministers cared little and understood less about the interests of Ireland. Coming to a very recent period, had Irish interests been dealt with in the way in which they deserved to be dealt with? Was the time given to the consideration of Irish measures really sufficient? Two years ago he proposed a measure to assimilate the privileges of Irish corporations in some small respects to the privileges of English boroughs. The Bill was assented to by the Government, passed this House without opposition, but it was thrown out in the other House; and from that hour to this he had never been able to pass the Bill. The right hon. Baronet (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had given his cordial assent to that Bill; but that made the case the stronger. Could such a result happen in a Parliament which did for Ireland what Parliament ought to do for her? Even at this moment there was pressing business affecting Ireland sufficient to occupy the attention of Parliament for a whole Session, and it was one of the evils of the present system that, physically, there was not sufficient time to devote to Irish Business. He would ask the House how often, upon purely Irish questions, the opinion of the immense majority of the Irish Members had been overruled by English and Scotch votes? If it happened only once or twice, it would be captious to object; but he would say it was not a good system of government when, upon questions peculiarly affecting Ireland, the voices of Irish Members were overruled in this House over and over again. Now, he would avow it, he had consulted with his Irish Friends on the subject, and the view he took of their duty was that they ought not, because they desired an Irish Parliament, to refuse to give to this House any assistance they could from their knowledge and experience of the country; and he could say for himself and his Friends that they had endeavoured to get good legislation from this House with as much earnestness and anxiety as if they never looked to an Irish Parliament. He could only say that the same labour would be applied with more advantage if they had a Parliament in Ireland and for Ireland. For instance, they prepared a Bill for Representative Boards in counties to manage fiscal affairs; 39 Irish Members were in favour of it, only 23 against it; but it was defeated in February by 181 to 153. Many years ago he was struck by the words of one from whom he would never be ashamed to learn—he meant the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), when he said that if he were an Irish Member, and had 30 people to vote with him, he would very soon obtain every measure that was necessary. On one occasion, when he instanced the difference between the municipal franchises and privileges of the two countries resulting from the Union, the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) rose and taunted him with not seeking the redress of those inequalities in this House. He thought that taunt was a strange one, seeing that the attempt had been twice defeated by the votes of the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends. He tried again, and he was not met by the opposition of the present Government. And here he must say, with regard to the removal of coercion, that Irish Members had got better and fairer terms for Ireland from the present than from the late Government. Well, he brought in a Bill to give Ireland a municipal franchise like that of England; 41 Irish Members voted for it, 16 against; but it was defeated by 176 to 148. He maintained that it was for the Irish themselves to say who should have the municipal franchise. That was not a question that affected the integrity of the Empire; yet in this matter Irish wishes were overruled by English votes. The preponderance of the Irish vote in favour of the proposal to assimilate the county franchise was still greater. On the 28th of March 57 Irish Members voted for it, 17 against—more than three to one. It could not be wondered at if, while that state of things existed, two years ago a Motion was carried for giving aid to the Irish fisheries; but though he believed the Chief Secretary for Ireland was as anxious to do something as himself, nothing was done by the Government. When the question was again brought before the House it was defeated by English Members, for again he believed the Scotch Members voted with the Irish. Had they even now an efficient Fishery Board? Seven years ago a Royal Commission recommended that the Irish Railways should be put under a Board to insure uniformity and cheap fares. In 1868 72 Peers possessing property in Ireland addressed the Government on the subject, and the same declaration was signed by all the Irish Members, except seven, who took a different view, and yet their prayer was disregarded. Had they done what might have been done for the Shannon? He believed it was still undrained; its waters were as "turbulent" as ever; and that nothing would be done in the matter until they got an Irish Parliament. Then look at the University question. Hon. Gentlemen unseated a powerful Government on that question, but there was no one who said that the University system was satisfactory to the country. Had that question been settled? Had it not been thrown upon a private individual like himself to try to settle it? But, if Ireland had an Irish Parliament, the opinion of the Parliament would have long since gone with the opinion of the country; or, if the English Parliament could properly discharge its duties to Ireland, which it never could, we should long ago have had some decision upon the Irish University question. He would not say that the Bill he had proposed on a previous night would have been passed by an Irish Parliament; but the people would have had the question discussed by their own Parliament, and the value of Parliamentary discussion, even reaching Ireland as it did now only in vague and uncertain echoes, was immense. He spoke of questions which would have been settled long ago, but Parliament had not time to attend to them. Every day since he had been in Parliament—now 20 years—there had been witnessed that of which he complained—the gradual encroachments upon the rights of discussion by private Members. Why? Not certainly because of any object on the part of Government, but because of absolute necessity arising from the mass of legislation which Parliament had taken upon itself. For instance, this year they had lost a great deal of time on the Merchant Shipping Bill, owing to the fact that Government were compelled last year to pass only a temporary Act. The pressure of business was breaking down what was once the great characteristic of that House—free discussion of the complaints and grievances of the people. This was the inevitable result of taking on themselves the work of three Parliaments. They could not do it. The necessity of business would eventually force the House to take some steps to alter the present arrangements. The letter of Lord Clancarty to which he had referred made a suggestion on this matter which was worthy of attention. He suggested as a preliminary step that at the meeting of Irish Members to be held in Dublin six weeks before the assembling of Parliament, a general Committee should be formed, which should report on all public Bills relating to Ireland. Due attention would thus be secured to the subject, a sense of responsibility for the work of legislation would be cast on that assembly, and measures might thus be brought forward which would lay the foundation of self-government. Lord Clancarty did not look on self-government as a wild and impracticable scheme. It had been stated repeatedly, and never denied—and when it was first stated there were statesmen living who could have denied it if it were untrue—that in 1844 a proposal was made by the Leaders of the Whig Party, then in Opposition, that Mr. O'Connell should take up Federalism; and he did take it up. How he was thwarted it was not for him (Mr. Butt) to say. What did The Times newspaper say in October, 1873? It said—

"If the demand for Home Rule should prove to be really the demand of the Irish people, we shall be compelled to consider the various changes and safeguards on which it will be necessary to insist."

And when the right hon. Gentleman opposite assumed the reins of Government in 1874, The Times said—

"Among the matters it will be an essential part of his duty to consider will be this—how far he can gratify the spirit of nationality without danger to the Empire."

On those grounds he (Mr. Butt) rested his present claim to have some alteration made in the arrangement adopted at the time of the Union. He did not wish to flatter the House, but—and he had said it in Ireland, he thought—he had observed a wonderfully improved tone towards Ireland on both sides of that Assembly. He had been in several Parliaments, and he said conscientiously and sincerely he never sat in a House in which Irish affairs were received with so much fairness and attention as they had in that. But that did not alter his opinion of the absolute necessity for changing the Union arrangements. Was use disposed to enter upon the conciliating Ireland? If they were there was no support to anything they had to forward such a course they were not ready to give. But let them shut their eyes to the facts. They were dealing with a people oppressed for seven centuries. It would not be in a few weeks or months that the effect of misgovernment would pass away. They had to deal with a people trained to distrust of English government—a people in whose minds misgovernment had awakened a thousand rankling imaginations. In the words of Macbeth he said to Parliament—

“thou not minister to a mind diseas'd;
from the memory a rooted sorrow;
out the written troubles of the brain;
with some sweet oblivious antidote, to stuff'd bosom of that perilous

might be told a great deal must be said to Irishmen themselves; and, if they would enter on the course they intended, he would say a solemn responsibility would be cast on every man to use no language that would have the effect of it. Parliament might

We reply as the physician did in the play, ‘Therein the patient must minister to himself.’” He believed she ministered to herself, and ministered a higher sense than that spoken of in the play. He believed no good intention on the part of that House or the Government could ever supply that which was instinctive knowledge of the wants and wishes of the people and which was necessary in legislation for her, and which could never be acquired by learning, only by residence in the country, and acquaintance with the people themselves. Did history give an example of a nation wisely governed except her own people? To use a very expressive term of The Times, if there is “a differentiation” between England and Ireland they did not want a separate Government; but if there was not a differentiation, they did. If that separate Government was given instead of weak-ness it would strengthen the bonds between the two countries. But he was not asking for a separate Parliament. He was only asking, if they were under consideration, to let them have a Committee to bring into the matter. What would the inquiry do? Home Rulers were told that some of them were seeking separation. Let them be brought to the bar of the Committee. Let them be cross-examined, and if it should be found that the intelligence and property of Ireland were not favourable to his proposals, let the Committee report against them and put an end to them. Let them see whether they were of so serious a character as they supposed—of a character so serious that they would destroy the whole strength and solidity of the Empire. It was not for him to answer at once every difficulty that might be raised; but on one point to which some weight had been attached, he might say that a very little statesmanship ought to suggest a plan to dispose of Irish Members usefully whilst the House was engaged in doing English business. Give them the Committee, however. That was all they asked. Let them bring the plan he proposed to the test of reason, to the test of cross-examination, that was all he asked, and then the people of England and the Members of that House would probably see that their proposals were not of so formidable a character as they had supposed. But let them not shut the door in their faces, and content themselves by saying that they meant to rule Ireland by force as heretofore—that their principle was to be sic volo, sic jubeo, stet pro ratione voluntas. They might fail in their attempt now, but it would be renewed next year. Let them grant the Committee, however, and let them select a man of character like the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire, who had vigour enough of intellect to preside over it, and who would inspire confidence in all parties by his presence. Let them unfold their case before him, let them show if their “veiled rebellion” was what it had been called. But they would bring their rebellion without its veil; and, believing in the thorough justice of their cause, he also believed that Ireland would come out triumphant. He did not wish, however, to trespass longer on the time of the House, and he would therefore conclude by submitting the Motion which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words

"a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and report upon the nature, the extent, and the grounds of the demand made by a large proportion of the Irish people for the restoration to Ireland of an Irish Parliament, with power to control the internal affairs of that Country,"—(Mr. Butt),

—instead thereof.

MR. P. J. SMYTH, who had given Notice to move as an Amendment to the Resolution of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt)—

"That, in the opinion of this House, Home Rule, as understood by a large proportion of the Irish people, is the restoration of the Parliament of Ireland with the legislative powers and prerogatives declared, by an Act of the Parliament of Great Britain, to have been 'established and ascertained for ever' by the international settlement of 1872," said: I must apologize to the House for obtruding myself so early in the debate, but it is owing to the fact that two months ago I gave Notice of an Amendment. Now, however, the original Resolution itself is moved as an Amendment, thereby excluding the Amendment which stands in my name on the Notice Paper. This question of Home Rule, on the basis of Federalism, was brought before the House in the Session of 1874, and although I voted in favour of it, I felt, in common, I believe, with every impartial listener to that debate, that its advocates failed to sustain by argument the peculiar scheme of Home Rule then, for the first time, submitted in the name of the Irish people. I think it is unfortunate that, after an interval of two years, the same scheme should come before us in a form still more unsatisfactory. When a Government, whether weak or strong, refers any matter of importance to a Select Committee or a Royal Commission, ill-natured people are sometimes found to say that it is done for the purpose of shelving the matter in question. I should be sorry to attribute any such motive to the hon. and learned Member for Limerick; but what purpose, in this instance, a Select Committee can be made to serve, if not that of a coroner's inquest, does not plainly appear. The hon. and learned Gentleman, in my mind, should, on this occasion, with the permission of the House, have embodied in a Bill his scheme of Home Rule. In that form, and in that form only, he could set forth the nature, the extent, and the grounds of his claim, and there would be no occasion to submit what he alleges to be the cause of a large proportion of his fellow-countrymen to be sat upon by a Select Committee of this House. A large number of Irish Bills, on subjects great and small, have been introduced, and some of them fully discussed this Session, and it is difficult to understand why this, the greatest of all subjects, should be presented in the shape of a Resolution which resolves nothing, and which, even if carried, would leave us as we were with regard to the very meaning of the words Home Rule. It will not do to say that the Resolution is a recognition of the principle of Home Rule, and that we must await the details; for in dealing with complex ideas the terms used to express them must be clearly defined. What is Home Rule? The most rev. Dr. MacHale has defined it as "a very ambiguous phrase;" John Mitchel defined it as "foreign rule;" Mr. O'Neill Daunt defined it as the "half loaf;" another eminent authority defined it as "the thin end of the wedge." Clearly, it is one of those rare questions where the minutest exposition of details is essential to the faintest comprehension of the principle. The word Parliament conveys to the mind the idea of supremacy; and I conceive it is incumbent on those who propound a novel scheme like this to explain clearly and categorically what is meant by those words of limitation, "internal affairs." When reference is made to a country, entitled by its position and importance to the possession of the grand institution of Parliament, the question naturally arises, what are internal and local, as contra-distinguished from external and Imperial affairs? Is control of the lines of railway communication in such a country an internal or an external affair? Is the encouragement of domestic industry by bounties or protective duties an internal or an external affair? Is the land, its settlement and its tenure, an internal or an external affair? Is the establishment or the disestablishment of a religion an internal or an external affair? Is taxation in all its branches an internal or an external affair? Is the appropriation of the supplies an internal or an external affair? Is an annual Mutiny Bill, embodying the principle that in time of peace a standing Army could not be legally maintained in the country without the consent of the Parliament of the country, an internal or an external affair? Is the embodiment of a national Militia and police an internal or an external affair? Is the finality of the decisions of the Courts of Law and of Equity, without appeal to an external tribunal, an internal or an external affair? Is the Post Office an internal or an external affair? Is the Criminal Code, in all its ramifications, an internal or an external affair? Is Education, in all its departments, an internal or an external affair? Sir, I might extend these interrogatories; they relate to matters of detail, it is true, but this House will admit they are details which, in whatever way they may be met, are of the very essence of the principle involved in the Resolution, and which should be understood before that Resolution can be even properly discussed. If the answer to these several interrogatories be signified by the word internal, then we have before us a proposal for a Parliament; if by the word external, then we must assume that a great proportion of the Irish people, through their Representatives in this House, pray for a Select Committee to take into consideration their claims to a vestry. If the extent and the grounds of the claim for Home Rule are shrouded in mystery, I am free to admit that the nature of the claim has been with sufficient distinctness defined. Its nature is that of a Federal arrangement, by which there would be constituted an Irish Parliament for the internal affairs of Ireland (whatever they may be), an English Parliament for the internal affairs of England, and an Imperial Parliament for what may be adjudged to be external or Imperial affairs. Thus we have three Parliaments to start with; for the Imperial Parliament will differ so materially as regards its objects, its prerogatives, its construction and composition from the local Parliaments, as to be quite a distinct institution. At certain fixed periods Ireland will pour 105 Imperial Representatives into the English local Parliament, and forthwith, as if by magic, the domestic institution becomes transformed into the Imperial, internal gives way to external, and all is turned inside out. The cock of the farm-yard assumes the eye, the beak, and the talons of the eagle, and, taking leave for a season of his hens and his chickens, he soars aloft, and from his eyrie surveys an Empire on which the sun never sets. An Imperial Parliament and an Imperial Administration, local Parliaments and local Administrations, local constituencies and Imperial constituencies; all this the hon. and learned Gentleman gravely assures us may be accomplished without serious disturbance of the existing Parliamentary system, or any fundamental change in the constitution of the Realm. The hon. and learned Gentleman is an eminent Constitutional lawyer, but, with the greatest deference to him, I must say that I can scarcely conceive a project involving more violent and wanton disturbance of the principles of the Constitution. I speak of it thus, assuming, for argument's sake, that it can be limited in its operation to England and Ireland alone; but no hon. Member will contend that it is susceptible of any such limitation. A local Parliament for Scotland, The Times has truly said, is the necessary correlative of a local Parliament for Ireland. Whatever measure of local government, The Scotsman says, Ireland gets, Scotland must get the same. Indeed, although Ireland only is named in the Resolution, Scotland is specifically included in the Federal arrangement propounded by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick. In his pamphlet, curiously entitled Irish Federalism (why not English or Scotch Federalism)? he says—

“The arrangement proposed is, I have said, that which is popularly known as a Federal union between the countries. It is not worth while to consider whether the word Federalism, in its proper sense, be the most appropriate term to express what is proposed. I will not even stop to inquire whether the union I suggest belongs to that class of arrangements which Lord Brougham calls Federal unions proper, or to those which he designates as improper or imperfect, or, as is more probable, is one partaking of the character of both. It is enough to say that I intend to propose a system under which England, Scotland and Ireland, united as they are under one Sovereign, should have a common Executive and a common national Council for all purposes necessary to constitute them, to other nations, as one State, while each of them should have its own domestic Administration and its own domestic Parliament for its internal affairs. I say each of them, because, although my immediate concern is only with Ireland, I do not suppose that if Irishmen obtain the separate management of Irish affairs it is at all likely that Englishmen or Scotchmen would consent to the management of their domestic concerns by a Parliament in which Irish Members had still a voice."

Thus Scotland necessarily falls into line, and so we find ourselves at the outset involved in the mazes of four Parliaments—three local and one Imperial. Will the disintegrating process end there? He is a bold man who will venture to say it would. If a local Parliament for Scotland is the necessary correlative of a local Parliament for Ireland, a local Parliament for Wales is the necessary correlative of a local Parliament for Scotland. Federalism is an elastic principle; its tendency is to minute subdivision. Is there not some reason to apprehend that Ulster will avail herself of the opportunity to sever the connection with the Catholic Provinces and open a little retail shop for legislative business of her own? Once open the Federal door, and doing so involves a total reconstruction of the Constitution, and closed it cannot be until the United Kingdom shall have been completely transformed into a Confederation, like Switzerland in Europe, or Canada or the United States in America. I understand the hon. and learned Gentleman to say that he disclaims any intention of making a demand; but the Resolution contains the word demand, implying that a Federal arrangement is the demand of Ireland. As matter of fact, it is not; but assuming that Ireland is so lost to all sense of dignity as to sanction the demand, the answer of this House must be—This is a British, much more than an Irish question; and so long as the people of England, Scotland and Wales are content to be legislated for in their local affairs by this Imperial Parliament, Ireland is out of Court, if she be not guilty, indeed, of a positive contempt of Court, in demanding that the Constitution shall be broken into fragments in order to satisfy her momentary caprice. A demand, on the part of Ireland alone, to Republicanize the institutions of the Empire, would be just as reasonable and just as feasible as to Federalize them. A demand implies a right, and a right to demand implies a right to enforce compliance; but this is a demand for a thing which never existed before, which Ireland never possessed, to which she can prove no title, which she cannot get without the full and free concurrence of her neighbours, and which she could not take, if she had the power, without inflicting serious wrong upon them, and outraging the principles of public morality and public law. It is quite right and proper that hon. Gentlemen who really believe in this Irish Federalism should endeavour, by all fair means, to propagate that theory; but I submit that the time to make a demand for a Federal arrangement will not have arrived until a clear majority of the people of England, Ireland and Scotland shall have signified their readiness to enter into such an arrangement. When that time comes there will be no occasion for a Select Committee. The Minister of the day will introduce a Bill; we shall legislate ourselves into the condition of the happy family; and under the hopeful motto, Divide et impera, we shall enter at last on a career of peace, unity and brotherly love. Speaking with reference to Ireland alone, it is my firm conviction that she does not desire a Federal arrangement of the nature of that expounded either by the Rev. Thadeus O'Malley—the father of Federalism—in his little book, or by his illustrious pupil, the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, in his pamphlet on Irish Federalism; that if offered it she would not, understandingly and with her eyes open, accept it; and that if imposed upon her, she would not abide by it. Were Ireland a discovery of the 19th century, like one of those coral isles—

"That like to rich and various gems inlay
The unadorned bosom of the deep."

she might commission a Representative to ask this honourable House to make a Constitution for her. But Ireland is an ancient kingdom with a far-reaching past and a not inglorious history. Her people represent an ancient and a famous race, with a past and a history, with feelings, traditions, instincts, all their own; and it is futile to suppose for a moment that such a country and such a people will accept a place in the Imperial system lower than that of the smallest colony born of yesterday, and indebted to fortuitous circumstances for a fluctuating and heterogenous population. The colonies have been referred to. Truly, the colonial Empire of England is a marvel of the 19th century, as it is unique in the history of mankind. When the American orator illustrated the greatness of England by that grand figure of the evening drum, with a belt of martial music encircling the globe, the colonial Empire presented a spectacle different far from that which now excites the applause of the world, and elevates the hopes of humanity. The orator spoke with reference only to trading settlements, military posts, dependencies; but, one by one, we have seen these posts, these settlements, these dependencies, come forth like stars through the darkness, and assume the position of free, self-governing States; till now, if by a lower figure, I might be allowed to illustrate a grander destiny, the Division Bell, as it resounds through the corridors of this House, awakes an echo in a hundred legislative halls, proclaiming in every zone, and in every clime, England to be, in the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), the mother of Parliaments. But they are free Parliaments, the free Parliaments of free States—no Federal tie subsists between them and the parent from which they sprung; no delusive representation in this House detracts from their dignity and their independence; no swollen Imperial Congress overawes from London their deliberations, and interposes its giant bulk between them and the central sun round which they revolve; the law of nature supplies the bond of connection; the faculty to separate only intensifies the resolve to be united; similarity of Constitutions is the cement of Empire; and, touched by the spirit of freedom, Canadian disaffection melts into loyalty, and the Maori becomes a peaceful legislator for the land whose soil he had with unconquerable valour defended. The colonial example, so far from sustaining the case of the hon. and learned Gentleman, illustrates most forcibly its absurdity—unless, indeed, it can be shown that England is prepared to adopt the political system which South Africa would not have, and that Ireland is willing to become the Manitoba of a British dominion. Such a destiny she may indeed accept when the day-star, Ireland a nation, shall have faded from the hearts of her children, but not till then. It is probable that at no distant day the Australian colonies will enter into Confederation so as to form an Australasian Dominion; it seems to be the natural system of government for a cluster of colonies, derived from the same parent-age, situated in near proximity to each other, the character of whose populations is similar, and whose circumstances and interests are identical. But all those conditions are wanting here—conspicuously absent, above all, is the indispensable condition of political equality. Victoria and New South Wales may federate, because they are both free agents; in their Governments and their Administrations they are independent one of the other; in like manner Barbadoes and Tobago may federate; but Ireland and England should separate that they might federate. Put Ireland in the position of the Canadian Dominion, or of any of the countries composing the Australasian group, revive the Constitution of 1782—then, if there be anything to treat about, Parliament can treat with Parliament freely and constitutionally, and the relations of the two countries may be so fixed and established as to insure to each the free development of its national life under a common crown—

I am aware that the idea of a federation of the whole Empire finds favour with a few not uninfluential persons in this country. Whether Imperial Confederation shall ever attain the importance of being discussed as a question of practical statesmanship, depends chiefly on the colonies. If it finds any favour amongst them, it will, should the occasion arise, be freely discussed in their free local Legislatures, and their decision upon it will be conclusive. At present it is not a question of practical statesmanship, nor is it likely, I think, ever to become one, unless, by some new discovery in political science, it can be demonstrated that local legislative independence is compatible with representation in an Imperial Parliament. That is a problem which has never yet been solved in this world. In Confederation each Member surrenders its distinctive nationality, if it possesses such, and yields up a certain portion of its liberty, in order to give strength, and title, and authority to the union. Thus it is in Canada and the United States. But where two countries, in both of which there exist, though it may be in very unequal degree, the capacities for self-government, together with the passion for independence, are so circumstanced that either total separation or complete amalgamation is impossible or undesirable, the political relation must be based on the principle of unity of Empire and separation of Parliament. That is dualism as between Norway and Sweden, Hungary and Austria, Canada and the United Kingdom, the Australias and the United Kingdom. The Crown, in these cases, is not a fetter, whether of iron or of gold, it is the symbol merely of a contract in conformity with the law of nature, and which may defy disruption while it rests upon freedom. The hon. and learned Gentleman dwelt largely on Irish grievances. A higher and safer ground would be that of national right. Grievances may be redressed, but right is an abiding principle. Grievances vary. The grievance of England may be conventual and monastic institutions, or the Claimant; the grievance of Scotland may be gas, or church rates; the grievance of Wales may be Judges ignorant of the language of the country; the grievance of Ireland may be any Act, good, bad, or indifferent, emanating from a British or Imperial source, and it is proposed to construct a bed of Procrustes, whereon all the aggrieved may lie down together, rolled up in the wet blanket of Federalism. The House has been told repeatedly this Session, in tones of solemn earnestness, that the pacification of Ireland imperatively demanded the passage of some particular Bill—a Town Franchise, a Municipal Privilege, a Fishery, or a Land Bill. The logical inference from the language used is, that if this grievance be redressed, and that inequality removed, that if Ireland be ameliorated by the legislation of this House, she will become pacific, and reconciled to the control of this Imperial Parliament for evermore. If that is the idea intended to be conveyed—and the language admits of no other construction—Home Rule, I fear, will have a protracted existence, for grievances there will always be, even in the best regulated families and States; but it will exist as the Shibboleth of a Party, not as the rallying cry of a nation. If, as the House has been assured, the Irish people are now trained and educated to look to Parliament for redress of grievances, and if a measure of comparatively such trivial importance as a Town Franchise Bill will go far to insure contentment, I am at a loss to discover wherein the raison d'être of a Home Rule Party consists at all, and why such men as Mr. Pim, Sir Dominic Corrigan, Mr. Bagwell, Mr. Chichester Fortescue, and others, were rejected at the General Election. They would not adopt the Shibboleth, but there was no reason to suppose that they would not have supported measures of just amelioration. In my own county the representation was contested by two resident proprietors—one, Sir Richard Levinge, a Conservative; the other, Captain Greville, an officer of the late Government; and I am free to declare for myself that, if it could have been foretold that Home Rule would sink in this House to a thing of small grievances, I should have paused before being a party to deprive either of these gentlemen of the position he is qualified to fill. Now, the greatest of Irish grievances is absenteeism, and it must be admitted that the Home Rule that is inadequate to provide a remedy for that, can scarcely afford to stand even on the low ground of grievance. I might even go so far as to say that such a Home Rule would be, not a panacea for existing grievances, but a source of fresh calamities. Long before the era of independence, Irish Parliaments, though fettered and restricted, dealt severely with absenteeism. Sir John Davies, Attorney General to Queen Elizabeth and James I., says—

“All writers do attribute the decay and loss of Leinster (then the extent of the English Pale) to the absence of those Lords who married the five daughters of William Marshal, Earl of Pembroke, to whom that great seignory descended. These great Lords, having greater inheritances in their own right in England than they had in Ireland in right of their wives (and yet each of the co-partners had an entire county allotted for her proportion), could not be drawn to make their personal residence in this kingdom, but managed their estates by their seneschals and servants. The grievance did not long elude the vigilance of the English Justinian: and accordingly, in a few years after the titles alluded to had vested, viz., about the year 1295, it appears from that venerable muniment, the Liber Niger of Christ Church, that at a general Parliament, or great Council, then held in Ireland, it was enacted, inter alia, that absentee English lords, who drew the profits of their Irish territory without any return, should be compelled to contribute a portion for the safety of their estates and tenantry.”

In 1310 an ordinance was promulgated by the authority of the chief Governor of Ireland and the whole Council, directing an absolute estreat of the rents of all the lands of absentees, and that they should be deposited in the treasury, to be appropriated to the King for the conservation of the peace and defence of the land. In the reign of Henry VIII. a statute was passed, whereby, after setting forth

“That it was notorious and manifest that Ireland had grown into ruin, desolation, rebellion, and decay, by reason of great proprietors of it residing in England, and not providing for the good order and security of same,”

“King, his heirs, &c., shall have and enjoy all houses, manors, lands, &c., of certain nobles therein named.”

This legislative sanction was followed by a resumption of the immense estates of the Duke of Norfolk and Lord Berkly, in the counties of Carlow and Waterford, and those of the Earl of Shrewsbury in the latter county. It is a significant fact that absenteeism increased or diminished in proportion as the powers of the Parliament of Ireland were restricted or enlarged. The absentee drain, which in 1782 stood at about £2,000,000, had declined to about £800,000 in 1800, the year of the Union. It amounts now, there is reason to believe, to upwards of £4,000,000, the purchase-money every year of a Suez Canal. How would this grievance be affected by the new-fangled scheme of Home Rule? It would continue, because London would still be the centre of attraction, the chief seat of government and of legislation; it would continue, and with the superadded and unprecedented grievance that both the local and the Imperial Parliaments would be debarred by the Federal Constitution, by the very nature of the Federal arrangement, from applying an effective remedy. A separate Irish Parliament could impose an absentee tax, or compel a sale of the absentee estates; this Imperial Parliament could do the same to-morrow; but federation would tie the hands of both Parliaments, and thus the giant grievance of Ireland would be perpetuated and rendered irremovable. I will test this scheme by another grievance, on which much stress has been laid—the coercion grievance. If we examine the various Coercion Acts passed by this House from the Union to the present day, it will be found that each and every one of them has had an Imperial object. Arms Acts, Treason Felony Acts, Crime and Outrage Acts,

Peace Preservation Acts, Habeas Corpus Suspension Acts—all, no matter what the titles, what the pretence on which proposed, have had one and the same object in view, to prevent the acquisition of arms by the people, and maintain the Union, or, as it is called, the integrity of the Empire. Coercion, therefore, in the scheme of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, would manifestly be an external or Imperial affair. So much, indeed, he himself explicitly admits in his treatise on Irish Federalism. He says there—

“I am far from supposing that in this sketch I have indicated all the matters which, on reflection and discussion, it might be found advisable to reserve to the Imperial Parliament. In America the criminal laws relating to offences against the Union, and the regulation of the criminal procedure relating to their trial, are vested in Congress, and not in the Legislature of each State. In Canada, while each Province regulates the civil procedure of the Courts, the procedure in criminal cases can only be altered by a law of the Parliament of the Dominion. It would be easy to suggest other matters in regard to which some reason might be urged for leaving them to the Imperial Parliament.”

Just so—nothing more easy; but what does that mean, if not more political prisoners, and Amnesty Association a permanent institution of the country? He must be a very sanguine Federalist indeed who expects that the era of political offences will close with the creation of a political cul-de-sac, from which there would be no possibility of escape but by revolution. Shilling pamphlets on dry subjects find a very limited circulation in Ireland; the readers are confined to a Select Committee; but if it were explained to the people that Home Rule meant the rod of coercion firmly secured in the Imperial hand, and the trial and punishment of political offences acknowledged and confirmed as an Imperial function, how many Home Rulers would there be among the classes that now compose the demonstrations with Amnesty on their banners and green ribbons in their breasts? I know not what version of Home Rule may have been given in Burnley and Manchester to justify the exultant telegrams—“Home Rule victories”—transmitted to Dublin in February last; but I am pretty confident that the Home Rule of the English hustings would fail to pass muster on the Tipperary hills. National independence is understood there, but a Federal arrangement is understood neither here nor there. Tried by any test that either Imperial statesmanship or Irish patriotism can apply—Imperial unity or national independence, constitutional principle or Irish right—precedent, authority, expediency, or feasibility — Irish Home Rule stands condemned. It is not restoration, it is innovation; it is not unity, it is dismemberment; it is not national independence, it is national annihilation; it surrenders the Constitution of one country, and subverts that of another, in order to erect with the fragments a model lodging-house, in which the family would merge in the household, and the personal freedom of every occupant would be at the mercy of a composite majority. It never can be realized till England renounces her mission to be great, and Ireland relinquishes her title to be free. Has Ireland, then, no cause on which a virtuous people might take their stand, and enlist on their side the sympathies of mankind? I should be sorry to rest the cause of Ireland on charter, or compact, or Act of Parliament. Her title to liberty is from Heaven; but charter may be appealed to, not, indeed, as evidence of the right to enjoy liberty, but of an agreement to enjoy it according to certain forms, conformably with the will of the people. The charter of King John to the Barons of England, at Runnymede, did not constitute their title to liberty; it was but a record of the manner in which they wished to be governed by their Kings. Ireland's title to independence is as strong now as in 1782, but the international settlement of that year remains an indefeasible record of an agreement that she should enjoy in security and peace that independence according to the forms therein sanctioned and prescribed. Previous to the 10th year of the reign of King Henry VII., the Irish Parliament, such as it was, had claimed and exercised the right of legislation, though interrupted by occasional interference on the part of England, in the same manner as the right of legislation was enjoyed by the Parliament of this country. The Irish Parliament passed laws for Ireland, with a negative power vested in the Crown. By the law of Poyning, made in the 10th year of that reign, the course of legislation was reversed; the original and efficient powers of legislation were thereby vested in the Crown, and the Parliament was left a negative voice merely on the ordinances of the Prince. Ireland protested against that Act as usurpation. The political relation continued in this state till the sixth year of King George I., when an Act was passed declaring that the King and Parliament of Great Britain had, and of right ought to have, full power and authority to make laws to bind the people of Ireland. This was regarded as an open and undisguised claim of conquest, not on the part of England merely, but of Scotland also, through her Representatives in the Parliament of Great Britain, although it had never been pretended that Scotland had had anything to do with a conquest of Ireland. The controversy between the Parliament of Great Britain, contending for supremacy, and that of Ireland for independence, excited by this act, continued for 60 years, and resulted at last, in the year of 1782, in the total and absolute triumph of Ireland. Ireland's Declaration of Right, that the Crown of Ireland was an Imperial Crown, inseparably annexed to the Crown of Great Britain, but that the Kingdom of Ireland was a distinct Kingdom, with a Parliament of her own, the sole Legislature thereof, and that no power on earth, except the King, Lords and Commons of Ireland, have a right to make laws to bind Ireland, was formally accepted and unreservedly acquiesced in by the Parliament of Great Britain. Poyning's Act—being an Irish Act—was repealed by the Parliament of Ireland; and the 6 Geo. I., c. 5, was unconditionally repealed by an Act of the Parliament of Great Britain, the 22 Geo. III. c. 52. By a subsequent Act, the 23 Geo. III. c. 28, the Parliament of Great Britain renounced for ever the right to bind Ireland by its laws, and declared and enacted—

“That the right claimed by the people of Ireland to be bound only by laws enacted by the King of England and the Parliament of Ireland, in all cases whatever, and to have all actions and suits at law or in equity, which might be instituted in Ireland, decided in the King's Courts therein, finally, and without appeal from thence, should be, and was thereby declared to be established and ascertained ‘for ever, and should at no time thereafter be questioned or questionable.’”

These several Acts, each Act a record, constitute the international settlement of 1782. It was a manifold transaction, and no single element was wanting that could impart to it a character of the utmost solemnity and completeness. It was a final adjustment—declared so to be by the King and Parliament of Great Britain—declared so to be by the Parliament of Ireland, and the King's Representative in that Kingdom. It left unsettled no constitutional question between the two countries—it was a solemn covenant, under the sanction of the Law of Nations, and to its faithful observance the honour of both peoples was irrevocably pledged. Eighteen years later the covenant was violated, the compact broken, and the Parliament whose independent existence for ever was guaranteed by the Constitution of 1782, was flagitiously destroyed. Mr. (Earl) Grey, opposing the Union measure in this House, said—"Arts 'were had recourse to which I could not name in this place.'" Equally respecting the feelings of this House, I shall imitate his reticence. Sufficient to know, that amid the terrors of martial law, the Minister first packed the Parliament, and then bought with Irish money the votes of his own nominees. The nation was unanimous against the Union. Twenty-seven counties, and all the large cities and towns, protested against the measure; 3,000 persons only, for the most part officials and convicts in the gaols, could be induced to petition in favour of it; 700,000 persons petitioned against it; and a faithful minority of 120 high-minded and incorruptible Representatives stood by the Constitution of their country to the last. So the Union was carried. Ireland, as a nation, was obliterated, while, by a singular anachronism, she was left the shadow of a Court and the shadow of a name. The right of Ireland, if she be so minded, to demand the repeal of that Act, is clear and indisputable. Repeal of the Union is not the fantastic creation of a theorist, a revolutionary experiment, a puerile attempt to give to an airy nothing

"A local habitation and a name;"

it is simple justice—the re-establishment of a political relation that existed in the lifetime of some not yet passed away, a relation that worked well in the interests of both countries, that brought to Ireland great material prosperity, and to England generous help in an emergency; it is restoration of a right acknowledged, and restitution for a wrong committed.

The Union Act removed, the Constitution of 1782 would spring immediately into life, and the necessary re-construction of the Parliament of Ireland on a Reform principle would vindicate the ends of justice and satisfy legitimate aspirations. This is the form in which the question of self-government presented itself invariably to the mind of Mr. O'Connell, and that which Mr. Grattan, in a letter written in 1811 to a constituent, Mr. La Touche, declared himself ready to support. It is in this form the question should be submitted to this House, or not at all. So submitted, it might be beaten by numbers, but by argument never. Outvoted in the Lobby, it would have its triumph in the public breast, where the Teller is the human conscience. The advocate of Repeal is not called upon to show that the Constitution of 1782 was, in all respects, the perfection of human wisdom; enough for him to feel that Ireland was indebted for it to her own genius and her own right hand; that inherent in it were ample powers to correct all abuses and remedy all defects; and that it was the broad charter of the legislative independence of his country. The Parliament which sat under it never had fair play. Ere the spirit of reform and religious liberty had time to set it free from the trammels of an old ascendancy, it was called upon to fight for its existence. Let the shame of its fall rest on the head of the seducer; but to it let not the glory be denied of having produced a greater proportion of learned, eloquent, and honourable men than there were ever before congregated in a single Legislative Chamber. There is incontestible evidence that had this scheme of Home Rule been submitted to the Irish Parliament in 1800, in lieu of the Union, it would have been opposed as vehemently by the patriot party in that House as was the measure of the Union itself; and that to the advocates of the one, as to the promoters of the other, Plunkett would have addressed his indignant warning:—"Do not dare to lay your hands on the Constitution; it is above your power." England, that decreed a grave in the venerable Abbey to Henry Grattan, has cast a laurel on the grave of Francis Deak in Buda Pesth, but the patriot of Ireland and the patriot of Hungary share a common immortality of fame as the founders of identical constitutions. Hungary's Constitution had slept till awakened by the cannon of Sadowa, and better that Ireland's Constitution should sleep on for yet three quarters of a century more, than that Ireland, of her own motion, should annul that treaty of liberty by a treaty of slavery, and, with her own hand, efface off her title to independence the indefeasible record.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, that when he commenced his political studies he carefully read the speeches of the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Smyth), and learnt to feel with him that Ireland had a national destiny to pursue which was not in all respects identical with the destiny marked out for her by the Imperial Parliament. He (Mr. O'Connor Power) did not yield to the hon. Member for Westmeath in his desire to see Irish nationality preserved, but he could not follow the hon. Gentleman in opposing the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, because he believed that proposal would be found more just, both to Ireland and England, than the plan which he presumed the hon. Member for Westmeath would be prepared to submit if he could count on the support of any large Party in the House. The manner in which the different parts of his speech had been received was in itself conclusive evidence that he did not echo, in the whole course of his remarks, the sentiments of the Irish people. He hoped that hon. Members on both sides of the House would not draw a mistaken conclusion from the opposition of the hon. Gentleman to the question at issue. The true and only conclusion which hon. Gentlemen who were opposed to the hon. and learned Member for Limerick could reasonably draw from the speech of the hon. Member for Westmeath was, that in some form or other it was necessary to satisfy the legitimate aspirations of the Irish people to possess an Irish Parliament for the management of Irish affairs. He (Mr. O'Connor Power) should be glad to see reproduced in the modern history of Ireland the prosperity enjoyed by the country from 1782 to 1800, and that could only be done by permitting Irishmen to manage Irish affairs. The hon. Member for Westmeath must know, however, that from the very moment when England granted the legislative independence of Ireland in 1782 some of her greatest statesmen were plotting for the overthrow of the Irish Constitution. Charles James Fox, the Liberal English statesman, was a strong opponent of the union of the two Parliaments, but still he perceived that the Constitution of 1782 was not made of durable material. Fox saw that it meant either Irish independence or Imperial usurpation, and he said in reference to the Union—

“While I feel bound to give every opposition to this measure, as a measure calculated to sow the seeds of animosity between the two peoples, I am bound at the same time to point out that unless the Constitution of 1782 is reformed in such a manner as will fairly balance the powers of the Irish Parliament on the one hand, and of the Imperial Parliament on the other, you can expect nothing but perpetual strife between both Legislatures.”

If we could return to the Parliament of 1782, Ireland would in some respects exercise a greater national power than she would under the Federal arrangement proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick. For instance, whenever England went to war, it would be in the power of the Irish Parliament to withhold Supplies. When, however, we discussed this question, regarding Ireland as being still a portion of the British Empire, he maintained there was no other solution of the Irish difficulty than that proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick. How could it be said that Ireland was an integral portion of the British Empire, if Ireland could abandon England in the most terrible crisis of her fate? That was the only excuse he had been able to discover for the policy of Conservative statesmen in destroying the Irish House of Commons. The Irish Parliament, which would be given under the proposal of the hon. and learned Member, would be far beyond “a Vestry.” The people of Ireland knew far less of the effect of the repeal of the Union than of that of the proposal for Federation, for the latter system was in operation in 39 independent States on the other side of the Atlantic, where peace, domestic and national prosperity prevailed. These questions had first been discussed on the ground of principle, and no doubt the question what matters were local and what Imperial was a difficult one; but it was unnecessary to enter into details before public opinion in this country was further pronounced in favour of the general principle of an Irish Parliament for Irish affairs. That was the only principle with regard to Ireland in connection with the matter before the House of Commons. Still the difficulty was not insuperable. In the United States the distinction between these questions raised no difficulty. The hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Smyth) mentioned the questions of an amnesty, the Post Office, and the Militia. Now, if Ireland had a Parliament intrusted with the management of its own affairs, his (Mr. O'Connor Power's) belief was that Parliament would never again hear of a Coercion Bill nor of political prisoners. He believed also that the questions of coercion and amnesty would have been shelved for ever; because he believed the people of Ireland free could govern Ireland according to her wishes and feelings, and would so regulate and manage them as to obviate the necessity of revolution. The class of subjects with which the Irish Parliament would deal under the Federal system would resemble that which came before the State Legislature of New York, who had not the control of the Post Office, but did control the local police and the local Militia in all matters appertaining to the State. The hon. Member for Westmeath had very skilfully reproduced an objection raised by the Prime Minister two years ago, and that objection referred to the difficulty of deciding when Imperial questions should be discussed by the Parliament, and when, therefore, the 103 Irish Representatives would legitimately be admissible into its discussions. He did not see why Irish Members might not quietly and assiduously attend to Irish affairs in Dublin without interfering with Imperial affairs in that House, nor why certain months in the Session—say the last two months—should not be set apart for the discussion of Imperial questions. The earlier part of the Session would be occupied by the Irish Members in discussing Irish questions, while the Imperial Parliament, consisting then exclusively of English and Scotch Members, would be occupied by English and Scotch subjects. The objections of the hon. Member for Westmeath were ill-timed. The hon. Member might have been more consistent, because he had formerly been a loyal supporter of the principles of Home government. No national demand for Parliamentary rights and national government had been made by Ireland since the time of Daniel O'Connell until the election of the party represented by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick. He wished, therefore, to make a few observations on the advisability of appointing this Committee. There could be no doubt that those who would vote for the Committee would be suspected of some sympathy with the demand of the Irish people for an Irish Parliament. It had been said that Irish Members had not displayed such an amount of statesmanship or capability as would warrant the Government in consenting to the renewal of an Irish Parliament. But the manner in which their discussions were conducted in that House was a proof of their political intelligence. When this subject was last submitted to that House the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland went into figures to show how Ireland had deteriorated under the Parliament of '82. The contrary, however, could be shown to be the case. Mr. Justice Jebb in 1798 said that within the preceding 16 years the commerce, agriculture, and manufactures of Ireland had prospered to an extent that her most sanguine friends would not have dared to prognosticate. On the 18th of December in the same year the bankers of the city of Dublin passed a resolution, showing that since the abandonment of the government of Great Britain over Ireland the commerce of the country had increased; and a further resolution was passed by an overwhelming majority in favour of maintaining the independence of an Irish Parliament. Mr. Foster, Speaker of the Irish House of Commons, joined his testimony to that of Mr. Justice Jebb; and Mr. Plunkett (afterwards Lord Chancellor), in a remarkable speech in 1800, declared that the trade, commerce, and agriculture of Ireland had advanced to an extent that could not have been anticipated in so small a country. These were the testimonies of the Patriot Party. The evidence of Lord Clare on the other side was equally emphatic, for he declared that there was no nation on the habitable globe which had advanced in cultivation and commerce, in agriculture and manufactures, with the same rapidity in the same period of time. Why, then, did the statesmen of England endeavour to promote a union of the two countries?

Speeches by the Hon. Mr. Pitt and Lord Castlereagh at the time said it was necessary to promote the union of the two Parliaments for the security of the two countries, and the better union of the Empire. But if the Hon. Mr. Pitt and Lord Castlereagh committed the mistake, the present Parliament could have no such excuse. He denied that the Union of the last 76 years had promoted the peace of Ireland or the integrity of the British Empire. The House of Commons knew very well that Ireland had not enjoyed political peace. Twice since 1803 Ireland had been involved in rebellion, 19 times the Constitution had been suspended in that country, millions of the people had been expatriated and their places filled by cattle, and only a few years ago the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, then a Member of the Cabinet, said that the present system had failed to promote the integrity of the Empire, for wherever an Irishman placed his foot upon a foreign shore there stood an enemy to England. Who were the men who had distinguished themselves during the period? To find their names they must search the records of the Law Courts and the lists of the convict ships that carried them away to distant lands, because nature endowed them with a spirit that could not bow to slavery. It was clear that the present state of things failed to secure the peace of Ireland, or the integrity of the Empire, and there could be no doubt that the policy of Her Majesty's Government in that respect was a very unsafe and a very inexpedient policy. What could be a greater commentary on this policy than that daring men should have found their way to Western Australia and torn the prisoners out of the heart of the prisons there. It was that feeling which actuated millions across the Atlantic. The Government had refused to mitigate by the remission of a single hour the sentence of imprisonment imposed on their fallen foes; they had rejected the appeal for an amnesty signed by 136 Members of that House; they had declined to allow any of them to look inside the prison walls, lest the cruelties practised on Irish prisoners should be revealed to the world; and having been amongst the Irish people in America, and knowing how they were animated by the glorious passion of patriotism, he charged the Conservative Government with being the promoters of disorder, with sanctioning a policy which was creating a power amongst the exiled Irish race that might yet be used by the enemies of national union to lay the greatness of England in the dust. He maintained that the people of England had more to gain than to lose by the emancipation of the Irish people. He, therefore, appealed to the House of Commons not to favour such a policy, and called upon them to support the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, which he trusted would meet with the general approval of the House.

MR. KAVANAGH: I would be glad of the opportunity to say a few words on the subject of the Motion which is now before the House. Regarding it in the light I do, I am bound to call it No. 2 in the series of topics which have been invented and started for the object of agitation. Last night we were engaged in debating what I may call No. 1 topic, and it, I think, throws an instructive light upon the present question, but to that I shall refer more particularly by-and-by. I must say with reference to the present Motion—and I say it with every respect to the hon. and learned Member who brings it forward—that I have some difficulty in bringing myself to look on its own merits from a serious point of view. The case is, however, far different when I consider the object with which it is brought forward, for I may as well tell the House frankly and openly at once that I believe the object to be the same as prompted the introduction of the measure which we considered last night, and that is simply this—to keep alive agitation and discontent in Ireland. However that may be, we are bound, I think, out of respect for the hon. and learned Member who brings it forward, if for no other reason, to give his Motion as fair and dispassionate a consideration as we can. The hon. and learned Member moves for a Select Committee to inquire into certain matters, and immediately following this Notice on the Paper there stands the Notice of an Amendment to it that would have been proposed by another hon. Member—had the Rules of the House allowed him—who, if he does not lead,

resents a different sect in this Home
creed—

Mr. Butt,—To move, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and report the nature, the extent, and the grounds of demand made by a large proportion of the people for the restoration to Ireland of an Parliament, with power to control the local affairs of that country.

Mr. P. J. Smyth,—As an Amendment to Butt's Resolution for Select Committee reference to Home Rule, to move to omit the word 'That,' in order to insert the words 'in the opinion of this House Home Rule as understood by a large proportion of the Irish people, is the restoration of the Parliament of Ireland with the legislative powers and prerogatives declared, by an Act of the Parliament of Great Britain, to have been established and ascertained for ever' by the Act of Union of 1801.

These two Notices, although they differ slightly as to details, practically and in point at the same end. The Amendment asks the House at once to pronounce an opinion that there should be separation between England and Ireland; the Motion asks for a Select Committee to inquire into the grounds of the demand made—for I believe a modified form of separation, now though I do not for a minute believe either the Amendment or the Motion will find much favour in the House, do not really require any of my efforts to secure their rejection. As the Motion is founded on the able grounds of merely asking for a Committee of Inquiry, I must say a few words about it. I think before this House consents to appoint a Committee of Inquiry, it should satisfy itself that the object of the Motion is reasonable in itself—commendable on its own merits. A case may arise, and I am sure has often arisen, where a large number of people desire something which might be merely injurious and prejudicial to their neighbours, and which might be only utterly insupportable on its merits, but really bad for those who desire it most; and I hope, therefore, the House will consider earnestly whether these hypothesis might not be in accordance with truth to the present case. As I can assure the House—that, if persuaded that this separation—modified separation—would be for the benefit of my country and the Commonwealth, I would advocate it to the best of my ability. It is because I am strongly convinced and satisfied that it would have diametrically opposite results that I take the course I am now following. I have often heard it stated that a Divine right has been given to every nation to govern itself. I do not believe it. I do not believe that the Almighty in His inscrutable and infallible wisdom would give a right to a nation, and withhold from that nation the power to exercise that right. Now, although that appears to me self-evident, I do not ask the House to accept it solely on my own responsibility, and with permission I will read a few short extracts from a well-known historical author, Mr. Froude—

“When two countries, or sections of countries, stand geographically so related to one another that their union under a common government will conduce to the advantage of one of them, such countries will continue separate as long only as there is equality of force between them, or as long as the country which desires to preserve its independence possesses a power of resistance so rigorous that the effort to overcome it is too exhausting to be permanently maintained.

“Individuals cannot be independent, or society cannot exist. With individuals the contention is not for freedom absolutely, but for an extension of the limits within which their freedom must be restrained. The independence of nations is spoken of sometimes as if it rested on another foundation—as if each separate race or community had a divine title deed to dispose of its fortunes and develop its tendencies in such direction as seems good to itself. But the assumption breaks down before the inquiry, what constitutes a nation? And the right of a people to self-government consists and can consist in nothing but their power to defend themselves. No other definition is possible. Are geographical boundaries or a distinct frontier, made the essential? Mountain chains, rivers, or seas, form, no doubt, the normal dividing lines between nation and nation, because they are elements of strength, and material obstacles to invasion. But as the absence of a defined frontier cannot take away a right to liberty where there is strength to maintain it, a mountain barrier conveys no prerogative against a power which is powerful enough to overleap that barrier, nor the ocean against those whose larger skill and courage can convert the ocean into a highway.”

The historian here, I think, supports the opinion which I have expressed. He defines what constitutes a nation, and that is, in his opinion, the power to defend itself. He refers again to that power or strength, and he states that the possession of strength will be rendered evident by the presence of those qualities which will secure its proper use. His words are these—which gives the right to freedom, implies the presence of those qualities which ensure that it will be rightly used."

Now, I fear the class of my fellow-countrymen who clamour for the right of self-government fail utterly to show the possession of those qualities which would insure its proper use, and if we are to take that as a proof of the presence of power to defend, we have, I say it with sorrow, the strongest evidence of its entire absence. I must guard myself from the chance of its being supposed that I intend this remark to apply generally to all classes of my fellow-countrymen—I do not. I believe firmly that there is a large and important class who form the real nucleus and backbone, as it were, of the Irish nation, in every way qualified to discharge with credit to themselves the highest and most responsible duties. I will ask, how many Irishmen have risen to offices of high state and responsibility in this Empire? But it is not from them this clamour comes—they are content quietly to mind their business and to do their best to discharge the duties of the stations in which God has placed them, instead of wasting their time and talents in grasping at positions and possessions that he has not given them. Judging the question then with Mr. Froude's assistance, I must confess I do not see that Ireland possesses that Divine right which it is urged she does to govern herself. If she did succeed in severing herself from England I should fear, judging her future history from her past, that torn to pieces by internal dissensions she would only become the prize of some other nation whose rule would be such as to render the position of her inhabitants utterly intolerable. I do not admit that Ireland is ruled by England. I assert that under the present Constitution there exists no such difference of position as the ruler and the ruled. I look upon Ireland now as a component and by no means an insignificant part of the first Empire in the world, and for what are we asked to change this our undeniable position? Allowing, for argument sake, that Mr. Froude is wrong and that Ireland does possess the qualifications to entitle her to govern herself, assuming that she had the power to stand by herself in national independence, what would our position be compared with that which we now occupy? We should be a struggling, insignificant

State, fortunate if, in the course of a few short years, we did not come to the same end as the Kilkenny cats, who, as some history or another says, continued to fight among themselves till there was nothing but their tails left. But I will not pursue this line of argument further, because, I must confess, so far as I have heard of the question, I am relieved of any necessity to do so by the wide difference of opinion which exists among those who advocate this separation and the indefinite nature of the proposals which are put before us. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick advocates, if I understand him right, not entire separation, but a kind of Federal connection, but how that is to be arranged and carried out I have failed to understand. But the hon. and learned Member knows himself that in advocating that Federal scheme he does not represent the opinions of the entire class of Home Rulers. He knows, I believe, that he has only to go among his own constituents to discover that there a different sect exists who were once upon the point of handling him roughly, if the papers speak the truth, because his opinions were too milk-and-water for their notions. This sect, I believe, go in broadly for entire separation and for a distinct and separate nationality. However that may be, I think this House before it undertook to go into the consideration of any question of such magnitude, might very fairly require that those who clamour for this change should have made up their minds and agreed among themselves as to what it is they really do want. I must confess that among all the vague and conflicting schemes which are ventilated and proposed by one party and by another, I am, myself, utterly at a loss to know what that is, and I believe they are in the same condition of doubt and difficulty themselves. Under these circumstances, I think it is only fair and right that we, who are asked to pronounce an opinion on the subject, should seek for information and enlightenment wherever we could get it. There is an old saying, "That straws show the way the wind blows," and we may therefore, I think, fairly assume that the Bills which have been introduced into this House by the hon. Members opposite, who profess Home Rule opinions, and the action which they have taken with regard to other Bills, may be taken as a

indication of the sort of government that would be carried on in Ireland if power were placed in their hands, I frankly admit that the light thrown by this means on the possible future is in my mind, encouraging. In the place, I am sure the House will remember the furious opposition with which the Peace Preservation Bill was met, and from that fact I suppose we may assume that, with national independence established, a Home Rule Parliament sitting in College Green, those irritating and annoying restrictions which were intended to prevent one man murdering another, or robbing him, or destroying his property, would be at once removed and entire freedom of action established. We have a dozen or so of Bills on various minor subjects, all affecting in some way or other landlords' property. It is, however, doubtful whether there would remain any necessity for wasting their time over them, as if the Land Tenure Bill, in passing which we were engaged last night, were introduced in the first Session of the College Green Parliament, landlords would have no property for the others to scramble for. That includes my category; but I think the different straws, as I may call them, show clearly enough the set of the wind. I believe I may be answered from the other side, that in the Home Rule programme, which was adopted at some conference or another, it is provided that all questions dealing with either property or religion should be removed to the province of the Home Rule Parliament. If that is so, I must ask the House whether we could possibly see any stronger evidence of incapacity. That is so, here we have a voluntary mission on the part of those who, I suppose, understand best what are to be the component parts of this proposed government, of their unfitness to deal with two most important duties of a Government—namely, the preservation of religious liberty and the protection of the rights of property. I cannot believe that this proposal for separation, whether it be for the complete or for the limited form, could emanate from any one so visionary and foolish, who know what they ask for; and therefore I trust this House will now, taking upon itself its rightful prerogative of guarding, dispel these wild dreams and visions, and, in a firm tone, refuse to accede to the Motion of the hon. and learned Member.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, that the hon. Member who preceded him (Mr. Kavanagh) usually addressed himself to practical questions, and his arguments were generally worthy of much consideration; but on this occasion the hon. Member seemed to have surrendered his opinion to the judgment of others, for the line of argument he had adopted was that propounded by Mr. Froude, regarding the question of what a State or nation was. In doing so he had followed the argument of Mr. Froude's book—a book which he (Captain Nolan) regarded as politically immoral and full of the falsest ideas, which if followed by statesmen would lead to tyrannical wars, and if adopted in private life would result in homicides, robberies, and an abandonment of all ideas of property. Mr. Froude's idea was that nations should follow—

That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can.”

The doctrine that a nation had a right to exist only when it was strong enough to defend itself was repudiated by all the European Powers, though it must be acknowledged that some of them occasionally acted upon it. Under the system advocated by Mr. Froude, and followed by the hon. Member for Carlow, Belgium, Holland, and Switzerland must disappear as soon as it suited the convenience and interest of any of the Great Powers to absorb them. Ireland, it was said, was incapable of defence, and therefore, although its citizens, as individuals, had rights, the country, as a concrete body, had no rights. That was a principle which he hoped the House would never sanction. It was when transposed precisely the argument of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), an argument in which he did not agree, when he sought to work upon the fears of England by pointing to the injury which Irishmen might visit upon her in America, Australia, or elsewhere, but he (Captain Nolan) thought that the views held by Mr. Froude and adopted by the hon. Member for Carlow on this point formed but a low principle of policy; but he urged his case upon the merits, and claimed for Ireland that which justice should concede. It was objected that the plan of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick could not be readily carried into practice, and it was asked, what would a Federal Council have to do if guarantees were given that matters touching religion and property were not to be interfered with? There would still be much work to do, as could be seen by looking to similar machinery in action in the United States. As far as the State was concerned, what the Federal Government of the United States guaranteed to each constituent State—non-interference in its independent action in matters of religion and property—was all that was asked by this Motion. The Home Rule Members were, as a Party, almost unanimous in their demand, and although the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Smyth) would not give them his vote on this occasion, he had formerly voted with them. Surely, unanimity was not to be insisted on as it once was in Poland, when one dissentient voice was fatal to any proposition; at any rate, they could not secure it by the Polish method of murdering the dissentient. The highest authority in the House had said that the hon. Member for Westmeath had made a speech worthy of the days of Grattan; but he hoped the hon. Member would yet give his vote for the Motion. He believed that the meeting of a Parliament in Dublin would be a good thing for Dublin; and first, pecuniarily, because it would involve the spending of more money in the country. It would, indirectly, induce many more proprietors of land to reside for longer periods in the country. One thing was certain, and it was that if there were not some change, a few years would see even less money spent in the country than at present. A Parliament in Dublin would restore the centre of gravity in the relation between paid officials and the people, and would make the Government establishments realities instead of mere shadows, which they must be while London remained the source of power. The people's Representatives now could communicate with Dublin officials only through London officials; they had little chance of making their influence felt, unless they could exercise it through London; and thus the local officials were cut off from the source of power—the Irish people, so that there was an air of unreality about what they did, which would probably lead to a curtailment of their numbers and position. This question of spending money, however, would be regarded as a minor question. There were three points suggested by the hon. Member for Carlow, legislation upon which by an Irish Parliament would be likely to be better than that of an Imperial Parliament. Take, for example, the question of education. On that question they would have better legislation than they could from any English Parliament, however well constituted. In Ireland nearly all the people wished their children to have a religious education, but that question was obliged to remain in abeyance because the English Parliament was in favour of secular education. If the two countries had a separate Parliament, England could adopt secular instruction if she preferred it, while in Ireland the denominational principle would be recognized, and all objection to compulsory education would be removed. The Irish Parliament on that question would be in harmony with the wish of the people. Then take the Land Question as worked in the two countries. Every one agreed it would be an immense advantage if there was a cheap and easy means of selling property. There were many difficulties in England in the way of such a system, but it would be comparatively easy of introduction in Ireland, and if Irishmen had their own Legislature they would soon simplify the law, so as to facilitate the acquisition of small properties. He might next instance the drainage of the Shannon. The right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary had offered £150,000, but it was accompanied with conditions which the landowners would not accept, and an unworkable Bill was passed for a term which had now expired. It was not a question of money, for the Government had offered a considerable sum; but an Irish Parliament would have had time to deal with this question in a satisfactory manner. Again, Ireland lay in the direct route to America, and an opinion prevailed that all the passenger traffic from England and the Continent ought to pass through that country, and that if Ireland had a proper port on her West coast some company would establish steamers and a trade would spring up. It was said

ought to establish such a port; the Imperial Parliament would not whether such a scheme was a job not, and had not time to investigate subject. The Imperial Government at present managed was too large to enter into the question. That was an example of the way in which a local Parliament could act better than the Imperial Parliament. An Irish Parliament might, however, see its way to opening the whole of Ireland for the establishment of a western port which would attract the traffic to America. One great deficiency in the House of Commons was time. They had not time to do the work. If the House devoted itself to local business for two or three years, it might, perhaps, do it as well as a home Parliament; but that was impossible. Moreover, if a Parliament were granted to Ireland it would benefit the working classes of England. They were constantly in danger of having all their local combinations destroyed by inroads of Irish workmen, and as long as wages were high in England they could not keep the Irish out. But if its Parliament were restored to Ireland, the Irish people would be raised in an educational point of view, their wages would be increased, and they would be better paid and have more work at home. If power were given to them to manage their own affairs, they would be prepared to make discussions with regard to Imperial questions; they would forego a great deal in that direction in order to have a Parliament in Dublin. In many moral questions he maintained that his countrymen were the equal of the English people. The only way to do what he mentioned, by way of improving the Irish people in a material way, a Federal Parliament would do everything that was necessary in the direction. In the past there was only one matter that was regretted. There had been a difference of opinion amongst the Irish Members on this side of the House, but it had been shown by only one single Member of the Party, and it had reference to the exact form in which the demand should be brought forward. He hoped, however, had no doubt, that next year the new Rulers would come to the House in greater numbers than ever, and he trusted that the form of the demand to the Parliament would have their unanimous support. The inquiry asked for was a reasonable demand, and he trusted that it would be granted.

MR. KIRK, in supporting the Motion, said, he did so not only because of his own strong opinion, but because the vast majority of his countrymen had sent Representatives to Parliament to support the principles of Home Rule. As to the speech of the hon. Member for Carlow County (Mr. Kavanagh), he was astounded that an Irishman should elect such an authority as Mr. Froude to quote from in regard to Ireland. Mr. Froude was no great friend of Ireland, and his historical arguments were acknowledged to be fallacious. There was not the slightest chance of one-fourth of the Business introduced at the beginning of the Session being gone through by the end. Then at the end of every Session there was what was called a "Massacre of the Innocents." In the massacre they found not unfrequently a fair average of such Bills, and those not the least important to the country. He had never known a better proof of the incapacity of Englishmen to legislate for Ireland than was afforded by the experience of the last three Sessions. Great questions affecting Ireland, which stirred the heart of the country, had been carried by large majorities, but had been overthrown by English and Scotch Members, and therefore there was little expectation of having fair play or justice done to Ireland by a British Parliament. Again, by the present arrangement Ireland suffered in regard to Private Bill legislation, which, under Home Rule, could be effected far more efficiently, and under far less cost, than at present. He denied that the advocacy of Home Rule meant the disintegration of the Empire. It meant nothing of the kind, and he stated emphatically that the Irish Members were opposed to the separation. The rebellion of 1798 was not brought about by the Irish Parliament, but by the English Government and the English Premier, in order to consummate the Union. That Union was carried out at an expenditure of £16,000,000, and £1,500,000 was spent in the purchase of votes—the votes of two people, and thus Irishmen were asked to agree to their own degradation. How could anyone call such a policy the free choice of the people. To ameliorate the wrongs of Ireland for centuries, Coercion Acts and Habeas Corpus Suspension Acts were the only panacea offered by the English Government. He wished to impress this strongly on English and Scottish Representatives—that a federation of the three Kingdoms was absolutely necessary for the formation of a great Empire which would have itself respected throughout the world. He was strongly opposed to centralization, but he did not ask for, nor seek separation. If, however, Ireland got legislative independence, which was her birthright, no more Coercion Acts would be necessary. What was now the paralyzed arm of the Empire would become its real right arm; there would be no more loyal subjects in this realm than Irishmen, and they would not only be as prosperous, but as jealous of the honour of the Empire as Englishmen and Scotchmen were.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT maintained that so grave a constitutional question as that involved in Home Rule should not be delegated to any Select Committee, but should be fully and fairly discussed in the House itself, where alone it ought to receive its solution. He denied that a large portion of the people of Ireland demanded what was called Home Rule. The Motion was not merely one for inquiry into the state of Ireland; it involved the whole question of Home Rule, and in his opinion there were several reasons why it should not be adopted for that country; they were social, geographical, political, and, above all, religious reasons. The Act of Union had not succeeded as thoroughly as might have been expected, because, when a separate Parliament was taken away from Ireland, the separate administration was not also taken away. That was the view taken at the time of the Union with Scotland by Lord Somers, who maintained that the administration of the two countries should be identical. It was too late, however, now to talk of repealing the Union. He believed there was a great cry for Home Rule, but he denied that it was the voice of the great people of Ireland; and he maintained that the inevitable effect of granting Home Rule must be ultimately a separation of the two countries, although he could not conceal from himself that the state of things in Ireland was not that which all friends of Ireland would like to see. Had the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) asked for a

Select Committee to inquire into the present state of Ireland, as Earl Russell did in 1844, no Ministry could have refused such a demand, if it were honestly made. As he had said, the present state of Ireland was not so prosperous as some persons would have the House to believe; and this was incontestably proved by statistics. There had been a large emigration going on for years of her youthful population, who carried with them to other countries the productive powers which would have made Ireland more wealthy. During a period of five years, from 1870 to 1876, between 300,000 and 400,000 persons, representing the sinew of the country, had left Irish soil; and during the period between 1850 and 1876 the number that had emigrated was between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000. In a period of 10 years, from 1861 to 1871, there had been a decrease of 34,804 in the number of inhabited houses; and a corresponding decrease in the number of families. These figures showed that Ireland had been deprived of a large amount of wealth by the emigration that had taken place. Taking the revenue derived from taxation, it had not increased within the last 20 years at the rate of that of Scotland and England. The waste lands had not been reclaimed at the rate they ought to have been, while, of late, a very large decrease had taken place in the value of the cereal crops produced in Ireland. The fisheries had also declined both in the number of boats and of men and boys employed, and consequently in their value and productiveness. As for "absenteeism," much of the evils complained of arose from that cause. He found 180 proprietors who resided occasionally in Ireland owned a fifteenth part of the acreage of the country; whereas there were no less than 1,443 proprietors who were always absent, and these owned between a sixth and a seventh of the whole land of Ireland. Such a state of affairs naturally produced very bad consequences. Nor was that all. The people of Ireland had to pay much more than their fair share of taxation, and their shipping was in a very depressed state. The railway traffic, both as respected passengers and goods, was far below what it ought to be, taking the population into account, and comparing Ireland with Scotland and England. He thought that, taking these facts into consideration, it was the duty of the Government to take every possible step to place Ireland upon an equality with the other portions of the Kingdom, and that all distinctions between them should be done away with; and a great means towards the attainment of that end would be the residence of a Member of the Royal Family in the country. For the reasons he had given, he was very sorry he could not vote for the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman. At the same time, believing that Ireland had many great special grievances to be remedied, and which he thought it desirable to inquire into—not in the sense of the hon. and learned Member—he should not vote at all. But he hoped the result of the discussion would be to turn the attention of the Government to some of the questions to which he had adverted.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT said, he would have been content to give a silent vote on this question had not he and the constituency he represented been subject to criticism and abuse in regard to it. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) had made an attack. He seemed to constitute himself the special guardian of the political morality of Members of Parliament and of their constituencies. How far he was qualified for such a duty he would leave it for the House to determine. The attack was an intemperate one; but there was this excuse for it—that it was made on a debate upon a Bill affecting freehold property; and he (Mr. Bright) found that when attempts were made to interfere by legislation with freehold property certain hon. Gentlemen seemed to become excited and to lose that fairness and moderation which ought to characterize Members of the Legislature. The noble Lord said that the Manchester election was a scandal. Not content with that, he repeated the charge in stronger terms, and said it was a great scandal, and that he (Mr. Bright) and his opponent had been coquetting, he supposed, in some unworthy manner for votes, and the attack was loudly cheered by the Party opposite. Now, those who undertook to reprove others should, at any rate, have clean hands. He could not help asking himself the question whether the Party opposite had never coquetted with great interests outside the House in order to obtain or retain place and power. Had they never coquetted with the publican? Talk about scandal, could anything be more scandalous than what occurred about the beginning of this Parliament, when the great Party opposite repealed a clause in the Licensing Bill, contrary to the moral sense of the whole country?

MR. SPEAKER said, he must request the hon. Member to keep to the question immediately before the House.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT said, he was sorry to deviate from the regular course of the debate. His object was when a strong personal attack had been made upon him to show that those who supported that attack were chargeable with doing the very thing of which he was accused. The Irish electors in Manchester, equal in number to one-eighth of the whole borough constituency of Ireland, appeared to a large extent to have lost confidence in the legislation of that House in regard to that country, and desired at the last election to support a candidate who, if he did not approve Home Rule views, was at least willing that those views should be inquired into; and many of the other voters, on both sides of politics, sympathised with them in that respect. That night he could, without violating any principle, represent that feeling on the part of his constituents by voting for that inquiry on which they had set their minds. The reason why there was a desire for Home Rule was because Parliament had been so long unwilling to do justice to Ireland; and it seemed that even the Land Act of 1870 would not have been passed but for the motive-power given by the unfortunate violence of misguided men now suffering imprisonment for their offences. An honest inquiry conducted by capable men would do good, and the necessity for instituting it was shown by the fact that more than a majority of the representatives of the Irish nation asked for it. Whether they or those who returned them to that House were in earnest or not remained to be seen; but if they were, Parliament, powerful as it was, could not resist that demand. Believing that if the inquiry were fairly carried out it would tend to the union more than to the separation of the two countries, he would give it his cordial support.

MR. R. POWER: Sir, in the few observations which I intend to address to the House, I hope to abstain from referring to the past as much as possible, and to confine my remarks to the present state of affairs, for if I were to begin to trace the history and character of Irish Parliaments from the first one, which sat in the 9th year of the reign of Edward II., down to the Parliament which was annihilated in 1800, I fear my task would be somewhat greater than my powers of endurance. Sir, we must accept things as they are. The wild and reckless statements, or the lamentable ignorance of Irish affairs so lavishly displayed by hon. Members opposite, have only strengthened our position, and lent force to our arguments. The people of Ireland, unprepared and taken completely by surprise by the unexpected dissolution of Parliament, returned at the last Election a majority of Members pledged to plead for the right of the people to self-government. That majority was returned under every conceivable difficulty, yet that majority is proportionately as great as the majority which now rules this House; therefore, to say that the people of Ireland do not approve of or want Home Rule is to say that the majority of the people of England do not approve of Her Majesty's present Government. I hope we shall hear no defiant tones from the Ministerial benches on this occasion, for defiance gives an impetus to action. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich once hastily threw down defiance to the late lamented Member for Meath. He challenged him for popularity in Ireland; that challenge was accepted—we are seldom slow to accept anything of the sort—and the result was, that the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends very soon found themselves at the wrong side of the House. They are now beginning to get somewhat accustomed to these benches; at first they felt very uncomfortable, and for many nights that front Opposition bench was unadorned by any of the ex-Ministers, and several of our independent Members, who usually sit below the gangway, took up their position where they found most room. A great and incongruous Party are now waiting for what sailors would call a change of wind, but what statesmen call a reaction, waiting until that horrid fever of Home Rule subsides and Irish Members once more array themselves under the flag of Whiggery. It is of little concern to us that they should,

in the cool shade of Opposition, console themselves with so sweet a hope, for they are as much justified in doing so as the countryman in the fable who was patiently waiting for the stream to pass by in order that he might cross over. But, Sir, the noble Lord, by courtesy called the Leader of the Opposition—the Leader of the remnants of a once great Party—has emphatically declared that he will never give us Home Rule. Never is a foolish word to escape from the lips of any Minister. Though we may see a majority against us in this House, we shall not, like Her Majesty's late Ministers, in a fit of angry despair, throw up the sponge on that account; but we are determined to fight on to the bitter end, striving to overcome the vast amount of prejudice, ignorance, and misrepresentation with which we have to contend; appealing to the intelligence and honesty of the English public; organizing our strength in the very heart of your Kingdom, and using every constitutional means in our power to carry out the objects which we have in view. Looking dispassionately over the strange and fitful history of Irish politics brings to our mind a lesson which ought never to be forgotten by present or future statesmen, a lesson telling us that a country held in subjection by force, and governed by laws opposed to the feelings and national sentiments of the people, must engender discontent, and discontent is the parent of disloyalty, and disloyalty is the weakness and danger of a State. For 76 years Ireland has never been in a state of coma. Insurrection Acts and Coercion Bills—measures first obstinately refused and afterwards as willingly granted—have all tended to keep the barometer of Irish feelings up to fever heat. Blame not the agitator for the unsettled state of Irish affairs. It was you who taught Ireland agitation. You taught her no longer to supplicate but to demand, for you yielded little to her supplications, but you granted much to her demands. You left her grievances, and if there are monster grievances there must be monster meetings. Can you, during your 76 years of Imperial rule, point to concessions made except to agitation or equal rights conferred except to silence the voice of the people? You have taught the lesson that redress only comes with agitation. For over 70 years your barque of British

Legislation has been sailing against the current of Irish public opinion. The people of Ireland are to-day what your laws and institutions have made them, and the so-called Act of Union has proved not an Act of Settlement but an Act of contention and bitterness. You have never harmonized your feelings with ours; you have never curbed the bitterness of your Press towards the Irish people; you have not governed us as equals, for you have refused us equal rights. You have governed us as a conquered country, and thus has grown up that feeling of animosity and that spirit of estrangement, that want of confidence, suspicion, and ill-feeling which, if it be not speedily arrested, must sooner or later tend to undermine your greatness and stability as a nation. Montague has written—"Happy are the people whose annals are tiresome," and a philosopher has added—"Happy are the people whose annals are vacant;" but we are a people whose annals are neither tiresome nor vacant, a highly sentimental race, clinging fondly to traditions of the past, and imbued with many strong conservative tendencies. Your rule sits uneasy upon our country, because it is sustained by force, animated by opinions opposed to ours, and guided by counsels in which we have no voice. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government has told us that he wishes to conciliate us, but what means has he adopted to do it? He preaches conciliation, but he practises coercion. We have heard much about the prosperity of Ireland, and yet after 76 years' connection with the richest country in Europe we find ourselves the poorest. What class of the community experiences this great prosperity of which we hear so much? If it be the landlords, they are principally absentees, spending their money in every capital but their own, and they are only a burden upon our energies and resources. Before the Union they yearly drained out of the country £2,223,222; they now carry away over £5,000,000 a-year. Are the tenants contented—they who have formed themselves into a powerful organization, and demand a Land Bill far in advance of what you would willingly give them? If they were prosperous, do you think they would trouble themselves with agitation? Is it the labourer, he who is ill-housed and ill-fed, whose wages have well nigh doubled, but whose cost of living has well nigh trebled? Is it the mechanic or the artizan, he whose only ambition is to collect enough of money to bring him to another country? Is the citizen prosperous, he who sees enterprize crushed, speculation banished, natural advantages undeveloped, and our resources unworked? In 1860 our poor rates amounted to £530,626; in 1874 they amounted to £977,890; so that with a decreasing population we have an increasing pauperism. But, Sir, I shall not weary the House with quoting figures. This is not a mathematical problem, and I do not wish to lower this great question to the level of statistics, which are not always infallible. This is not a question of prosperity or poverty. It is a question of right—the right of a people to make their own laws. What respect have you ever shown for the opinion of the people of Ireland? Every measure which their Representatives bring forward you crush with overwhelming majorities, and do you think the people of Ireland do not feel, and deeply feel, the insult offered by your high-handed legislation? Measures of vital importance to the country, supported by a large majority of Irish Members, have been defeated by your powerful Conservative majority. You have not reformed the Grand Jury Laws. You have left them in an unsatisfactory state, thereby lessening the respect of the people for the administration of justice. You rejected a Municipal Franchise Bill, thereby declaring to the people of Ireland that they must not have the same rights or enjoy the same privileges as their fellow-subjects who live in English towns. Our Fishery Bill you scornfully rejected, thereby refusing to encourage one of the most profitable employments of the people—one of the few industries which still languish under your rule in Ireland. The Convention Act you have refused to repeal, thereby declaring that the people of Ireland must not enjoy the same rights as the people of England. You have refused to alter the restricted nature of the Irish franchise as compared with England and Scotland. The Towns' Rating Bill received but scant consideration, and last, but greatest inconsistency of all, your Chief Secretary declares in Belfast that "Ireland never was in such a peaceable condition," and in the House of Commons he declares that the people must not enjoy the blessings of a free Constitution. Sir, the opinion growing every day—every night—in this House strengthens the conviction, every Bill which you defeat encourages the belief, that, in the words of Lord Russell, “In England the Government is a government of opinion—in Ireland it is a Government of force.” Constitutional Government there is none in Ireland. You do not trust the people, for you have made the police and the informer your garrison. It took you 16 years to unite the exchequers; 25 years to unite the countries commercially; 26 years to assimilate the currency; 58 years to equalize the Excise duties, but 76 years have failed to unite the two countries in feeling, in friendship, or in goodwill. In your treatment of the other portions of your vast Empire you pursue a wiser and more generous policy, and in countries where you have not given a native Parliament, you employ every means to secure your own power, and to conciliate the conquered race. You sent out a Royal Prince and future Emperor to court the smiles and win the favour of Eastern Nabobs, bravely exposing himself to the perils of a pestiferous climate, to the fanaticism of a treacherous population, and to the not less dangerous adventure of travelling in one of Her Majesty’s ships. The Act of Union has produced a separation between the two peoples; it has been a union in name and not in spirit; a union written on parchment, and not upon the hearts or affections of the people. You have an Act of Parliament ironically called the Act of Union, but it has not, it cannot, and it never will, unite the two countries. The two Kingdoms may be united, but the two peoples are divided, and a divided people tends sooner or later to a divided kingdom. To call the present connection between the two countries a union is a misnomer; we have a union, it is true, but we are not united. You can maintain that union by the sword, and by the sword alone, as Prussia can maintain her union with Alsace or Lorraine, and Russia with Poland. But is such a union lasting?—will it dissolve beneath the heat of growing Continental complications? A union, to be lasting, must be founded on the friendship and self-interest of both countries; any other union is a delusion and a snare. This Irish difficulty every year becomes more difficult. I trust it may never become the Irish impossibility. Your Government has always been a mixture of concession and coercion; if you consider coercion a tonic you have grievously erred in your political diagnosis. The Irish people are sick of such tonics and stimulants; they now require sedatives. But, Sir, what are the great objections against an Irish Parliament to manage Irish affairs? One hon. Member timidly suggests that it is a risk; but let me remind him that it is sometimes wise, even in politics, to speculate; for a trifling risk you may realize a large gain, not that I advise gambling; but, remember, if Home Rule is an experiment, experiments are justifiable when all other measures have failed. Why, Sir, our greatest political measures have been experiments. The Act of Union was an experiment—aye, and an experiment that has now for 75 years been “tried and found wanting.” If an experiment is to be tried, the fit and proper time to try it is when its possible failure could entail no evil consequences; and England being now at peace with all the world, and in the zenith of her power and greatness, she may, without any risk or danger to herself, try the experiment of giving justice to the Irish people. We hear the cry of Catholic ascendancy and priestly domination, but I look to Ireland, and I witness Catholic constituencies returning Protestant Members to this House, and if hon. Members still doubt, let them, at the next Election, send a Catholic candidate, laden with money, to oppose my Protestant Friend the Member for the county Cork, and he will very soon return to this country a wiser, a sadder, and a poorer man. No, Sir, a wish for Catholic ascendancy does not exist either among the priesthood or the people of Ireland. The Catholic and Protestant cantons of Switzerland unite for common defence and common weal. The Catholic soldiers of Bavaria fought for Protestant Prussia against their Catholic brethren. How often have the Catholic soldiers of Ireland fought side by side with their Protestant comrades in defence of Protestant England?—and will any one now assert, because you give to the people of Ireland their own Parliament, the Irish soldier will not shed his blood as freely as heretofore for the defence and glory of England? Such an idea can hardly be seriously entertained by any Member of this House, unless it might exist in the religious imagination of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), or in the mind of his hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley). But then you have another great objection—one more widely entertained, and which upon all occasions you parade before the public—the fear of separation. A Parliament sitting in Dublin, managing purely Irish affairs, is to cause separation between the two countries. I fear that those who advance such an argument do not profit much by the lessons of history. Self-government has not made Canada, Australia, the Isle of Man, or Hungary, seek for separation. Why should Ireland be an exception? If Ireland were like Canada or Australia, some thousand miles from British shores, you would doubtless allow her a Parliament of her own, and she would be as prosperous and as contented with British rule as Canada now is; and if Canada were only a few hours sail from England, and were denied Home Rule, she would be as Ireland now is—determined on having it. Self-interest is the motive power of nations as well as of individuals. Ireland will not separate when it is her interest to unite. It is a guilty conscience that makes cowards of us all, and conjures up before your affrighted imagination the dread spectres of separation, dismemberment, and ruin to the British Empire. These are but the idle fancies of an empty dream. Let me entreat of you to banish from your minds this childish dread of an imaginary separation, and give back to the Irish people that “which not enriches you, but makes them poor indeed.” It is you who would cause separation by forcing a hateful Legislative Union upon an unwilling people. If Ireland is to be a partner in the firm of Great Britain and Company, she ought to enjoy the rights of partnership. She should have her share in the profits as well as in the losses. We do not seek for a dissolution of partnership, but it is clear that the present miscalled Union tends in that direction, and, therefore, it is the duty of Government and this House so to alter and adjust the present Union that being acceptable to the people of Ireland and compatible with the interests of England, it may be made a source of strength and stability instead of being, what it undoubtedly is, a source of weakness and of danger to the State. England should remember that she has her duties as well as her rights. Her rights she has exercised, but her duties she has not performed. There run through nearly all classes in England a certain amount of prejudice or dislike to everything Irish, springing principally from ignorance or former recollections, and too often uncurbed by reason and uncontrolled by policy. Isaac Walton, who was the father of anglers, tells the fisherman, in baiting his hook, to hold the worm as if he loved him; and I am forced to think that the love of England for Ireland is of the same description as the love of the angler for his worm. [“No, no!”] An hon. Member says “No,” and, Sir, I gladly admit that there are exceptions to this rule, as there are to every rule—except, of course, to Home Rule; but still I am inclined to think that the love of Ireland is too often like the love of oysters and caviare—“an acquired taste.” But admitting your love for us to be unbounded, does it alter the feelings of the Irish people? Do they appreciate your administration? Do they forget the history of the past? Do they not know “by what bye-ways and crooked paths” you gained the Union? Do they not know that the bankers of Dublin, at a meeting on the 18th of December, 1798, resolved—

“That since the renunciation of Great Britain, in 1782, to legislate for Ireland, the commerce and prosperity of the Kingdom have eminently increased?”

Do they not know the Dublin guild of merchants pronounced the same opinion? Do they not know that Lord Chancellor Plunkett said in 1800—

“Ireland’s revenue, her trade, her manufactures, are thriving beyond the example of any country of her extent, not complaining of deficiency in any respect, but enjoying and acknowledging her prosperity?”

Do they forget the language of the Right Hon. John Foster—

“Legislative independence has not only secured but absolutely showered down more blessings, more trade, more affluence, than ever fell to your lot in double the space of time since its attainment?”

Have they forgotten the words of Lord Clare—

“There is not a nation in the habitable globe which has advanced in agriculture and manufactures with the same rapidity in the same period?”

No, Sir, you cannot obliterate from the Irish mind memories like these. The cloud of present poverty does not darken the sun of past prosperity. These facts are sunk deep into the Irish heart, and have given the greatest impetus to every movement for the restoration of an Irish Parliament. Your Irish policy, to borrow the words of a distinguished statesman, has been "a plundering and a blundering policy," for it has robbed the Irish people of their legislative independence, and it tends towards the disunion and the separation of the two countries. The strength and durability of your Empire ought to depend not upon your armies, or your iron-clads, but upon the hearts and loyalty of a united people. I do not even ask you to discuss this question from an Irish point of view. Throw over, if you will, the local interests and prosperity of Ireland, and regard this measure solely as it affects your own status as a great and powerful nation. In time of war Ireland being the weak point in your defence, will be the first point of attack, and being the most vulnerable part, will be the hope of your enemies and the fear of your friends—for Ireland is the heel of the British Empire. Even in time of peace what effect has the state of Ireland upon your foreign relations? Does it not hamper and embarrass your foreign policy?—and in the international disputes in which England has been, and may be engaged, is it not a drag-chain upon your Foreign Minister, and is it not an incentive to the extraordinary demands and pretensions of foreign Powers? In short, whether in peace or war, the state of Ireland is a danger to the Empire. We propose a remedy which we believe would be effectual, and you reject it with scorn. To let well alone may be a safe policy, and perhaps will be accepted by some hon. Members opposite as a correct definition of Conservatism; but to let bad alone is revolutionary and dangerous. You must admit there is something bad in the state of Ireland; if you cannot ignore that fact, it is your duty to look to it in time. In 1844, the right hon. Gentleman now at the head of Her Majesty's Government declared in this House—

"That he never believed Ireland would be a great difficulty, because he felt certain that a Minister of great ability and of great power would, when he found himself at the head of a great majority, settle that question."—[3 Hansard, lxxii. 1010.]

Sir, I think the time has come when we have the great Minister and the powerful majority, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman still entertains some of the opinions of his earlier days. But what, may I ask, has Her Majesty's Ministers done, in this, the third year of their office, to remedy any of the grievances of which we complain? Nothing, absolutely nothing, except to take a leaf out of their predecessors' book, and to "furbish up the rusty old tools" of former Governments, by imposing upon our country that much cherished fondling of British statesmen, misnamed a Peace Preservation Act—an Act which its authors seem to look upon in the same light as Professor Holloway looks upon his pills as a cure for everything, at least for every Irish complaint. I have not the honour to belong to the medical profession; but I cannot see how you can safely prescribe for an invalid without knowing something of his habits and constitution, and I fear that neither the present distinguished Leader of the Government nor his equally distinguished Predecessor, that "most potent," and I believe I may say, reverend statesman and expostulator, know a whit more of the character and constitution of the Irish people than does Professor Holloway know of the numberless dupes who swallow his pills. Expediency first and justice afterwards is the motto of modern Governments. Depart, for once, from that principle, and you will find in the future destinies of this Empire that justice is the best policy. Put not your trust in "foreign alliances;" they are fragile and only made to be broken, and will last as long as it is the interest of the contracting parties to observe them and no longer. Rather seek out "home alliances," the true foundation of a nation's greatness. We offer you a home alliance that will be your sheet anchor in the hour of need. By a timely concession you can secure that alliance. Be wise in time; do not wait till concession ceases to be a virtue and becomes a necessity. Remember that to know when to concede is as important for a Minister as to know what to concede, and in both these points your Irish policy has always been defective. You have built up your vast fabric of British rule in Ireland not upon the sympathies, sentiments, and affections of the people, but upon unconstitutional force, and upon laws which Lord Palmerston declared "few absolute Governments would, by their own authority, establish." Free yourselves from the fetters of prejudice and the trammels of domineering policy; expand your minds and your hearts towards the people beyond the Channel; inaugurate a new policy; alter your physical force mottoes; return to the paths of Constitutional Government; trust the people; make your laws in unison with their character; be guided not by the opinions of a faction, but by the feelings of a nation, and if, in good faith, you do these things, Ireland may yet become great in its own prosperity, powerful as an ally, and willing to associate its future with the destinies of this Empire.

MR. MULHOLLAND said, that the hon. Member who had just addressed the House in support of the Resolution (Mr. R. Power) had expressed a hope that it would not be met in a spirit of defiance, but he had never heard of any proposition made by Irish Members being met by the present Government in any such spirit; but he hoped they would meet this proposition with firmness, and he trusted also that both sides of the House would unite in rejecting it with an emphasis like that by which last night they rejected another proposition. It was important that they should do so, as it would dispel an illusion which he was afraid was being diffused in Ireland, and which, if allowed to grow, would make it possible one day, in the exigencies of Party, to surrender all that it was the first duty of a Government to defend. The fact was that Ireland would never be content until her people had learnt that to acquire property they must work, and that the majority would not be permitted to despoil the minority, merely because it was a minority. The arguments which had been adduced in support of the Motion were to his mind the strongest that could be used against it, because they had all tended to show that Ireland was an integral part of the United Kingdom, and in such a case no one could with any show of justice urge that independent Parliaments were either necessary or advisable for the purposes of good government. When, 36 years after the Act of Union was passed, a proposal for the repeal of the Act was laid before Parliament, the strongest objection made to it was that it would be impolitic to disturb a connection which had existed so long. How much stronger was such an argument now that every fibre of the national life of the two countries had become closely intertwined? Beyond that, their geographical relation to each other clearly marked them out as coming under one jurisdiction. Sir Robert Peel, once speaking of Ireland having an independent Parliament, said that she never had been independent and never could, and that if the same experiment were to be tried over again, it would end after a series of troubles in the same solution. Every possible trial of an independent Parliament was made before it was given up, and every attempt to bring the two Parliaments into harmony had been made in vain; and it was clear that since that system was abandoned the prosperity of Ireland had been much greater than it was before. The exports from Ireland were greater by 12½ per cent in the 10 years following the Union than they had been in the previous 10 years; while in the same period there was an increase of close upon 30 per cent in the tonnage of ships built in the country. In all other respects it could be shown that the prosperity of Ireland steadily increased after the Act of Union was passed. The Report of the Railway Commission stated that in the year 1836 the exports had risen to £17,300,000, and the imports to £15,500,000, showing that they were three-and-a-half times greater than they were at the time of the Union. But the hon. and learned Member for Limerick said that the condition of the people was better before the Union under the independent Parliament of 1785 than it now was. He (Mr. Mulholland) would be content to rest the whole case on a comparison of the condition of the country before and after the Union, and if they consulted Master Fitzgibbon's book they would find from the facts stated that that was very far from being the case. In the 10 years after the Union the imports rose from £5,000,000 to £7,500,000; while in the 10 years before the Union the shipping fell from 66,761 tons to 53,181 tons. In shipbuilding the tonnage declined in the five years before the Union from 9,527 tons to 6,430 tons; and in produce from £246,450 to £230,360, showing a decline in the three great elements of national progress in the years immediately preceding the Union. The Parliament of 1785, it was true, did something for the encouragement of trade, but it was by a system of bounties, protection, and prohibitions which affected every article of trade, and ruined the export trade in Irish linens. Nothing had been stated that showed that the condition of the people in Ireland was better before the Union than it had been since. In 20 years before the Union, under the Independent Parliament, the Custom House returns of Belfast had only increased by £2,000. Five years afterwards they reached £228,000 from £62,000. The fact was that the spring forward which Ireland made when she was admitted to a free partnership with England was surprising. It would, he thought, be admitted that as regards agriculture it had advanced as fast as any other department of industry, and pauperism had decreased, the number of paupers in the workhouses in 1869 being 57,000, while in 1874 the number had fallen to 49,000. Allusion had been made to the decrease of the population of Ireland, but it ought to be remembered that in 1841, when the population had reached its maximum, the number was totally beyond the powers of the land to support; compared with other agricultural countries, it was per square mile or acre very far larger than was to be found elsewhere. The population of Ireland in 1841 was 8,000,000, whereas at the time of the Union it was only 4,000,000; and if its progress had not been checked, and if it had been going on in the same ratio up to the present day, the population of that country would now have amounted to 14,000,000. However sad the diminution was, it would appear from that fact that it was necessary, and therefore it was inevitable. The Census Returns showed that 43 per cent of the people then lived in cabins containing only one room, and 40 per cent in dwellings that were little better than mud cabins. It also appeared from the Report of the Royal Commission that 2,500,000 of the Irish people were at that time without employment for 30 weeks in every year. They were, in fact, paupers, who only subsisted upon the charity of others, and every one would rejoice that many of them had since found a home in which they could obtain a scope for their industry. Even now the present population of Ireland was 174 to the square mile, which was equal to the population of France and Prussia, and greater than that of Austria, while it was as great as that of the agricultural parts of England. Leinster had 10 per cent more population than Munster, whilst Ulster was still more thickly populated, resembling in this respect Northamptonshire. He could not see, under these circumstances, that there was any longer room for saying that the population of Ireland had diminished in consequence of the Union, or that such diminution could be properly a subject for regret. It could have been desired that the diminution of population had not been effected under such melancholy circumstances, but the change for the better on the part of those who had emigrated could not be denied, and it could be as little doubted that the condition of those who had been left had been greatly improved. The people in their habits, their dress, and their food had since that period shown the most extraordinary advance ever made by the people of any country in the world. There was nothing more surprising than the way in which, throughout this debate, the Province of Ulster had been ignored, yet Ulster contained one-third of the population, and more than one-third of the wealth of Ireland. Lord Castlereagh, writing at the time of the Union, said that Ireland contained 500,000 Protestants who were opposed to the Union, 3,000,000 Roman Catholics who were in favour of the Union, and 500,000 Presbyterians who were so occupied with their own affairs that they cared very little about it. It was that absence of political agitation which had placed Ulster in its present thriving and prosperous condition. He would again repeat that he trusted that both sides of the House would join as emphatically as they did last night in rejecting the present Motion. He thanked the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) for the very straightforward manner in which he had opposed the Bill of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Butt), and trusted that there would be no attempt to coquet with the present Motion, because it had a tendency to arrest the progress and prosperity of the country, and to scare away that capital which imparted the confidence and gave employment to the people.

Mr. Mulholland

JOHAEL HICKS-BEACH: the hon. and learned Member Limerick brought this subject forward years ago, he submitted a Motion in favour of Home Rule, and the House to declare that the power of managing exclusive affairs should be restored to Parliament. In the same way, the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. P. J. Smyth), in a speech who have heard it, whatever they think of the opinions it expresses, must admire as one of the ablest arguments and eloquence ever brought to the House, expressed boldly the views he would have put to the test of a vote had the House allowed him to do so. Is the Motion we have before us the same? It is ostensibly, merely a Motion into the great subject that was brought under the House by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick. I can conceive the position which have been put to the hon. and learned Member Limerick to make so half-hearted a Motion. I can understand how necessary the hon. and learned Member finds the silence of two years, again to bring before the eyes of his followers this vague idea, which he can put forward without risking those divisions which some symptoms have been seen in this House to-night, and some symptoms have been seen in Ireland. I can understand the hon. and learned Member may have thought it was a covert Motion of the kind, and the support of one or two Members of the House who, in deference to the opinions of a portion of their constituents, might omit for a moment to consider the principle which was put forward and vote to refer the Constitution of the United Kingdom to a Committee. On the part of the Government, I have but to express the clear and decided opposition to the Motion now before the House that I gave to the more direct Motion.

There are questions which should be referred to Committees—principally that the House cannot have the propriety of inquiring into and whatever view a Committee takes, I am not prepared to assent to any proposal for changing the Constitution of the United Kingdom and establishing an Irish Parliament for the exclusive management of Irish affairs. I think it is somewhat strange, after the expressions of opinion that have often been heard from some Irish Members as to the incompetence of the House to legislate impartially for Ireland, that this Resolution should receive their support. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick is so simple in his confidence that he would refer the one Irish subject, which he and his Friends consider of paramount importance, to a Committee of English and Scotch Members, to be presided over by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), whom I wish joy of his task, and leave it to them to settle the future government of Ireland.

MR. BUTT wished to explain. He said distinctly he did not propose to refer to that Committee any decision upon a Constitutional question. What he did wish to refer to it was, as the Resolution expressed it, the duty of inquiring into facts and circumstances with which this House ought to be acquainted.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I am afraid that view can hardly have been entertained by the followers of the hon. and learned Member. All who have listened to the course of the debate this evening will have seen that all the speakers who have supported the Motion of the hon. and learned Member evidently felt that its success would imply the adoption of the principle of Home Rule, and if that principle is adopted by the House, what will the Committee have to do, except to apply it in all its details. ["No, no!"] As, then, we are discussing the principle of Home Rule, I think it reasonable that those who support it should be called upon to say what is meant. The hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) has remarked that a desire is often expressed for a definition of Home Rule; and, considering that the Home Rule Party was formed at a Conference held nearly three years ago, and that the question has been so long before the country, I do not think it is too much to expect that some day we shall be told in all detail what the proposal really is. I will submit that it is not by concealing what is desired, and how it is to be carried out, that the support of public opinion in England and Scotland will be secured. No Party in a similar position has ever attained its end, unless it distinctly sets before the public what it wants and how it means to arrive at it; and I trust that speakers on the opposite side, if not this evening, at least on the next occasion when the subject may be brought before the House, will state their end, and how they mean to reach it. If they desire a National Parliament for Irish matters, that may be effected in more ways than one. It may be accomplished by total separation from the United Kingdom; but I dismiss that idea at once, because it has always been claimed—and I myself am ready to admit it—that the hon. and learned Member for Limerick has approached the subject in a constitutional manner, as becomes a loyal subject of the Crown; and it would be incompatible with any constitutional feeling and with loyalty itself to propose, here or elsewhere, the total separation of Ireland from the United Kingdom. Well, then, is it repeal of the Union that is desired? On this point some evidence has been afforded this evening. There is no doubt that the hon. Member for Westmeath, and those who agree with him, would prefer a repeal of the Union to the nondescript proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick. Some time ago last autumn the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) made a speech in which he said that Home Rule and Repeal meant the same thing.

MR. PARNELL: What I said was that Home Rule would necessarily entail repeal of the Union.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I think I quoted the hon. Member pretty correctly; but the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) repudiates any wish to repeal the Union and to return to the old state of things—[Mr. BUTT: Hear, hear!]
—because that will leave the Irish Parliament a vassal, subject practically to the English Ministry, incapable of interfering in questions of peace or war, in foreign or colonial affairs; while, on the other hand, it will place the United Kingdom in the position of not being able to use its full strength against any foreign Power. In preference to repeal, the hon. and learned Member for Limerick has put before us a certain kind of federation; but the House must remember that federation implies a previous separation. The States which have entered into such a bond have, with one exception, been previously independent and tolerably equal, and have joined together for common national purposes with a view to a more complete union in the future. But in the present instance we must dissolve an union before federating, and if separation be accomplished, the hon. and learned Member will probably find that no small portion of his followers will have no wish to complete the rest of his scheme. The exception to which I have alluded is the case of Austria and Hungary. ["Hear, hear!"] I do not remember that the hon. and learned Member has ever proposed federation on the same basis as has been agreed upon between those two countries. But as the allusion just made has been received with sufficient assent to show that some persons, at any rate, desire to place Great Britain and Ireland in the same relative position as Austria and Hungary, I will remind the hon. Member who cheers, that the position of Hungary at the time of the federal arrangement with Austria was totally different from that of Ireland at the present moment. Hungary was a country with ancient liberties; Ireland, as the hon. Member himself has often admitted, has none except what she obtains under Saxon rule. Hungary was a country that had been deprived of those liberties, and brought under a despotic government; Ireland, I will venture to say, is a member of the freest Empire in the world. Hungary was larger in area than the country with which she had federated, and had a population in the proportion of 15 to 20 as compared with Austria. What proportion of population or wealth will Ireland import into a federation with Great Britain? The circumstances of Austria and Hungary and of Great Britain and Ireland are so dissimilar that I will not further pursue the comparison, but address myself to the examples of the United States or the Dominion of Canada, which the hon. and learned Member himself has more than once suggested. Much has been said by the hon. and learned Member about our being ready to concede liberty to our colonial dominions, but denying it to Ireland. I do not suppose the hon. and learned Member intends by that to imply that Ireland would be satisfied with the position of a colony in

in so Great Britain. By accepting this motion she would obtain legislative independence for herself, but she would have that representation in the Imperial Parliament which she now possesses. She would have no influence in the general affairs of the Empire, and would practically sink into the position of a Province. But the hon. and learned Member has suggested that England and Ireland should be in the position of two of the States of the American Union. ["Hear, hear!"]

It can be denied that the relative position of England and Ireland at the present time and that of the States of the American Union before federation is essentially different? We are united when they are separated, and it would be one of the most suicidal folly to disintegrate the United Kingdom at a time when other nations are consolidating their strength. But the United States, when at first preserved "State Rights" by the greatest jealousy, has been gradually compelled to vest more and more power in the Federal Government; their whole history shows that the liberties of the component States in any great Federation must be far more limited than will at all suit the wishes of those who have supported the Motion. But is it the Act under which the Dominion of Canada is formed that the hon. and learned Member wishes to adopt? I will just remind the House of the circumstances of that case. The colonies now forming the Dominion of Canada are separated from each other by hundreds of miles. They have no common ties; several of them have no railway or telegraphic communication; their interests are antagonistic; they have populations totally different in race and language—in short, they have every element of separation.

They saw so clearly the advantages of union that not only did they renounce federation, but they gave all the power they could to the Dominion Government, retaining as little as possible of the provincial authorities. Having regard to the fact that the Dominion Government, or authorities responsible for the control all the acts of the provincial Parliaments, I will venture to say that the latter bodies are far from what the hon. and learned Members desire to see in Dublin. In fact, they are little more than county as-semblies, and in power of taxation have little more than municipal rights. If we establish in Ireland a provincial Parliament on the Canadian system, we should, I contend, do nothing that would really satisfy those who make this demand; while, on the other hand, we should make a change of the greatest importance in the Constitution of the United Kingdom, because we must substitute a written compact for the unwritten Constitution, which has been the pride and boast of this country. We must define every right of the Federal Parliament and the provincial Parliament. We must institute a Supreme Court, if we can, to decide disputes between the two Parliaments; and all for what? In order that we may have a thing which will not satisfy those who are the real supporters of the Motion before the House. For can the hon. and learned Member for Limerick tell the House that even if his full demand, whatever it may be, is granted, there will be no discontented party whatever in Ireland? I venture to say that the success of the hon. and learned Member will be the signal for the immediate revolt from his control of a Party, who even now gives him some trouble—the Nationalist Party. They would not be mollified towards him because of his success. I can conceive the hon. and learned Member, as head of an Irish Provincial Government, called on to take severe measures, in order to keep the peace in Ireland. I can conceive him, in the event of a failure of the ordinary laws of the country to secure order and protect property, compelled to come down to the provincial Parliament to impose something worse than the Coercion Acts, against which he has so often complained. Those who look back into the pages of Irish history will find that an Irish Parliament did not satisfy the United Irishmen of 1798. What was the history of Wolfe Tone? What was the object he had at heart? He was not satisfied with an Irish Parliament; he wanted to break entirely that connection with England which he described as a never-failing source of Irish troubles. I congratulate the hon. and learned Member on the prospect before him if his proposal should be acceded to. Why has this idea of Home Rule obtained popular support; is it not that every

I know of no Federal system whatever where the Customs duties are not under Imperial control. Will the hon. Member for the County of Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan) be satisfied with a Parliament which cannot stop the blending of Irish whiskey? Again, there have been discussions in this House showing the different views taken by Irishmen and Englishmen as to the relative ability of Ireland and England to bear taxation, and it may be easily imagined that that would be an endless subject of difference between an Irish Provincial Parliament and the Parliament of the United Kingdom. Then, as regards foreign affairs, cases may arise bearing on religious topics which will have a special interest to the majority of the Irish people, who may wish to take a course which the Parliament of the United Kingdom cannot approve. In such a case will there be no risk of a quarrel between the two Parliaments? ["No, no!"] Is it quite impossible that some of the Militia in Ireland will be inclined to do more than is necessary for the national defence, and perhaps even to take part in a modern crusade? These are risks so terrible that nothing which has been adduced in the arguments of the hon. and learned Member can for a moment outweigh them. Now, I come to the last topic in the hon. and learned Member's speech—namely, the alleged failure of Parliament to deal with Irish legislation. First of all, I demur to the hon. and learned Member's interpretation of Irish legislation. The hon. and learned Gentleman has expressed an opinion that nothing will be done until all is Irish beneath the Irish sky. For my own part, I complain of the narrow bounds of the hon. and learned Gentleman's horizon. Has Ireland nothing to do with foreign affairs, with the management of our great Colonial Empire, and with the well-being and efficiency of our Army and Navy? Are these subjects not Irish? They have this year frequently occupied the attention of Parliament and been discussed by some Irish Members with much profit to the House. And there has been legislation dealing with Ireland as a part of the United Kingdom that does not seem to have occurred to the hon. and learned Member for Limerick. For instance, the Merchant Shipping Bill, on which so large a portion of the time of the House has been spent during the present Session, applies to Ireland as well as to Great Britain. Is it the fault of this House that there are not quite so many sailors in Irish ports as in English ports? ["Yes!"] Yes. That reply can only have come from an advocate of that old system of bounties which no one would now openly defend. There are other recent measures of general interest, such as the Artizans Dwellings Act, the adoption of which by the local authorities of some Irish towns may prove more beneficial to the country than anything that has been done for many years; the Prisons Bill, the provisions of which are to apply to Ireland; and the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill. But, perhaps the complaint is that Bills relating solely to Ireland have been neglected. I quite admit that the Government Bills relating solely to Ireland are not quite so forward as I could wish. But to what is that due? I regret to say that it is due to unnecessary and meaningless obstruction, not by the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Butt), but by a few hon. Members around him. I refer to what occurred more than once upon the Cattle Diseases (Ireland) Bill, and to the course adopted by the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) upon the Irish Judicature Bill. The hon. and learned Member and his Friends complain that they have brought in any number of Bills, and that none of them are likely to become law. Now, the way to secure legislation is not to bring in all your Bills at once. The hon. and learned Member seems last autumn to have allotted to 20 or 25 Members of his Party as many separate subjects, each of them to be represented by a Bill. Some of those Bills, though introduced last February, have never yet been printed, while others have made their appearance in so disjointed a shape that they can never have been meant to pass. More than that, I will assert that very few of these proposals have received any amount of popular support in Ireland. Take, for instance, the Municipal and Borough Franchise Bills, about which the hon. and learned Member has said so much to-night. Petitions were not presented, public meetings were not held in favour of those measures, which came to this House recommended not by outside opinion, but simply by the support of hon.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

Members opposite acting under the orders of the hon. and learned Member. Those Bills have received a fair discussion. Indeed, it would be difficult to recall a Session in which more time has been given to discussions upon Irish affairs. The hon. and learned Member, in addressing his constituents at Limerick, has taken credit to himself for his achievements with regard to these very Bills, and expressed his belief that they would become law at no distant day, and after such a statement does it become him to tell the House of Commons that it has not devoted a fair consideration to Irish affairs? I do not agree with the hon. and learned Member as to those measures, and have felt it my duty to oppose them. But I claim on behalf of the Government, and also on behalf of the House, the same freedom in dealing with Bills promoted by hon. Members from Ireland as that which we exercise in respect of all other subjects. We have been told that Ireland had no Constitution or Representative Government. What assertions can be more unfounded? Ireland never had a more thoroughly Representative Government at any period of her history than she enjoys at the present moment. She has her full share—and even more than her full share—of representation in the Imperial Parliament. All reasonable Irish measures are fairly considered by the House of Commons; and if, after such consideration, they are rejected, do not Scotch and English measures meet with the same fate? Why do hon. Members opposite, who do not represent the most educated, intelligent, or wealthy portion of the Irish people, expect to enjoy the monopoly of always having their own way? If Parliament declines to repeal the Law of Hypothec, or rejects the Burials Bill, we do not hear from Scotch or Welsh Members that this House is not competent to deal with Scotch or Welsh affairs, and that they want to have a Scotch or Welsh Parliament. No, Scotchmen and Welshmen are sensible that Parliament must deal with the United Kingdom as a whole; they are willing to wait for a time, and even to see some of their favourite schemes entirely fail, because they feel that the advantages from the union of the three Kingdoms far outweighs any which can be obtained by a greater power to shape merely local matters according to their particular views. But

I feel that after all there is nothing real in the arguments on this head which the hon. and learned Member for Limerick has addressed to the House. What are we told by him and his followers? "We bring in Bills which you ought to pass; but whatever you do we will have Home Rule." On this side of the House, however, we are bound to reply decidedly—"We cannot concede to you Home Rule—whatever that may be. We tell you that in this matter you have against you not only the Government, not only the House of Commons, not only the wealth and intelligence of Ireland, with all the people of Ulster, of England, Wales, and Scotland, but something more—you have to contend against every social and physical force and the whole spirit of the present age." Why, 76 years ago when Dublin was a week or more distant from Holyhead, when railways and telegraphs were unknown, when communication from Dublin to the South or North of Ireland took as long as it does now to Egypt, when Ireland was for purposes of Government as far from London as Calcutta is now, then our ancestors abolished the separate Parliament of Ireland. What has those 76 years produced? Increased prosperity in Ireland; all those facilities of communication of which I have spoken; common interests in banking, railways, and every kind of trade and commerce; a resident population of more than 750,000 Irishmen in England; and yet in the face of those facts hon. Gentlemen ask us to accept an anachronism. I would ask hon. Members from Ireland, who exercise great influence with their countrymen, to deal fairly by Parliament, and to give it that credit which is no more than its due; not to misrepresent our motives and ignore our actions, but to tell their countrymen what is the fact—that Irish interests are fully and fairly considered in this House of Commons. There is a spirit even now growing in Ireland of a wider nationality than that of Home Rule. During the last few generations there have been repeated outbreaks of sedition; but at each outbreak the recurring wave has diminished in force, as it were with an ebbing tide. Education and prosperity will do their work, and even among those who support Home Rule now there may soon be many who will feel that Ireland is elevated rather than degraded by her union with England and Scotland, and will thank this House for resisting this night the proposal to degrade her to the level of a Province and remove her from the proud position she now occupies as an integral and dominant Member of the greatest and freest Empire in the world.

MR. SULLIVAN said, the right hon. Baronet had occupied himself during the greater part of his speech with a minute criticism of the proposal put forward by Ireland, through her Party in that House, to adjust the international quarrel between the two countries. He swept the world with critical eye to find out suggestions for fault, for check, for dead-lock, for impossibility; but he (Mr. Sullivan) defied him to show any difficulty in their scheme which would not be multiplied an hundred-fold by what might be practically possible under the British Constitution of Queen, Lords, and Commons. He did not complain in any way of the speech of the right hon. Baronet, or of the tone of the debate. He admitted that a marvellous change had come over that Assembly and over Great Britain in the treatment of Irish questions. Irish questions were discussed in a kindlier and fairer spirit, and in a more courteous tone than formerly; but upon that subject, he (Mr. Sullivan) said, they were not their judges. They were not impartial judges. If they were their judges, who were the defendants? They were not, and could not be, impartial. He could not himself be impartial if he were in their place. They declined once and for all to discuss this question from the low level of a mere Bill before the House. This was no murmur from discontented Essex or Northumberland. This was no dissatisfaction in a county; this was the voice, the complaint, of a nation. That was the protest of a Kingdom foully robbed of all the attributes of its nationhood—of a Kingdom which had never condoned that crime, and which now, in blood and in turbulence, now in civil commotion, now by one means or another, legitimate or illegitimate, had protested and would, while there was manhood in its people, protest to the bitter end. There was such a thing in the world as nationality, national life, national instinct, national pride, and national honour. It was a force that moulded society in the present day more than the sword; and before the spirit of nationality even that

Assembly must bow. The hon. Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland) had told them that no countries in Europe were so clearly marked out to be one as England and Ireland. Where did that hon. Gentleman learn his geography? Was the line between France and Belgium, or between Spain and Portugal, as distinctly traced as that between Ireland and England? The inexorable logic of facts had for centuries so ordered it that the two islands should be under the same Crown and Government; but from the reign of James I. down to the present day, the Irish people, while they had, with scarcely an interruption, loyally given into the partnership of the three Kingdoms under one Crown and Government, had yet always proclaimed their determined resistance to the absorption, extinction, or domination of any one of the three. They held the patent of their nationhood from on High, and neither the theories of the hon. Member for Downpatrick nor his singular geography could obliterate it. They had been charged with having one speech for the House of Commons and another for the popular platform in Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] He wished he could identify the hon. Member who said "hear," that he might see whether he always said the same thing to his constituents and to the House. For his part he (Mr. Sullivan) always said the same thing, and he told his constituents that he acquitted this Assembly of any conscious sense of injustice towards Ireland, and that the blame for its wrongdoing was attributable to long existing habits, feelings, and traditions; but he did say that the whole tone of English opinion at the present moment towards the people of Ireland was this, stating it as fairly as he could—"What can we do for you? We Englishmen wish to rule Ireland well, but we mean to rule her—that is to say, we mean to rule Ireland according to our ideas of well, and we mean to rule you, well or ill." They were told that Ireland was prosperous. They heard the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson) last night, and he had hoped to have heard an eloquent speech from him to-night. They heard the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland referring to the marvellous prosperity of Ireland. Irish prosperity! There were three or four millions of Irish money which had been accumulating in Irish

banks for some years past to such an extent that Ireland was marvellously prosperous! If he turned to the City articles of London newspapers, he found that this country was proved to be in a deplorable condition by the accumulation of money in our banks. At the present moment every writer on finance and trade would point to the capital lying in our banks, not as a sign of wealth, but rather as a sign of stagnation of our industry. They were accustomed in Ireland to hear a great deal about the plea of Irish prosperity. When Lord Carlisle was Viceroy, at the very period when Ireland was passing through severe sufferings, so much did he dwell upon this topic, that he was constantly called by the name of "Prosperity Carlisle." When Ulster was as Protestant as it was now, and when it was as prosperous as compared with the rest of Ireland, Ulster was most democratic, whether in 1782 or in 1789, and in Belfast was held the first banquet in Ireland which celebrated the triumph of the French Revolution. At the period immediately preceding the Union the Minister in England felt himself safe from impeachment, while he was seeking to corrupt and betray the Irish Parliament. The present feeling which had been expressed towards Ulster was prompted by the sentiment that the people of Ulster should be taught that those who dwelt in Ulster needed the power of England to protect it from this peril. He hoped that Ulster might yet become friendly to Home Rule, for he could not think that Ulster had utterly lost its spirit. He could quote a resolution to the effect that the claim of any body of men over the King, Lords, and Commons of Ireland was unconstitutional, illegal, and a grievance, and that was signed by men whose grandchildren told them that Ireland could never entertain the idea of governing herself. He was glad to find that Ulster was every day becoming more and more Irish, for borough after borough and county after county was coming into the Irish cause. The real issue was this—was there sufficient Irish work to occupy the attention of an Irish Parliament, and could that work be done usefully by such a Parliament? [An hon. MEMBER: No!] Ireland was as large a country as many in Europe, the independence of which had been guaranteed by England. Would they allow Belgium to be amalgamated or absorbed even by the German Empire, great as it was? He rather thought not. If, then, there was work for an Irish Parliament to do, who could do it more usefully than Irishmen? The Irish people were not and could not be satisfied to have the legislation of their country conducted in London. They maintained that they had the best means of knowing what was wanted for their country, and were therefore best qualified to attend to its interests. The real fact was that England had sacrificed the interests of Ireland to its own love of dominion and its desire to act upon a principle of centralization, instead of adopting federation, a system under which communities could prosper without the healthy life of individual members of the community being destroyed. It was a mistake for England to suppose that the Irish people loved her or her institutions. As a matter of fact, nine-tenths of the Irish people grew up from their childhood with an instinctive hatred and aversion from England. ["No, no!"] Hon. Members might dissent from the statement, but he knew it to be true. He was one of those who grew up with the feelings he had described; but as he approached manhood, and had opportunities of becoming acquainted with the great and noble characteristics of the English character, he looked back with intense regret upon the unreasoning hatred in which he had grown up from the days of his youth. At the same time, it was certain that the feeling to which he had referred still existed, and that it was owing to that fact that England kept Ireland in a state of subjection. ["No, no!"] Well, let them go to the Irish in America and see what were their sentiments. They had filled the world with combustible materials, that bode no good to the peace and tranquillity of England if ever the hour of danger struck for her. In alluding to the hostility of the Irish population he was bearing testimony to facts within his knowledge, not holding forth a menace or threat. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick and his Party now stepped forward to propose a compromise between consolidating the strength of the Empire and securing the liberties of their own land. They made the proposition and they meant to carry it out. They knew that England never would, never dare, to draw the sword upon Ireland standing upon such an offer of reconciliation, and from that there was growing up a new England to which they appealed to reverse the oppression of the old. They saw growing up masses of population in the great towns entertaining sentiments of generosity to which the statesmen of former days were strangers. They heard it in the voice of the hon. Member for South Warwickshire (Sir Eardley Wilmot) that evening. If they made a proposal which involved real national disgrace or surrender, England would fight them upon that, but what they proposed was something widely different. Before a year was over this subject would be discussed in very different tones. The Eastern horizon was red with the first fires of a conflagration the end of which no man could foresee, and England might be before long casting about for alliances and sources of strength. She would find none greater than Ireland if her just demands were conceded to her. But if they were refused, England would find in the passive discontent of the Irish people the same source of weakness which the Emperor of Austria found in Hungary when, after he had defeated the Hungarian Army in the field, he discovered that the Austrian Monarchy was about to crumble to pieces. He believed that the effort now being made by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Butt) would be attended with the same success as that which had been attained by the popular leaders in other countries, and which had restored peace and contentment and substituted strength for dismemberment.

MR. O'SULLIVAN supported the Motion, and in doing so took occasion to inveigh strongly against English policy in Ireland, and to appeal to the House to terminate peacefully a struggle which was a cause of weakness to the Empire at large.

TURKEY—RUSSIAN OFFICERS IN THE SERBIAN ARMY.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, I rise for the purpose of putting a Question to the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, of which I have given him private Notice. It has been stated in the papers that a Russian officer holding the rank of General in the Russian Army has now a high command in the Servian Army. It has also been stated more than once that Russian officers have been crossing over into Servia—presumably with the object of joining the Servian Army. I beg to ask the noble Earl, Whether those statements are true; and whether he can give the House any information as to the number of Russian officers who have entered the Servian service?

THE EARL OF DERBY: I presume that the officer alluded to in the noble Earl's Question as holding the rank of General in the Russian Army is General Tchernayeff. There is no doubt that General Tchernayeff was formerly employed in the Russian Army, and attained high rank in the Russian service. He subsequently, I am told, quitted that service, and became the Editor of a journal which supports the Slavonic cause. I am informed that he has since accepted the command which he now holds in the Servian Army. As to the other part of the noble Earl's Question—that relating to Russian officers who may have crossed into Servia with the view of entering into the Servian Army—I am afraid that I cannot answer it. Everybody knows, however, that there is a strong sympathy felt among the Russian population for the cause of the Servian insurgents; and it is possible and not improbable that various persons who have held rank and been employed in the Russian service may be serving as volunteers in the Servian Army. But on that point I cannot speak with any certainty; and I have no reason to believe that they do so with the assent, still less with the authority, of the Russian Government.

MALAY PENINSULA.

RESOLUTION.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in rising to call the attention of the House to the Malay Correspondence, and to move—

"That this House regrets that the Colonial Department did not bestow more attention on the affairs on the Malay Peninsula from the time of the Pangkok Treaty in January 1874 to October 1875,"

said: Before addressing myself to the subject before the House, I desire to make one or two preliminary observations. I am not going to call in question the acts of any other person than those of the noble Earl the Secretary of State, because he is technically responsible for all that has taken place; and also morally responsible—but I desire to qualify that statement by another. I am not so unreasonable as to expect from the Secretary of State a sufficiently careful reading of all the Papers sent from the Straits Settlements, added to all the mass of documents from all the other Colonies, but the country has a right to expect that that duty should be efficiently performed by the officials of the Colonial Office. If I do not say more in exoneration of the noble Earl in this respect, it is to avoid giving him an opening for saying that I am attacking those officials who are not here to defend themselves. It also well may be that the Staff of the Colonial Office is short-handed for the work it has to do, and I would gladly see the noble Earl take measures to strengthen the Staff of his office. I also feel bound in duty to state to your Lordships that which I have had the pleasure of saying in private, that I am grateful to my noble Friend, and that I feel the gratitude of the country is due to him for his conduct with regard to Sultan Ismail, and for having preserved the country from the disgrace which would have attached to any precipitate court martial or mock trial of Sultan Ismail, such as some persons in the colony were desirous of. I wish now to make an observation on the method of the Colonial Office in the matter of Parliamentary Papers. The Fiji Papers were given to your Lordships on the day of the debate; the Gambia Papers were delivered only one clear day before the discussion. The Malay Blue Book, No. 1,111, was delivered in the beginning of August last, though it professed to have been presented July 31st, 1874. This Blue Book may be called the undiscussed Blue Book, and the noble Earl appears to wish that it should be indiscutable, since it was delivered too late for discussion last Session, and February of this year was too early. One of the Blue Books lately delivered, No. 1,320, also professes to have been presented August 6th, 1875, and these Blue Books were only delivered to the other House on the day of a debate there. I will not say that this method of delivering Parliamentary Papers is intended to prevent Parliamentary discussion, though it has that effect; but I say it is a strong proof of the procrastination and dilatoriness of the Colonial Office, which have in a great measure contributed to the recent unfortunate events in the Malay Peninsula—and I would ask the noble Earl why he took nearly two months to answer Sir William Jervois's despatch? Now, this House has already, in the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, expressed its regret for the loss of valuable lives during the recent military operations in the Malay Peninsula, and it will, no doubt, also regret, though in a lesser degree, the expenditure which has been caused by those operations; it will probably also regret that military operations should have taken place which must have had the effect of indisposing towards us the inhabitants of the Malay Peninsula. And it may be also supposed that it regrets the loss of life amongst the Malays, who were as much patriots as the Poles or any others who have had the sympathy of this country; and if this House regrets all these circumstances, or even if it should confine its regrets to the loss of the valuable lives of Her Majesty's troops, then it must also regret the cause of that loss, and that cause will be found to be principally the want of timely attention on the part of the Colonial Office. The Blue Books contain a discussion between the Secretary of State and the Governor of the Straits Settlements, chiefly turning upon the point of whether the Residents appointed by Sir Andrew Clarke had, or had not, assumed the administration of the countries where they resided. The Governor says they had; and the Secretary of State maintains, in his despatch of December 10, 1875, that the Residents were merely advisers; but I will show your Lordships that all this was clear to the Colonial Office before Sir William Jervois proceeded to his post, and that the Colonial Department approved of all that the Residents did, until Mr. Birch was killed and a dead body was found at their door, and then they did like the people in the Arabian Nights, who endeavoured to remove the dead hunchback from their own to another door. I do not wish to exonerate Sir William Jervois for having gone beyond his instructions, and there is much to object to in the unseemly tone of his despatches; but he has received hard and unequal measure, for the despatch addressed to him on the 10th December last would have been an admirable despatch, if it had been dated March, 1874, and addressed to Sir Andrew Clarke. And there is another person besides Sir Andrew Clarke upon whom the noble Earl should lay blame, and that is upon himself for not having more closely watched the proceedings of the Straits officials, for not having earlier checked departures from instructions, and from what he now states were his intentions; and the noble Earl has proved that he himself is conscious of this, by his not having recalled Sir William Jervois. Now in proof of this it will only be necessary to place before your Lordships the outlines of certain proceedings along with the dates of the reception at the Colonial Office of Reports upon them. The Report of Captain Speedy was received at the Colonial Office on the 10th May, 1875. From this Report it is clear that Captain Speedy was the chief, it may be said, the sole administrator. Mr. Skinner in his Report says—“Flogging is a more frequent punishment (under Captain Speedy) than in our Courts.” The Secretary of State replied on the 25th May, 1875 (No. 24, p. 84), that he had read Captain Speedy’s Reports with interest, and that it was desirable to obtain, if practicable, the abatement of debt slavery. This being a Malay custom was one of the matters the Residents were precluded from interfering with by the Pangkok Treaty. Sir Andrew Clarke had anticipated Sir William Jervois in giving the title of Commissioner instead of Resident to the British officials sent to Sunghie Ujong. Captain Dunlop’s Report of his proceedings in that country was received by the Colonial Office on the 30th January, 1875, and on the 4th of March the Secretary of State approved of these proceedings. The Datu Klana of Sunghie Ujong applied to the Governor, Sir Andrew Clarke, for an officer and also for a British flag, “so as to be under the protection of the Great Governor.” This Sir Andrew Clarke granted him, describing the flag merely as a compliment to the British Government. The Datu Bandar, however, a Ruler with powers nearly co-ordinate with those of the Datu Klana, objected to this hoisting of the flag, and a quarrel ensued between the two Chiefs. The Straits authorities intervened with an armed force in December, 1874. Sir Andrew Clarke informed the Datu Bandar on the 3rd October, 1874, that if he makes war against his Chief, the Datu Klana, he will in truth be making war upon the Queen. Captain Dunlop relates in his Report that he seized three Chinese head men who were suspected of having assisted the Bandar with money. He first pronounced them traitors and rebels who had incurred the punishment of death and confiscation; but relenting from this view he imposed a fine of $3,000 on each, and as one of them was not ready with his money next morning he had him flogged. There is no word of disapprobation in the Blue Book of such proceedings, and granting that the Klana assented to it, it is not fitting that a British officer should inflict such punishment on behalf of one Malay Ruler on the adherents of another. Captain Dunlop then settled the ways and means of Sunghie Ujong, leased the opium, spirits’, and pawn-brokers’ monopolies, and established a gambling farm—and the Blue Book does not contain a syllable of protest against a British officer sanctioning the establishment of gambling houses as one of the civilizing elements of the Residential system. In replying on the 4th March, 1874, to the Governor’s despatch, forwarding Captain Dunlop’s Report, the Secretary of State merely “regrets that the Governor has found himself so soon called upon to resume hostile operations against any of the Malay Chiefs.” It is impossible to account for this absolute acquiescence in a course so diametrically opposed to the professed policy of the Colonial Office, and I can find no other answer than either that the Secretary of State never read the Papers, or that he had no other policy than that which his subordinates chose to adopt. It is unnecessary to trouble your Lordships with further instances to prove that from their first appointment the Residents did not confine themselves to advice, but undertook the administration of the country, and it is only for the sake of the dates that I have referred to them, because the noble Earl has since admitted, in his despatch of June 1st last to Sir William Jervois, that—

“It is indeed clear that the Residents have exceeded the function of counsellors, which they were intended to discharge.”

Lord Stanley of Alderley

To turn to another matter, the want of attention or of due diligence on the part of the Colonial Department has been strikingly shown in the selection of the Residents. The noble Earl was as fully conscious as everybody else of the importance of this selection when he wrote to Sir Andrew Clarke on the 4th September, 1874, that—

“It was essential that these very responsible posts should be filled by officers of the highest ability, and on whose conduct complete reliance may be placed.”

Now first, with regard to Captain Speedy. He has done very well according to his lights, and left as he was without guidance; but it does not follow that because he has done pretty well in Larut, he should do well in Perak, since in Larut he had hardly any people but Chinese to deal with. But what was known of him on his appointment? All that was known of him in the Straits was that he arrived there after the Abyssinian War, in which he took some part, and that he was appointed police superintendent at Penang; that shortly after he threw up his appointment and actually entered the service of the Mantri of Larut, who was asserting his independence of the Sultan of the country, and went to India to raise sepoy for his new master. At that time he caused some flutter in India and Indian circles about this matter, and some legal question as to whether it did not fall under the Indian Penal Code or some Act of Parliament. It was in the service of the Mantri that Sir Andrew Clarke found him, and it was a singular appointment to recommend, and one over which the Secretary of State might well hesitate. Next, with regard to Mr. Davidson. He was a Scotch lawyer in good practice at Singapore. He was unconnected with the public service, and if he had been appointed to any other place but Salangore, I should not have called his appointment in question. But on the 10th of May, 1874, I wrote to the noble Earl, telling him there was a report that Mr. Davidson would be appointed to Salangore, and asking him to ascertain something about his relations and pecuniary interests in that country, and that I hoped to hear from him before I gave Notice of a Question on the subject in the House. To the best of my recollection (and subject to the noble Earl's correction if I am wrong) he informed me that he did not believe there was any such intention. I also stated to your Lordships on the 19th May, 1874, that Mr. Davidson had lent money to Tunku Dhya Udin, but I did not mention his name because his appointment was not certain. It might have been expected, however, that the noble Earl would have cautioned Sir Andrew Clarke not to make such an appointment. Now, these were the pecuniary interests of Mr. Davidson, who since has administered Salangore as Resident. Tunku Kudin, brother of the Sultan of Keddah, came to Salangore and married a daughter of the Sultan. After pressure and interference, by the Straits' authorities, he was established as Viceroy of Salangore under his father-in-law. Meantime he had visited Singapore and made friends with the merchants and officials, and borrowed largely from Mr. Davidson. Before Mr. Davidson was named Resident he had obtained, in March, 1873, a concession of a monopoly of tin mines in Salangore for 10 years, and he and his friends tried to get up a company in England. From an advertisement in a London paper of July 6th, 1874, The London and China Telegraph, which, I presume, is taken in at the Colonial Office, it appears that the nominal capital of this company was £200,000, and £100,000 was to be paid to Count Gelois and Mr. Davidson, the concessionaires or vendors of the concession. When the United States Government has lately objected to one of their Ministers holding shares in a company, which he had bought with his own money, we should not be less scrupulous with regard to our Residents. Was a man with private interest of this kind in the country a suitable person to appoint as Resident there? Even Sir Andrew Clarke, who proposed the appointment, felt the incongruity, and so it was arranged that Mr. Davidson, before entering on his office, should transfer his pecuniary rights to some other person; but his letter announcing that this transfer would be made, shows that it was a mere formality. We then find that Mr. Davidson asked for the intervention of the Government to get the Sultan of Salangore to confirm the concession of the tin monopoly, and Sir Andrew Clarke objected to do so, unless the exclusive character of the concession was removed; and the concessionary was limited to one year for marking out the places where he desired to dig, and two years to begin work. This was consented to. But the Sultan's deed of confirmation contains a remarkable stipulation; it is that, though the tax on other people's tin may be raised, the tax on the tin of the concessionary may not. Was this the stipulation of the concessionary or of the Resident? it matters not, they were the same person. What did the noble Earl say of this? He simply "feels an interest in it, as a promising attempt to extend British enterprise." I would here observe that no balance-sheet of the revenue has yet been published for Salangore or Perak. I come next to Mr. Birch and Mr. Braddell, formerly Attorney General at Singapore. Of the unfortunate Mr. Birch, for obvious reasons, I desire to say as little as possible. Mr. Braddell, though residing in Singapore, has taken part in all the proceedings in the Malay Peninsula as Secretary for Native States; and with regard to these two gentlemen I shall confine myself to reminding the noble Earl that in August, 1874, he received letters of Mr. Aitchison, which, to say the least, showed that the pecuniary relations of these gentlemen with Malay Rulers and others made them unfit for the duties which they subsequently have had to perform. On the 20th November, 1874, the Government and Council of Inquiry into Mr. Aitchison's statement reported upon them. That Report was so palpably unsatisfactory that it should have been sufficient to prompt the noble Earl without my communication of March 2, 1875, to provide better men for a public service, the exigencies of which he was fully aware of. If the noble Earl disputes this view, I must ask him to lay before your Lordships the Report of the Court of Inquiry, and the Correspondence relating to it. There has been a controversy between the Colonial Office and Sir William Jervois as to the cause of the outbreak against Mr. Birch. The Colonial Office has thought it right to attribute the murder of Mr. Birch to the change of policy introduced by Sir William Jervois. In my opinion it was unpremeditated, it arose immediately out of the imprudent act of the interpreter striking a Malay; at the same time I do not believe that act would have had the fatal result which immediately followed, if a store of hatred and ill-feeling had not accumulated in the minds of the Malays. I find a witness saying that when the affair took place, Maharaja Lelah, the Chief of the village where it occurred, shouted from the steps of his house—

"This is not the will of the Raja, or his order; it is our will, because we cannot stand it any longer. Others' houses have been burned, and where are we to go to, if our houses are burned too! It is better that we should die at once."

This allusion to burning is cleared up by a letter from a writer on the spot, which appeared in The Times of December 25th, which says—

"He (Mr. Birch) had made many enemies among the small Chiefs of Perak. The Chiefs are a bad lot, and on several occasions he had to resort to strong measures, such as burning the houses of refractory head men, by way of example."

So that while the Colonial Office fancied that the Resident was acting by advice, he was advising by burning. But as the noble Earl wrote to Sir William Jervois, April 8th, 1875, that he had been unable to satisfy himself that they (the Residents then in office) will possess the special qualifications which are absolutely required, and left to Sir William Jervois an opportunity of considering the whole subject, Sir William Jervois, and not the Secretary of State, must bear the responsibility of having left Mr. Birch in a position for which he was unfitted. I think I have now shown that there has been on the part of the Colonial Department dilatoriness and neglect in watching over the conduct of the Residents, and the selection of them, and a habit of leaving the officials to do very much as they thought fit; in short, a want of attention and due diligence at a critical time, and the consequence has been loss of life and expenditure, and that the whole Malay Peninsula has been set in a blaze, and the inhabitants, many of whom have been driven from their homes, have been made hostile to us, and we must either retrace our steps to non-intervention or assume the responsibility and the cost of securing proper government for the people we have now deprived of their independence. I wish to make a few observations on the future policy of this country with regard to the Malay Peninsula. There are said to be three courses which might be pursued—namely, letting it alone without intermeddling; meddling idents; and annexation. I adopt the opinion which I have already expressed in favour of the first course, as our Empire is overgrown, and the cost of maintaining it in the Malay Peninsula will be a great expense on this country only for the benefit of the Chinese and a few Europeans and officials in Singapore. It is now, perhaps, useless to put forward that view except with respect to the Ujong, with regard to which the Secretary of State seems to be of the same opinion as myself, I will only mention the other two alternatives. Residents must, however, be taken into several shades. I am glad to hear that the noble Earl states that the plan of Sir William Jervois of governing the Malay Peninsula by British officials in the name of the Sultan is only annexation under another name. In fact, it might be called hypocritical or dishonest annexation, if there is anything as honest as annexation. Experience has shown that Sir Andrew Clarke's method ended in the same result as that of Sir William Jervois. It remains the plan which the noble Earl tends to carry out, and which he originally intended. I heartily hope it may succeed, and secure to the Malays that prosperity and good treatment which they have a right to expect in this country, which has interfered with them only by the right of might. I should state that I am confident of the rectitude of the intentions of the noble Earl; I am only complaining of his dilatoriness, or inability to carry them out. But in order to succeed it is necessary for the noble Earl to employ a higher class of men than those who have been hitherto employed; they must be directly responsible to himself, and independent of the Singapore Press and mercantile body. It should copies of all letters from the Government to the Residents be sent to the Secretary of State so that he may have to complain, as he has done, that Sir Andrew Clarke's communications to the Residents had never come under his eye, but the Colonial Office might do well to adopt the plan of the Foreign Office, by instructing the Residents to send their despatches to the Colonial Office under flying seal to the Secretary of the Straits, in the same way as the Envoys of Her Majesty's Envoys send their despatches to the Foreign Secretary.

under flying seal to the Embassies at Paris and elsewhere. But if the Colonial Department should not make a very careful selection of officials for the Malay Peninsula and exercise a severe control over them, further troubles, bloodshed, and expenditure may be expected; and if the choice lay between annexation and administration of Malay States by dictatorial Residents I should certainly prefer annexation, since in that case the Malays would at least obtain the protection of British law. Sir William Jervois very candidly wrote on the 16th October, 1875—

"By ruling in the name of the Sultan the form of government will be more adapted to the conditions of the case, and will enable us to deal easily with matters that might be difficult of solution under English law."

I will ask leave to read an extract from a letter from a gentleman well acquainted with Singapore, written in March last—

"You will be rather astonished to find that the Singapore people (British) are opposed to annexation, and in favour of a Protectorate. This is, however, easily explained. In the former case the Malays and their land will be subject to British laws. In the latter the will of the Governor or Commissioner will be the same, and grants of land and other advantages can be easily made over to Europeans, the ultimate end being that all the good land will be in their hands before long. For this reason, as also because I believe the Malays will have a much fairer chance under British law, I am decidedly in favour of annexation. There is nothing between this and leaving them alone. In any case you had better inquire into this land question, as I hear that some large grants have already been given. Britishers seem to think that if enough rice land is left for feeding the Malays that is all that is required."

I hope the noble Earl will make inquiry as to these grants of land. The Blue Books contain no reference whatever to the burning of houses, and plunder and sale by auction of the plough cattle in the county adjoining Sunghie Ujong. The noble Earl spoke of the reports of these proceedings as "scraps of newspapers;" but I have found from the Barbadoes newspapers that he does not attach an invidious sense to that word, since he spoke of "scraps of official despatches" to a deputation of planters. But from the doubts expressed by the Secretary of State in his despatch of June 1st, as to a foreign element in the force to be employed for the Residents, he would appear to have some misgivings as to Sikh, Arab, or other levies, for he could not mean Her Majesty's European regiments, and as it is essential that proceedings such as those of the Arab force under M. Fontaine should not recur again, I will ask your Lordships' indulgence for a few moments longer to prove by Christian law and theology that these men were brigands, and as far as concerns the men themselves Mussulman law is identical with Christian law, only that it is rather more precisely declared. The noble Earl called this force Native Irregulars. They were neither; they were only natives in the sense that we are all natives of some place, and they were not irregulars, which is a military term for a particular formation. Let us suppose that this expedition was French, and had invaded Siam from Cochin China, and that instead of this Arab force there was one composed of Germans. We should all say that they were mercenary cut-throats. If they had been Englishmen we should say in addition that they had violated the Foreign Enlistment Act. Now, the Foreign Enlistment Acts were not passed merely to retain Englishmen for the King's service, but in obedience to the Law of Nations. Two Acts were passed in the reign of George II., but the Act of 1819 is the earliest of which there is any Parliamentary history, and I find in it that the Earl of Harrowby used arguments in favour of the Bill founded on Grotius, Vattel, and Puffendorff, and that the Earl of Carnarvon said that—"He (Lord Harrowby) had marshalled all the Dutch and German jurists in his ranks, and had turned all the scraps and quotations which could be taken from them to the very best use to which ingenuity could turn them."—[1 Hansard, xl. 1414.]

Now I have not selected this extract from that debate in order to show the hereditary origin of the use of the word scraps by my noble Friend, but in order to bar his making light of Grotius and other jurists—because he will not now willingly plagiarize his ancestor. Well, Grotius did not invent or originate the law that he lays down; he only follows the teaching of the old Catholic catechisms respecting the 6th Commandment, and he quotes St. Augustin as saying that it is not a sin to bear arms, but a sin to serve for plunder. But if Catholic Catechisms are not considered as carrying weight, what was the doctrine and practice of the early Christians? In the year 286 the Roman Emperor brought the Theban Legion, which was composed of Christians, into Switzerland, where they were ordered to attack and exterminate the Bagaudæ, a Swiss tribe, an expedition similar to that of Sunghie Ujong. This they refused to do, as it was an unlawful order. The Legion was decimated, but as it persisted in its refusal, the whole of it was massacred without resistance on its part, with its commander, St. Maurice, who left his name to the town near the lake of Geneva, where this massacre happened. M. Fontaine's Arabs were not British subjects, and by their own law were strictly prohibited from taking part in such an expedition and became brigands, and if they killed any one, murderers; and if those who offer bribes are as guilty of bribery as those who take bribes, what is to be inferred of those who enrol brigands, or sanction such enrolment? I have now the honour to move the Resolution of which I have given Notice. I do not know whether it will receive any support, but I feel certain that at least the noble Earl will, from his knowledge of the facts, yield his inner assent to it; and I would suggest to my noble Friend to alter the words of the Resolution, and to admit frankly and candidly that, from whatever cause it arose, there is reason to regret that the attention of his Department was not given more in time to the Malay Peninsula and to the acts of the Residents.

Moved to resolve, That this House regrets that the Colonial Department did not bestow more attention on the affairs of the Malay Peninsula from the time of the Pangkok Treaty in January 1874 to October 1875.—(The Lord Stanley of Alderley.)

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, it would be extremely difficult for him, without unreasonably wasting their Lordships' time, to follow the noble Lord (Lord Stanley of Alderley) through the many subjects referred to in the discursive speech with which he had introduced his Resolution, and which was practically a Vote of Censure of a very serious character upon Her Majesty's Government. While listening to the noble Lord he could not help asking himself whether the noble Lord was in sober earnest in asking the House to agree to this Vote of Censure—which should never have been placed upon the Notice Paper unless the noble Lord was prepared to support it by strong and serious argument. The noble Lord was good enough to give him (the Earl of Carnarvon) credit for good intentions; but surely it was strangely inconsistent with that view of the case to propose a Vote of Censure. The Resolution ran as follows:—

This proposition raised three separate and distinct questions—first, intention; but really to ask for a Vote of Censure on such a point as that, was to turn what was a most important and deliberate act of Parliament into a jest. Secondly, the noble Lord asked the House to express its “regret that the Colonial Department” had failed in its duty. Did their Lordships ever remember before a Department thus attacked? If anybody was responsible it was himself and himself alone. He protested against such attacks upon those who were discharging the duties of a public office with self-sacrifice and self-devotion, and with so much ability—and on that point he knew he should have the assent of both sides of the House. Then the noble Lord censured him because sufficient attention was not paid to the affairs of the Peninsula. What did he mean by “attention?” It was a wholly relative term; and he denied that either the Ministers or the officials could be taxed with any want of attention. It was very difficult to disentangle the noble Lord’s charge from the mass of details with which he had overlaid it; but there were, at all events, some points on which he felt bound in courtesy to the noble Lord and to the House to give such explanation as lay in his power. The noble Lord’s charge, when closely examined, appeared to resolve itself into this—that by the Treaty of Pangkok the English Residents had been converted from advising into controlling agencies—and that he (the Earl of Carnarvon) as Secretary of State ought to have employed any European force during the last two years in support of the Residents. It would be in the recollection of the House that in 1867 the Government of the Straits Settlements was transferred from the India Office to the Colonial Office. From that date until 1873 the burden of every despatch that had been sent out by successive Colonial Ministers to the Residents at Perak was that they should interfere as little as possible with the affairs of the Peninsula, and the avoidance as far as possible of political complications. In 1873 a change occurred which was, he believed, forced upon the Government of the day by the overwhelming stress of circumstances. In that year, matters came to a serious head. The Chinese faction were engaged in a deadly feud with the Malays; blood was spilt, the trade of the country was being destroyed, anarchy reigned—and unless the whole district was to go into sheer ruin it was absolutely necessary that some control should be exercised by our Representatives in that country. On the 20th September, 1873, the noble Earl opposite, his Predecessor in office (the Earl of Kimberley), looking to all these circumstances, wrote to Sir Andrew Clarke, who had been appointed Governor, directing him to apply a remedy to this anarchical state of things. Sir Andrew Clarke, proceeding to act upon these instructions, ultimately agreed with the Chiefs in the Peninsula upon a Treaty which settled the question of disputed succession; appointed provisional Residents; and, while pacifying the Chinese rioters, inflicted punishment upon such of them as deserved it. Shortly after this a change took place in the Government of this country, and he (the Earl of Carnarvon) communicated to Sir Andrew Clarke his approval of the arrangements he had made. He thought the subject was one which required much consideration before he expressed even a qualified approval of the course that had been taken; but afterwards he gave a practical sanction to the Treaty engagements, and more recently still he had impressed upon the Governor, in successive despatches, the importance of exercising the utmost caution in dealing with the affairs of the Settlements. During the whole time that Sir William Jervois was in office, only two despatches on the subject of the Settlements reached the Colonial Office, and these described the condition of the country as being everything that could reasonably be desired. It was, therefore, with the utmost astonishment that he heard that the Governor had issued a Proclamation appointing Commissioners at the Native Courts, and making other alterations. The consequence was the outbreak which resulted in the cruel and barbarous murder of Mr. Birch, the British Resident at Perak. It was necessary at once to take strong measures. The troops on the spot were increased from 200 to 300, and after several conflicts, the measures taken put an absolute termination to the outbreak within two months of its commencement. He did not wish to go into the discussions that had arisen between Sir William Jervois and himself—those who wished to study them would find them in the despatches. He could not accept his noble Friend's views that because he saw reason to differ from Sir William Jervois on some points, though he agreed with him in others, it was his duty to recall him. He had a high opinion of that gentleman, formed on his past services, and however erroneous his proceedings in the first instance he had hastened to retrieve them. An important question at issue was whether Sir William Jervois was or was not right in making of his own motion, and without authority from home, a great and serious change in the policy hitherto pursued by England in reference to the government of the Straits Settlements, and on this point he was bound to admit that in his view Sir William Jervois was wholly wrong. In such cases as these the authority should emanate from the Secretary of State, who was responsible to Parliament for the policy adopted. The real question was—what ought to be our future policy with regard to the Malay Peninsula? The ultimate responsibility of colonial government had to be accounted for to the Crown and to Parliament, and a policy which might affect the whole Peninsula and perhaps entail a great expense must originate in the Government in England. On the general question he understood the noble Lord (Lord Stanley of Alderley) to lay down three courses as possible—in the first place, whether it was possible for Her Majesty's Government to withdraw altogether from interference with the Native Governments; in the second place, whether a policy of complete annexation was possible; and in the third whether the old system of advising by means of Residents could not be re-adopted and continued with certain modifications. With respect to withdrawal, it was simply not to be thought of—it was an unworthy policy, and would be a dangerous policy—instead of relieving us from responsibilities, it would increase complications. It need not, therefore, be discussed. Then, as to annexation, it was a question which had excited the greatest attention at home and on the spot. He drew an extremely small distinction between a virtual and a formal annexation—on the contrary, there were advantages in a formal which did not exist in a merely virtual annexation. Now, the local pressure brought to bear on the Colonial Government in favour of annexation was very great. A great deal of intemperate language had been used, and, to show the prevailing local opinion, he would read an extract from one of the Straits papers of considerable influence. It said—

“The serious nature of the news from Perak and Salangore suggests some reflections. We feel sure that the Government will have the hearty support of every man of common sense in the three Settlements, in taking the severest and most peremptory measures in this matter. It is the colony's quarrel; very well, the colony will settle it. We say this because we apprehend that the Home Government may possibly intervene. Nobody can say now-a-days what a British Government may do; but we distinctly think that the colony should, on its own responsibility, do what is right and proper, and, above all, do it quickly. Furthermore, if the Home Government show any signs of shrinking in this most righteous quarrel, then this colony will rebel, as it once very nearly did before, not against Her Majesty the Queen, but Her Majesty's ignorant and misguided Government.”

This language would tend to show the nature and amount of pressure which had been used. The local idea was this—that there was vast room for the development of trade, and that trade would be fostered by annexation. But there was a widely different side to the question, and it was well before deciding to count the cost. Annexation involved the occupation of a district of from 10,000 to 15,000 square miles. Even if the transaction were effected peacefully it would still be an extremely costly operation. They would have to set up the whole machinery of administration, and in any event should maintain a large military force. The mines, which were said to be a source of inexhaustible wealth, were almost universally private property.

There was no agriculture in the country on which they could depend; and the only solution of the question would be the importation of a large number of Chinese labourers which would in itself create an element of dissension and difficulty. If, on the other hand, they annexed by compulsion, of course the cost would be much greater, and they would have to deal with all the difficulties which the Dutch had to encounter. They should in a matter of this kind have regard to Imperial considerations, and should not forget that it affected not only China, but India. They were bound to scan the whole political position, and not to fix their eyes simply upon one spot when such a question arose—and in that view he was of opinion that it would be most imprudent to do anything that would lead them to a wider field, and that the Government should put down its foot steadily against any proposal of annexation. With respect to the system of Residents to which the noble Lord (Lord Stanley of Alderley) had referred—that system had been tried with great success in India, and in one place in the south of the Peninsula it had been already attended with good results. He freely admitted that they should always learn by experience, and it had been the object of Her Majesty's Government, while adhering to the system of Residents, to do so subject to certain modifications which by the light of experience seemed to be necessary. They proposed that there should be in Perak and elsewhere a Council composed of Chiefs of eminence and position in the country to assist the Resident. The use of the Councils would probably be more confined to Perak than the other States; but they would have the machinery and could apply wherever it was thought necessary. He believed that in consequence of those Councils the influence of the Government would be increased rather than diminished. Following the course which had been adopted with great success by the Dutch in Java, he proposed that each Resident should have a body-guard. Had Mr. Birch possessed a small armed force, the tragedy they all deplored would no doubt have been prevented. Lastly, he had deemed it wise to retain Abdullah as nominal Sovereign of Perak, weak and incapable as he had proved himself to be. Those who were familiar with Malay affairs knew how much importance attached to questions of race and family, and although at some future time it might be possible to make a change, the least dangerous course at present in his opinion was to retain Abdullah as Sovereign—provided, of course, he remained true and loyal to his duties. On the whole, he believed the general effect of the arrangements now contemplated would be good. He looked among other results for this—that the Government would have a better knowledge of the real feelings of the country, and obtain to a greater degree the concurrence of the Chiefs and rulers of those territories than had hitherto been the case. His noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Kimberley), in one of his despatches, had laid great stress on that point, and he (the Earl of Carnarvon) had done the same. The Malay was not a savage, unamenable to good treatment; he would answer to education if it were given him—and the course the Government were now taking was the most likely to educate him up to the standard of good government which was desirable. In conclusion, he would only say that what had occurred in the Malay Peninsula was but another illustration of the many difficulties and responsibilities of Colonial Empire in the East. Our authority was beset by dangers of every kind, against which the utmost watchfulness at home was sometimes of no avail. He quite agreed with the noble Lord (Lord Stanley of Alderley) that the only course to be pursued was to watch very closely the accounts which might be transmitted from the spot, and to require from our officials diligent attention to local circumstances and hearty co-operation in carrying out the policy laid down. Looking at the question in all its bearings, he submitted that the noble Lord had not made out a case for any censure of the Colonial Department.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he agreed with most that had been said in reply to the noble Lord's speech, and believing that the noble Lord the Colonial Secretary was justified in the course he had taken, he could not support the Motion. The subject was, no doubt, of very considerable importance. The position which this country occupied in the Peninsula was a very peculiar one. Formerly the Portuguese held a great supremacy there, the Dutch succeeded to the Portuguese, and ultimately the influence devolved upon the English. Many persons supposed that we might leave the affairs of the Peninsula alone, but no one who studied the actual circumstances of the case could fail to convince himself that a policy of non-intervention was impossible. When European settlements of such importance as those of Penang and Singapore were planted side by side with Malay States, it was impossible for them to avoid exercising great influence either for good or evil on the surrounding population, and with that influence came responsibility. The occurrence of the Chinese riots in Perak, coupled with the danger to the Native States arising from Europeans obtaining large concessions and employing them to acquire political influence, rendered our intervention absolutely necessary. Of course we had no right to prevent European influence from penetrating into the Malay States, but it was our duty to put those States as far as possible in a position to meet the new condition of things. All those circumstances seemed to him to have rendered it necessary to take the state of the Peninsula into consideration with a view to some change of policy. No doubt Sir Andrew Clarke went beyond his instructions, but he thought the noble Earl had done right in upholding his proceedings. He was sorry the noble Lord should have felt himself compelled to pass a reproof upon Sir William Jervois; but under the circumstances he felt bound to say he thought his noble Friend had taken the correct view of the matter. At the same time it was due to Sir William Jervois, who was a distinguished public servant, to say that he had only done what appeared to him to be his duty. He had no doubt committed an error in taking steps before receiving advice from home; but he entirely agreed that it would be unjust to recall him because of that mistake. He was a man of great abilities, and had proved himself a good administrator and Colonial Governor. On the whole, the policy adopted by the Government seemed to be the policy least open to objection. The mistake made by Sir William Jervois was to suppose that because Residents were appointed therefore it was necessary that they should have their own way, and that the States in question, being no longer independent, ought to be annexed. But in that course of reasoning there were a great many assumptions which were not quite justifiable. It was possible to give Native States wholesome advice without taking them altogether under our control. For an example of the success of that system we had only to look to India. Our system, therefore, should be administered so as not to destroy the Malayan Governments, but to support, advise, and guide them. On the whole, looking at the position we held in the Malay Peninsula, although it might be open to all the objections to which an intermediate course was always liable, yet it was the wisest and most judicious that we could assume; and he was glad to hear from his noble Friend that in all the States where it had been tried, except at Perak, the system had succeeded.

LORD LAWRENCE said, it seemed to him, as far as he could judge, that some blame attached not only to the Governor of the Straits and the Governor of Penang, but also in some degree to the Colonial Office. But the real point as it struck him was that the Governor of Penang in the first instance committed a great mistake in preferring Abdullah to Ismail. Ismail was a man of stronger character than Abdullah, and, above all, he was a man whom the people of the country and the other Chiefs preferred. That appeared to have been the origin of the whole matter. Moreover, our representatives in those parts were placed in a most trying position through having no force near to help them in circumstances of extremity. A greater amount of force—two Native and one English regiments he believed—was formerly kept at the Straits and at Penang, but it had been reduced on the ground of expense, so that when disturbance broke out and troops were wanted they had to be sent for from China, India, and elsewhere. If under the previous system of non-interference they had more troops at the Straits and at Penang, how much more necessary was it that they should have a force of some strength there when they began to change their policy; and if the policy of having Residents at the Native Courts was to be maintained, there must be a considerable increase of military force there to uphold their authority. As to whether they should

ly give up interfering with the internal affairs of the Malay Straits—or, other words, whether they should draw their Residents from Perak

Laroot—or whether they should in the country, he thought the view indicated by the noble Earl the Colonial Secretary was the right one. In the course of time, it was found the system of maintaining a Resident in Perak would not work, it would be for us to re-consider our position.

SIR BLANCHFORD said, that he expressed his views reluctantly as they differed widely from those entertained by higher authorities. It was true when a State fell into a condition which was a source of danger to the neighbouring States, as had happened in the case of Laroot, those neighbours had a right to call upon the Ruler to place that territory in a position that should not be dangerous, and if he failed to do that they had a right to take measures for their own safety, even although those measures might amount to the annexation of the misgoverned territory. But that reason did not apply to the Government of Perak and Selangore, the practical annexation of which (for in these Provinces the advice of the Residents was only to be asked, but “acted on,”) was no such justification, and was therefore, in his opinion, improper. He respected the energy of English merchants and the public spirit of colonial officers, but that energy and public spirit it was apt in the British Colonies to be a commercial and official pressure for annexation of neighbouring territory. It was to that pressure, and to the ident expectations which had proved so appily fallacious, that the Treaty of Singapore was due. That Treaty was, in his view, a false step, which, as far as Perak and Selangore were concerned, he would wish to see retraced. He feared the desire to hold a consistent course would lead to what was called “throwing good money after bad.” According to the plan of his noble Friend, the Rajah of Perak, instructed by a Resident, addressed by a Council, and removable if failed to do as he was bid, appeared almost much like the Governor of a Crown Colony. In his own judgment the British Government should be represented in these States, if at all, not by a Resident whose so-called advice had been enforced by British power, but by an officer in the nature of a Consul, who, if his counsels were not followed, could be withdrawn without discredit.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in reply, said: I will not take up your Lordships' time by replying to some of the rhetorical artifices of my noble Friend. It is, perhaps, too much to expect that the noble Earl should admit that he has not given his attention to these affairs; the noble Earl has said that he was now giving them all his attention, and that he would do so in future, and therefore it will be more graceful for me, with the permission of the House, to withdraw the Motion.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

(The Lord Henniker.)

(NO. 134.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD HENNIKER, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it was a Bill to prevent the present rapid decrease of wild fowl in this country. There were two causes of decrease, one indirect—namely, the increase of drainage and the reclamation of waste lands. This, of course, could not be dealt with; but the other, the direct cause, could be dealt with—namely, the shooting and destroying these birds during the breeding season. These birds had been included in the Small Birds Protection Act of 1872; but that Act had been spoilt, as far as these birds were concerned, in Committee in the House of Commons, for the penalties had been made so low to meet the case of the small birds, that the value of these birds themselves was greater than the penalty imposed. This Bill had been approved by the House of Commons this Session by a majority of 339 to 15, and it was drawn on the lines of the Sea Bird Preservation Act, 1869, which had worked very well, and led to a very satisfactory result. He might add, that the Committee of the British Association, on the close time for these and other birds, had gone very carefully into the list of birds included in the Bill.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

AT SALONICA.—QUESTIONS.

EARL DE LA WARR asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any objection to laying upon the Table of the House the Papers and Correspondence relative to the late outrage at Salonica and the trial and execution of the persons implicated in the murders?

EARL GRANVILLE: Before the noble Earl answers that Question I wish to put to him another of a larger nature which I understand he will have no objection to answer. I wish to ask him whether, on account of the change in the state of affairs in the East, the noble Earl can state when it will be possible to lay upon the Table the Papers which will give information to Parliament with regard to the course which has up to this time been pursued by Her Majesty's Government in the Eastern Question?

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, considering that all efforts in favour of pacification have unfortunately failed, and that war has broken out between Servia and Montenegro on the one hand and Turkey on the other, there is no diplomatic reason why the Correspondence showing the general course of events and the policy pursued by Her Majesty's Government should not be laid upon the Table. The Correspondence, I may mention, is somewhat voluminous, and, as a great deal of the information which it contains has been confidentially communicated by foreign States, we shall have to consult those States as to whether they are willing to consent to the publication of it. That may cause some delay, but we shall lose as little time as possible in obtaining their consent. So far as the policy of Her Majesty's Government is concerned, I am perfectly ready to lay these Papers before your Lordships. With respect to the Question of the noble Earl (Earl De La Warr), I think it would be better to include the Papers relating to it in the general Correspondence.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF SANDWICH asked the Under Secretary for War, What allowances will be given to an officer of Militia called up to undertake the duties of an Adjutant and Paymaster while that office was vacant? The noble Earl complained that he could obtain no allowance for the gentleman whom, under the circumstances stated in the Question, he had some short time since appointed to discharge the duties of paymaster of his regiment.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, that about two years ago a like circumstance had happened in his own regiment. He thought a commanding officer should be simply bound to train his men, and not also to act, as he was now required to do in certain cases, as Paymaster.

EARL CADOGAN regretted that his noble Friend should have to complain of the War Office, but the Regulations relating to his Question were that during the interval of retirement of an adjutant and the appointment of his successor the quartermaster acted as adjutant under the responsibility of an officer in command, and received 5s. a-day extra pay; but in case of regiments which had no quartermaster, the rule was to require the officer in command to act as paymaster, but no pay was attached. The injustice had been felt, and it was under contemplation to make a rule that the paymasters of the Brigade Depôts should also act as paymasters of Militia regiments.

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY moved an Amendment on Clause 1, the object of which was to make the subjects of Native States residing under British protection at Zanzibar and Muscat and violating the laws relating to the Slave Trade, punishable by British Courts of Law in India only upon the consent of the Native State whose subjects the offenders might be, and without which there could be no right of jurisdiction. The protection given by the British Government out of India to the subjects of the Native States, was a consequence of having precluded them by Treaties from entering into diplomatic relations with other Powers; but this protection did not confer a right of tion, and punishment was not a tive of protection. As the Rao of had expressed his willingness to the proposed jurisdiction, and as were very few other Rulers whose s were concerned, there could be culty in obtaining these consents, refuse to do so would be to be ry for arbitrariness' sake.

ndment moved, to leave out third aph of Preamble, and in Clause 1, , after ("Majesty") insert ("and onsent of such Prince or State to jurisdiction under this Act shall een obtained and laid before each of Parliament.") — (The Lord of Alderley.)

EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, endment of his noble Friend was upon an entire misconception of affairs. He cordially concurred e objects of the Bill, but thought oth this Bill and some others efore Parliament would be more torily dealt with if they had been isly referred to the Government a. While he had no doubt the s of India would willingly join overnment of India in putting he slave trade, it would be ob- able to allow such matters to l upon their consent, as proposed e noble Lord (Lord Stanley of y).

MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, th reference to the question raised e noble Earl (the Earl of North- of submitting questions of policy Indian Government, he did not r that was essential in all cases. se, there were cases in which such ces were made; but there was no ation with the Government of efore the great Act which re-con- l the Government of India was

In fact, each case must depend s own merits. In this particular f a reference was to be made, he prefer the Government of Bom- hich was more likely to possess e information on it than the Go- nt of India. He did not, how- ish noble Lords opposite to have pression that this Bill had been t in without the opinion of Indian ties being taken. All he said the ight was that he had no official pondence on the subject to lay on ble. Indian information was not necessarily confined to India, for there were Peers in that House who knew as much of the circumstances, and particu- larly of the law involved in the case, as any one could know. With respect to the main portion of the Bill—that which related to the slave trade generally—he saw a noble Lord opposite who could tell them more than any one in India. The Government had had recourse to the best authorities as to what would be the most suitable provisions.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX asked what Act the noble Marquess referred to? When he passed the India Council Act, there was the fullest previous consultation with the authorities in India.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he referred to the Act of 1858.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX said, that was not in his time. He was sorry to see every obstacle thrown in the way of such mutual consultation. Surely those on the spot might be expected to know more about the subject than the Home Government, or the Law Officers of the Crown.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the Bill took the law of India as it stood, and was, in fact, intended to remedy an oversight in a former Act.

EARL GRANVILLE said, if it were a mere explanatory Act no more need be said; but the explanation now placed upon it by the noble and learned Lord was very different from that given by the noble Marquess in introducing it; but his noble Friend (the Earl of North- brook) had pointed out the desirability that not only this Bill, but some others should, as there was no necessity for immediate legislation, be deferred until the House had further information.

After a few words from Lord LAW- RENCE in favour of delay,

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY re- plied that, of course, if Parliament wished for further information, the Bill could be postponed, but delay would be exceedingly inconvenient, and put off a measure which was much wanted. At the present moment there might arise cases which the Courts, for want of such a Bill, would have to decide the wrong way.

Amendment (by leave of the Com- mittee) withdrawn.

Bill reported, without Amendment; and to be read 3^d To-morrow.

THE YEOMANRY.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT NEWPORT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is any truth in the statement, which has appeared in some of the newspapers, that any Yeomanry regiment has declined to obey orders and attend the forthcoming manoeuvres?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, I have been informed on inquiry that no such circumstance is known to the War Office.

QUESTION.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether the Law does not require that certain formalities in connection with convening Courts of Quarter Sessions should be verified by the signature of the clerk of the peace; and, whether he will take such steps as may be necessary to ensure the appointment of clerks of the peace in those countries where there are vacancies at present?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET), in reply, said, the office of Clerk of the Peace for the county of Carlow had been for some time vacant, and the Custos rotularum had deferred appointing to it, quite rightly he thought, having regard to the Clerk of the Peace and Crown Bill now before Parliament; but there were certain duties connected with the Civil Bill Courts which ought to be performed by the Clerk of the Peace, and the Government had represented to the Custos the propriety of filling the office without further delay.

QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SPINKS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Roumanian Government have notified to Her Majesty's Government (either directly to the Foreign Office or through Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople) their intention of raising their import Duties on English goods to a very considerable extent, such increase to take effect on the 13th of July proximo; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government have taken or will take any steps in the matter for the protection of British Commerce?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, the Government of the United Principalities of Moldo-Wallachia have notified their intention of establishing a new tariff, which it is proposed to bring into force this month. We have communicated with various Chambers of Commerce in this country upon the subject, and are also in communication with the French and other Governments as to the course to be adopted for the protection of the interests of British subjects and those of other nations affected by the new tariff.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS—RETURNS.—QUESTION.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board

orks, When the Returns, ordered on the 22nd of March 1875, of Expenditure for five years, and of the Parliamentary Expenses of the Board will be printed?

JAMES HOGG: In reply to the question of my hon. Friend, I have to say that the Return has entailed an enormous amount of labour on the office of the Board, but is now, I am informed, completed so far as the great majority of the Bills are concerned, and I hope that it may be presented to the House within about a fortnight.

FINAL LAW—CASE OF JAMES TIMONY.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether attention has been called to a statement in a newspaper of the 28th inst. of the trial of James Timony, a youth seventeen, before the Recorder of Liverpool and a jury on the 23rd May, and whether it be true that the constable was the witness, and swore that the boy had voluntarily to him and said “this bar of iron belongs to James Conolly of South Street, and I have stolen it because I have had a row at home and I want to go to prison;” that the jury returned a verdict of larceny but recommended the youth to mercy, and that upon the Recorder pronounced sentence of seven years’ penal servitude and three years’ police supervision; and whether the statement is substantially correct, and whether he will take the steps necessary to set aside the sentence?

MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I hope the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Anderson) will excuse me if I answer his Question, as it falls more in my province than that of my right hon. Friend. My attention has been drawn by the Question of the hon. Member to an article in The London Standard on this subject. That is a serious periodical published in London, which, I think, can hardly be expected to give the most accurate statement of matters in Ireland. The statements contained in that article of the facts of the case are both inaccurate and incomplete. His age is 19, not 17; he did not come voluntarily to the constable, but the constable stopped him, and put him with the bar of iron, and threatened him. The constable was not the only witness; the prisoner was indicted for the larceny as well as for previous convictions, and the jury who found him guilty of the larceny recommended him to mercy in ignorance of his previous convictions. Though so young he had been convicted no less than seven times before, and it appears from the report of the Governor of the Antrim Gaol that among these convictions was one for attempted housebreaking and another for uttering base coin. I may add—though, of course, it does not directly bear on the Recorder’s sentence—that Timony’s conduct in gaol is reported as very bad; and that as to his family, his brother is a convict now undergoing sentence, and his sister often in gaol, being there at the present moment. I do not think it is a case which requires the interference of the Government.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE—LORDS LIEUTENANT.—QUESTION.

COLONEL NAGHTEN asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether it is a constitutional proceeding on the part of a Lord Lieutenant to canvass the Electors in the interests of one of the Candidates at an Election for the county of which he is Lord Lieutenant; and, whether such conduct is not an infringement of the privileges of this House?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, there is a Resolution of the House which relates to the Question of the hon. and gallant Member. I will read that part of it which bears on this matter. It runs thus—

“That it is a high infringement of the liberties and privileges of the Commons of the United Kingdom for (inter alios) any Lord Lieutenant or Governor of any county to avail himself of any authority derived from his commission to influence the election of any member to serve for the Commons in Parliament.”

If, therefore, a Lord Lieutenant avails himself of the authority derived from his commission to influence an election, he is guilty of an unconstitutional act and a breach of Privilege of the House of Commons. I cannot say, however, a Lord Lieutenant, by merely canvassing at an election, would be doing that which is unconstitutional or be infringing the Privileges of the House, for I must remind the hon. and gallant Member that there are several Lords

Lieutenant who are Members of the House. They have doubtless canvassed at their own elections, but I have never heard that it was considered that by doing so they had committed a breach of Privilege.

HYDE PARK—THE SERPENTINE—BATHING.—QUESTION.

MR. SOTHERON-ESTCOURT asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he is aware that great annoyance and danger is caused to riders in Rotten Row by the disorderly conduct of persons on their way to the bathing place in the Serpentine; and, whether he will be good enough to take measures, by increasing the number of police on duty there, or otherwise, to put a stop to it?

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in reply, said, that until his hon. Friend had put down his Question his attention had not this year been called to the great annoyance and danger referred to. He would, however, lose no time in calling the attention of the police to the subject, with a view to prevent the recurrence of these outrages. He might, however, perhaps, remind the House that, with a view to abate that and similar nuisances, he had caused those mounds to be raised and planted with shrubs which had been so severely criticized in the early part of the Session.

THE SCHOONER "LEADER."
QUESTION.

MR. MAC IVER asked the President of the Board of Trade, If it is true that, at the instance of the Board of Trade, Mr. Septimus Howell, managing owner of the schooner "Leader," has been twice taken into custody under a warrant, with the results that the first case was dismissed by the magistrates at Runcorn, and that in the second case Mr. Howell was prosecuted for misdemeanour before Mr. Justice Brett at the last Liverpool Assizes and acquitted; and, whether the Board of Trade intend to compensate Mr. Howell for the loss and injury to his business, and the expenses to which he has been put by these prosecutions, and if it is also intended to make Mr. Howell any allowance in respect of the ignominy to which he has been subjected?

The Attorney General

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: The case of the Leader I have already laid before the House as signally illustrating the carefulness with which the law since 1871 has made it a misdemeanor to send an unsafe ship to sea, and the great advantage given to the owner in the way of opportunity, to exculpate himself. An official inquiry reported the Leader to be totally rotten, and that the owner must have known it. On this report the Board of Trade prosecuted, a warrant being legally necessary in such a case. The magistrate would not commit for trial, but refused costs, giving the defendant the benefit of some confiction of evidence. Mr. Howell continued to sail the ship, and on her arrival at Plymouth she was again reported to the Board of Trade, who thereupon ordered a survey. The surveyor reported that she was in a dangerous condition, and it became the duty of the Board of Trade to prosecute Mr. Howell a second time. Brought up on a warrant, as was legally necessary in such a case, before the magistrates of Liverpool, he was committed for trial at the Assizes, the magistrate saying that a prima facie case was made out against him, and that it was important. The defendant's own witness said that it would be difficult to exaggerate the rottenness of the Leader's timbers; but, availing himself of the statutory permission, the defendant obtained an acquittal, the Judge (Mr. Justice Brett) having put it to the jury to consider whether he had not used reasonable means for safety. The proceedings having been regularly and reasonably instituted, and the result most fortunate for the owner, there seem no grounds whatever for giving him compensation. Mr. Howell has himself admitted the absolute unseaworthiness of his ship, and has since sold her for an old hulk.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN LESLIE asked the First Commissioner of Works, considering that disappointment has been felt in consequence of the closing of the National Gallery during the months of May and June, Whether he can explain the following extracts from a letter in "The Times" by the Director of the l Gallery, to excuse the delay in

CAWLEY asked the First Comer of Works, Whether he has d any statistics showing the number of vehicles passing along Piccadilly

eastwards and westwards at Hyde Park Corner ; the number passing to and from Grosvenor Place ; the number passing to and from Hyde Park from Piccadilly and from Grosvenor Place during particular hours of the day ; and, if he has, whether he will lay such information upon the Table of the House, prior to the discussion on the plan to be proposed for relieving the blocks to the traffic which now occur ?

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in reply, said, he had not in the Office any formal statistics such as those alluded to in the Question, but he had been in communication with the Commissioners of Police, who had agreed to furnish them. He could promise his hon. Friend that they should be in the hands of Members before the Vote for the new road across the Green Park came on for discussion.

THE BRITISH MUSEUM—SALARIES.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether considering the Second Report of the Civil Service Inquiry Commission, Her Majesty's Government propose to increase the salaries of the Heads of Departments in the British Museum ; and, whether they have received any recommendation from the trustees in regard thereto ; and, if so, whether any and what answer has been returned by the Treasury ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHE-QUER : Sir, the Treasury have received a request from the Trustees of the British Museum to inquire into the position of the officers of that Department, with a view to a revision both of their salaries and of their duties. All I can say on the subject at present is that the recommendations will be considered, and that we hope to be able to make a satisfactory explanation before the next Estimates are prepared.

INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT— THE TREASURY MINUTE.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHE-QUER : I wish to take this opportunity of referring to something which passed last week on a Question put to me by the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr.

be the reason of a mistake made in a hasty speech."

To this letter I received the following reply:—

"Whitehall, June 28, 1876.

"Sir,—I am in the receipt of your letter of yesterday's date, and in reply beg leave to say that, prior to the discussion which ended in the rejection on second reading of the Metropolitan Railway Bill, I did receive a circular in which your name appeared, asking me to attend the House and vote in favour of the second reading of the Bill.

"This is what I said, and it is probable that you had not in your mind yesterday this circular, and that may be the reason of a mistake made in a hasty speech.

"I am, yours faithfully,

"ROBERT PEEL.

"Sir E. W. Watkin, M.P."

I pass over the impertinence — ["Order!"]—contained in this repetition of my own words in the closing sentence of the letter. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER said, such an expression as had been used by the hon. Member could not be allowed in this House.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN: No one could be more ready than I to withdraw any expression to which you, Sir, should object; but when a Gentleman writes to another, repeating the last sentence of his letter, I think it can hardly be considered courteous. ["Withdraw!"] Of course, I withdraw anything I may have said that may not be in Order, and apologize. With regard to the right hon. Gentleman's charge that I had solicited his vote, I at once sent a copy of his note to the Parliamentary solicitor for the Bill, who wrote in reply that neither by himself nor by the Parliamentary agents had my name been used in any circular in reference to the second reading of this Bill. Such a circular was issued, but it was a dry statement of facts, containing no solicitation to Members, and certainly not using the name of any Member. I was further assured that that was the only statement issued; and under those circumstances I am entitled to say that the charges of the right hon. Baronet are without foundation, and to hope that, even now, late as it is, the right hon. Baronet will retract them. I beg now to ask the right hon. Baronet, Whether he is prepared to substantiate or to withdraw the statement made by him during the discussion on the second reading of a Private Bill on Tuesday last, in reference to an alleged issue, by or in the name of a Member of this House, interested in the question involved, of a circular soliciting the right hon. Baronet's vote?

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I hope I shall be able to reply to the Question which has been proposed to me, and to the satisfaction of the House, which is all that I desire. The hon. Member has spoken of me in very harsh terms, and in language not quite Parliamentary or proper for one hon. Gentleman to address to another. I shall endeavour to reply to him in perfect good humour; but I must say that in the charge he has made it seems to me that he intends to convey to the House that I have said something that is not true, or that I have said something that is not founded on fact and which I cannot substantiate. Now, the House is aware, and I am aware, that this is not the first time that the hon. Member for Hythe has launched his accusations without any ground for them. ["Oh!" and "Order!"] I recollect that four or five years ago—["Order, order!"]—

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Baronet has been asked to answer a Question referring to a debate in which he made some observations reflecting on the personal character and conduct of the hon. Member for Hythe, and in answering that Question it will be desirable, according to the practice of the House, that the right hon. Baronet should confine himself to that matter.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: By your ruling, Sir, I will confine myself to that matter; but I would ask permission of the House to say that this is not the first time—["Order!"]—I recollect some years ago—["Order, order!"] This is to the point, and I am determined to say it. [Laughter, and renewed cries of "Order!"] The hon. Member accuses me of having said that which is not true, and I say this is not the first time—["Order, order!"] When Mr. Chichester Fortescue was at the Board of Trade, the hon. Member for Hythe accused me—["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: After what I have said, I trust that the right hon. Gentleman will not travel beyond the limits of Parliamentary practice in the observations which he wishes to address to the House.

Sir Edward Watkin

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Of course, Sir, I bow to your decision, and will not refer to the matter again; but I may say this, that it is not the first time—[Laughter.] I myself consider, as the hon. Member for Hythe has said, that this is really not a question which ought to occupy the time and attention of the House, inasmuch as I am sure that every one who heard me the other afternoon knows perfectly well what I meant, what I intended to convey, and, not only that, but what I actually did say on that occasion. The House will give me the opportunity of illustrating the remarks I have made in further replying to the challenge of the hon. Member for Hythe. He says I made three statements. I say I did nothing of the kind. I stand by the recorded statement in the newspapers, and I am in the hands of hon. Members on both sides who heard my statement, and I propose to substantiate what I then said. Now, everyone who is conversant with the proceedings of the House of Commons—and for nearly 30 years I have had a knowledge of the proceedings of this House—any one conversant with those proceedings knows, and I appeal with confidence to experienced Members, and even to you yourself, Sir, and to the Clerk at the Table, when I say that it has been the invariable practice upon Opposed Private Bills, as well as upon many Public Bills, for solicitations to be sent round. Whether the practice is a good one or not I do not say; but such notices have invariably been sent round, asking hon. Members to vote for or against particular measures; and it is perfectly obvious, therefore, that no one would take the trouble to send round a circular in support of or in opposition to any Opposed Private Bill, if it were not at the instance of those who are directly or immediately interested. There are, no doubt, many hon. Members now in the House who were not pressed on the occasion in question, and I must therefore refer to what did take place on that occasion. This is not a mere personal matter, but one of considerable importance as affecting the position of Members of this House. There was a Private Bill discussion on last Tuesday. I knew nothing about the matter, excepting what I read in the statements submitted to me from both parties, from each of whom I received a solicitation for my support. I came down here and said what I did. From what I had heard and read, I came to the conclusion, and many thought with me, that there was a “job” connected with the matter, and it is well, Sir, that in these days such things should be exposed. What I said was, that there was a Mercantile and Credit Company (Limited) in London which proposed to go to the North of Ireland and construct six railways there. We knew from “another place”—the House of Lords—that there were nine railways already bankrupt in that part of the country, and the hon. Baronet (Sir Thomas Bateson), who moved the rejection of the Bill, said it was not necessary for the interests of the district. One of the Imperial directors said that it was, and so did another hon. Member, and finally the hon. Member for Hythe. The hon. Member for Hythe said the statement of the hon. Baronet was one from which he dissented, but he especially complained that he had asked 160 Gentlemen to come down to that House to support his views, and he added that he hoped it would be the last time he should hear of an attempt to commit a private injustice through political influence; and then he spoke of maintaining the dignity of the House. Now, I was in the House of Commons in 1862, before the hon. Member for Hythe was in it, and when he was only plain Mr. Watkin, and I know some of the antecedents of the hon. Member. I followed the hon. Member for Hythe, and I said that his virtuous indignation was misapplied, because it was not an unusual proceeding to send out these invitations, and that in his (Sir Edward Watkin’s) case, as regards the Metropolitan Extension Bill, I had received a solicitation to vote. I did not say his name was attached. [“Oh, oh!”] I said I had received a solicitation—[A VOICE: A circular?] Yes, a circular. [A VOICE: And from him?] I deny it. [“Oh, oh!”] I never said I received it from him. I said that I did not receive it directly from the hon. Member. [“Oh, oh!”] I could not say from whom I received it; but I mentioned, and I still maintain, that I did receive a solicitation for my vote in favour of the Bill. The hon. Member says he never in any case sent out a notice with reference to any Bill in which he was engaged. Now, I hold in my hand a ther the Province of British Columbia did not, in obedience thereto, comply with the said order to the satisfaction of the Dominion Government; and whether the land so placed at the disposal of the Dominion has not remained so up to the present time; whether the Dominion Government did not in 1875 cause surveys to be made of a considerable portion of the Esquimault Nanaimo section of the Railway, and, having purchased in England a quantity of steel rails, cause them to be shipped for and delivered in Vancouver's Island for the purposes of that section of the Railway; whether the Dominion Government have not lately publicly announced that they have abandoned their intention of making the Esquimault Nanaimo portion of the Railway; whether any intimation has been received by Her Majesty's Government from the Legislature or Government of British Columbia expressing a desire to secede from the Dominion of Canada; and what reply, if any, has been given thereto; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the Table of the House any Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the Dominion of Canada and the Government of British Columbia since 1st January 1875 on this subject?

MR. J. LOWTHER: I am afraid, Sir, it would be quite impossible within the ordinary limits of an Answer to a Question to afford an adequate explanation to the House of the circumstances of this case, which are attended with considerable difficulty, while a simple answer to the hon. Gentleman's series of Questions would give an altogether incorrect impression of the matter. I will therefore confine myself to stating that it has been arranged that Lord Dufferin shall shortly visit the Province, and until the result of his visit is known, it would be very inexpedient to enter into any discussion of the points raised in these Questions. There is, however, one of the hon. Gentleman's Questions—the fifth, I think, it is in the category—to which it is advisable that I should at once give a direct reply—namely, the Question—“Whether any intimation has been received by Her Majesty's Government from the Legislature or Government of British Columbia expressing a desire to secede from the Dominion of Canada; and what reply, if any, has been given thereto?”

Mr. Alderman M'Arthur

I am happy to say that no such intimation has ever been received by Her Majesty's Government.

PUBLIC WORKS LOAN COMMISSIONERS—ROAD TRUSTS (SCOTLAND).

QUESTION.

MR. ELLICE said, he had a Question to put which he had given Notice for last week, but circumstances had then induced him to postpone it. His right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had consented to answer it on the present occasion. He must be allowed to say, in explanation of the Question, that an Act of Parliament had been passed last year similar to another Act previously passed for England, authorizing the Public Works Loan Commissioners to grant loans in Scotland for sanitary purposes at a reduced rate of interest. In order to put Scotland in point of time on a perfect equality with England, the Act gave a retrospective power. It permitted a reduced rate of interest on loans granted subsequently to the passing of the English Act. Applications in consequence were made to the Public Works Loan Commissioners, and the Question he now wished to put was with reference to the statement by the Public Works Loan Commissioners, in reply to applications, that it is not their practice, without the consent of the Treasury, to vary the terms upon which their loans have been advanced; and, Whether it is the intention of the Treasury to consider applications with the view of authorizing the Public Works Loan Commissioners, if they see fit, to exercise the powers so conferred upon them by the Act of Parliament?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he doubted whether the hon. Gentleman was quite aware of the peculiarities of the position in consequence of the passing of the Act last Session to take away from the Treasury, as far as they could, the power they previously had of reducing by their own authority the terms on which loans might be made by the Public Works Loan Commissioners. They desired to divest the Treasury of that power, and he believed they had done so. The answer of the Public Works Loan Commissioners referred to the practice under the previously existing state of things up to April last; but the Treasury was in communication with the Public Works Loan Commissioners on the subject of advances to Scotland, and he hoped they would arrive at a satisfactory conclusion.

—REPORTED OUTBREAK OF HOSTILITIES.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON : With the permission of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, I wish to ask him, Whether the Government have received any intelligence respecting the reported outbreak of hostilities between Turkey and Servia, the Herzegovina and Montenegro; and, if the report be well founded, whether he does not think the time has arrived when the Papers relating to the recent negotiations on this subject may be presented to the House?

MR. DISRAELI : Mr. Speaker, Sir, Her Majesty's Government received intelligence yesterday, late in the afternoon, from the Queen's Ambassador at Constantinople, that the Servians had crossed the frontier with 30 guns; and about the same time they received news from Her Majesty's Consul at Ragusa, that he had heard that the Prince of Montenegro had declared war and left Cettigne, and placed himself at the head of his troops. But we have not received to-day any direct information from what I am afraid may be called the seat of war. That is the last and most authentic news in our possession. With regard to the Question of the noble Lord respecting Papers, unquestionably it must be felt by, and certainly it is felt by, Her Majesty's Government, that, the negotiations between the Porte and its subjects and vassals having terminated, the time has arrived when the Papers should be presented to the House; and every effort will be made to place them on the Table as soon as possible. At the same time, the House will kindly remember that the Papers are voluminous, and there are some among them which cannot be printed without consulting Foreign Powers.

TURKEY—THE EASTERN QUESTION.
OBSERVATIONS.

MR. E. JENKINS : I beg, Sir, to give Notice of a Question which I intend to bring on to-morrow at any time of the day or night that I may obtain an opportunity of doing so. As the matter is one of transcendent importance, and as the Leaders of this House have not thought proper to take any immediate action in regard to it, I ask the indulgence of the House while I make a brief statement, and to put myself in Order I will move the Adjournment of the House.

MR. SPEAKER intimated that the hon. Member could not enter upon any debate upon giving Notice of a Question.

MR. E. JENKINS : I shall conclude with a Motion.

MR. J. R. YORKE rose to Order and submitted that the hon. Member could not make a speech upon giving Notice of a Motion.

MR. SPEAKER : I must hear what the hon. Member has to say before I can decide whether he is out of Order or not.

MR. E. JENKINS : The news that has been received in this country within the last few hours has created everywhere the greatest anxiety, and I believe I am not incorrect in stating that the anxiety in the country outside is very great indeed as to the course likely to be pursued by Her Majesty's Government with relation to the affairs of Turkey. I also believe I express the feeling of hon. Members on both sides of the House when I say that whatever our opinions may be as to the policy pursued by Her Majesty's Government, we feel that matters are so serious, and have arrived at such a crisis, that we are entitled to ask the Government for some further and more real explanation than has been promised to us this afternoon. I have carefully followed the course of affairs, and up to this present moment, so far as I am able to judge from the information that has been received by the papers, I am prepared to say that I think that the Government have pursued a course that I could support. [Murmurs.] That, perhaps, is the greater reason why I shall now be allowed to say—

MR. CALLAN rose to Order. He wished to know whether it was not an evasion of the Rules of the House to get up a discussion upon such an important question, and make a statement without Notice?

MR. SPEAKER : The hon. Member says that he intends to conclude with a Motion, and I cannot say that he is out of Order, though the course which he proposes to pursue, no doubt, is highly inconvenient. The hon. Member stated that he proposes to give Notice of a Question for to-morrow, as I understood, and he cannot at the same time do that, and move the Adjournment of the House.

MR. E. JENKINS: I propose, Sir, to follow the course that you have indicated and to keep strictly within the rules of Order, but I appeal to the House, for I believe it will, upon consideration of the facts, come to the conclusion that we are at this moment placed in one of the most tremendous crises that has occurred in Europe during this century. Is it improper then for an independent Member to ask leave, in such circumstances, to make a brief statement? I think I shall be able at the proper time to show that the grounds on which I am acting are not altogether insufficient, but the only thing to which I wish to allude at this moment is this. The correspondence that has been sent to the public Press this morning contains a statement of the utmost importance. The news comes from Vienna—

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY: I rise to Order. The hon. Member commenced by giving a Notice of Motion which he has not yet withdrawn, and I appeal to you, Sir, whether he is entitled to raise a discussion of this kind in this irregular way.

MR. E. JENKINS: I am sure the noble Lord is aware I am pursuing a course that is strictly in Order. I am not now going to give Notice of my Question. ["Move now!"] I have stated that I will conclude with a Motion, and I would not ask the House to listen to me if I did not feel that I was acting under a deep sense of responsibility. It is stated in the public Press this morning that Her Majesty's Government were at this moment in direct negotiations with Russia with reference to the action to be taken with regard to the affairs of Turkey; and that two alternative propositions had been submitted. It is stated that—

"Already last year Russia favoured the idea of giving an autonomy to these Provinces similar to that enjoyed by Servia and Roumania, and in the negotiations which have been going on of late with England this idea which had been abandoned has been revived by Russia. There seems to be no objection to the idea of such autonomy on the part of the British Government. On the contrary, it was accepted conditionally as an eventful mode of solution. As before, so now, the view of the British Government is that the Turks ought to be allowed time and full freedom to carry out the pacification, if need be, by armed force, and only, if they should not succeed in mastering the insurrection with all its possible ramifications, then the Powers should step in and propose an arrangement on the basis of giving autonomy to these Provinces."

The course Her Majesty's Government appeared to favour was that the Turks ought to be allowed to carry out their policy, if need be, by armed force. Now, I wish to draw the attention of the House to the fact that whereas we have from Her Majesty's Government no authoritative statement of the course which they are pursuing at this moment, it appears to be known in Vienna and is authoritatively stated in the Press of this country. I therefore feel justified in calling attention to the fact and in asking Her Majesty's Government if they are prepared to give us fuller and further information. With the permission of the House I will withdraw the Motion for Adjournment.

MR. SPEAKER: I informed the hon. Member that he was quite irregular in what he was doing unless he concluded with a Motion, and he said he would do so, but now he informs the House that he does not propose to make that Motion. ["Move!"]

MR. E. JENKINS: If in consequence of my unacquaintance with the Rules of the House I have inadvertently, in my desire to save time, committed an error, I hope that both sides of the House will forgive me. ["Move, move!"] I move that this House do now adjourn.

MR. BIGGAR seconded the Motion.

(Mr. Edward Jenkins.)

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, in answer to the noble Lord opposite (the Marquess of Hartington) I promised the House cheerfully, on the part of the Government, that the proper time having now arrived—namely, the conclusion of these negotiations, which both sides of the House agreed it was but fair that the Sultan should have a fair chance of carrying out—the Government would lay the Papers upon the Table of the House, and they are now prepared to do so with the utmost promptitude possible. When these Papers are laid before the House and read dispassionately, I have no doubt the House will come to a wise conclusion upon them; but, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, and for the general interests of the country, I must express a hope that the opinion of the House will be formed upon the authentic documents which, upon the responsibility of the Government, are placed upon the Table of the House and submitted to the consideration of hon. Members, and not upon anonymous articles in the papers from the pens of "Our own Correspondents," who are now sprinkled over all the capitals of Europe. I could not collect, on account of the murmur in the House, exactly what the statement was which the hon. Member read, but I heard some opinions imputed to the Government as their matured policy, and I heard them for the first time. Part of what I did hear appeared to be too ridiculous for belief, though it may have been founded on the gossip which is always circulating wherever diplomatic proceedings are being carried on. I put it to the House that there is no wish on the part of the Government to conceal anything from the House, except what they believe it is for the public interest that reserve should be maintained. We have arrived at a period in these transactions when, with scarcely an exception, we can place before the House the Papers that have been exchanged between the different Courts. Having before it the authentic documents, for which the Government is responsible, the House will be in a position to form an opinion, and all I ask the House is that they will form their opinions from such documents offered on such responsibility, and not from anonymous articles in the newspapers.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT said, he thought hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House were inclined to deal hardly with the hon. Member for Dundee. They had heard from the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) that he had been in the House 30 years; but he (Mr. Bright) had been a Member for even a longer time, and he remembered scores of instances in which, on some emergency, hon. Members on both sides had moved the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of bringing forward a specific question. If ever there was a case in which it might be excused, or, at least, justified, it was the occasion which now presented itself. He was not going to blame the right hon. Gentleman or his Colleagues for not having stated all that had transpired between the Powers with reference to this great question; but he thought that when, as somebody said the other night, the Session was nearly at its close—that in about a month from that time those benches would be very thinly occupied—that these Papers, which were said to be very voluminous, would not be laid upon the Table of the House for a week, or probably a fortnight—that then there would be very little time left to discuss them. He should have been very glad if the right hon. Gentleman had communicated something himself to the House. He knew all about it. He knew how great must be the anxiety in the country with regard to it, and he could, in a quarter of an hour or less, tell the House and the country probably everything they wished to know. For instance, he could tell them how it was that, having agreed to the Andrassy Note, the Government thought it necessary not to agree to the Berlin Note. He made no charge against the Government, neither did he blame them; it might be they had done right; he hoped it would prove to be so. Still, it would have been a satisfaction to the House and the country to know what there was in the Berlin Note that was so far from the Andrassy Note that the Government were able to consent to the one and were not able to concur in the other. It would, moreover, have been a satisfaction to have known, as the Government were not willing to agree with the other Powers in the Berlin Note, that they had some other—it might be some wise and better—policy which they offered to the Powers in substitution for that with which they could not agree. He was sure the House and the country would be very glad to know this, and nobody would be more glad than he to know that the Government behaved with such wisdom as one hoped from them in so grave a crisis. Every hon. Member on both sides was anxious that the Government should do that on that great question which was consistent with the honour of the country and the desire for peace; but when we looked back at what occurred in 1854, when the Government, according to one of its chief officers, drifted gradually and—he was afraid to use the word which rose to his lips—discreditably into a sanguinary struggle, we could not help but have our fears, and he at any rate felt, as one of the great Council of the nation, that they had a right to be taken into consultation and to consider the matter. They had a right also to have an opinion, and to express it, before the country was irrevocably committed to a policy which they might find it necessary to condemn. As to that, he would only say that if the policy of the Government was that of maintaining the integrity of the Ottoman Empire at the sacrifice of British treasure and British blood, he believed, after the experience of 20 years ago, that no considerable portion of the people of the United Kingdom would be found to support the Government in that policy. Further, if the policy of the Government were to give its countenance, even its moral support, to the Turk, in opposition to the struggles and efforts that were being made by some of the subjects of the Porte to free themselves from its dominion, the people of this country would not support the Government. So far as they were neutral in the struggle, so far as they agreed to leave to itself that great contest, which was inevitable, and must be determined by the forces on the spot, then, he thought, in all probability the great bulk of public opinion in this country would support them. He did not wish to enter into any discussion of the subject, nor to offer any policy of his own, except so far as he had expressed his opinion; but he besought the Government not to pursue a policy that might lead them into all kinds of complexity, such as the Government of 1854 waded into, and then find there was no way out but by a war, which, in his opinion, was unjust in its beginning, disastrous in its course, and ignominious in its conclusion.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he thought that, under the present circumstances, it would be most disastrous if a discussion on the subject were to take place before the House had had an opportunity of reading the Correspondence which had taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Powers. The present position with regard to the East was in strict analogy with what occurred in 1853. Then discussions took place on the mere ex parte statements of Ministers, and which did not give correct views of the situation. At the end of that Session, a few minutes before the Prorogation, a Question was put by Mr. Monckton Milnes to Lord Palmerston, who expressed his opinion that things would end peaceably, and on that account Papers were not laid upon the Table. It would be dangerous if a similar course were adopted on the present occasion. There was some similarity between the circumstances then and the present crisis. The Crimean War began on the question of Montenegro; the present complications begun on the question of Servia. The British Fleet was then in Besika Bay; the British Fleet was now in Besika Bay. Instead of the Russians having crossed the Pruth, the Servians had crossed the Drina. He believed the majority of the people of this country, considering that the Government had won a diplomatic triumph, fully ratified the course taken by them. [Hon. MEMBERS: What course?] The Government had sent the fleet to Besika Bay. [Laughter.] Hon. Members laughed; but they did not recollect the circumstances that preceded the Crimean War, or they must know that it was now admitted by all Russian diplomatists that if the Fleet had been sent to Besika Bay when Colonel Rose sent for it, the Crimean War would not have taken place. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would not be hurried into a premature discussion on this subject, but that he would produce the Papers as early as possible.

MR. FAWCETT said, the hon. Member who had just sat down was somewhat inconsistent. He deprecated discussion, and then expressed his opinion that the majority of the House would approve the policy of the Government. Now what they wanted to know was, what was the policy of the Government? At present they did not know what it was, and the impression was beginning to spread on these benches, and through them it would be communicated to the country, that the time had come when they ought to know something more of the policy of the Government at that great juncture than they did at that moment. No doubt, as the Prime Minister had said, it would be far better that the discussion should be taken when they had the Papers before them, and he was not going to say a syllable about the policy of the Government; but he wished to point out that the question was not simply whether they should have a discussion when the Papers were laid upon the Table, but whether they had any guarantee whatever that the country would not have glided into grave complications before the Papers were laid before the House, and before the House could express its opinions on the policy of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman had used some expressions which would cause uneasiness throughout the country to-morrow. He had said that "the Papers were very voluminous, but before he laid them on the Table foreign Powers must be consulted." Before this Government had embarked upon a grave policy of which the country might disapprove, something more must be done besides consulting foreign Powers. The House of Commons must be consulted; and he thought the right hon. Gentleman should give the House and the country an assurance that voluminous as these Papers were, and whether foreign Powers did or did not place obstacles in the way of their production, before the week had elapsed there would be no further delay, and an opportunity would be given the House of expressing its opinion on the subject. He believed it was the wish of the people of this country that no more English blood should be spilt and English treasure spent in maintaining the integrity of an Empire which he believed could not be permanently maintained, and that England ought not to be compromised by pursuing a policy which he believed would bring upon her disgrace and trouble, and her power ought not to be used against those who were trying to emancipate themselves from a galling and an unendurable thralldom.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, he wished to draw a contrast between the conduct they had seen that evening and the course which was pursued by the present Government when they were in Opposition a few years ago. The right hon. Gentlemen opposite were then conducting negotiations with America which led to the Washington Treaty—negotiations viewed with the greatest distrust and dislike by hon. Members on his side of the House. Yet throughout the whole time that those negotiations were going on, the greatest influence was used, and used successfully, to maintain silence on the question until the Government of the day carried their policy to a completion. What had they seen that evening? The Government, no doubt, conducting negotiations of the greatest difficulty and delicacy; and yet the hon. Member for Dundee committed a breach of the Rules of the House by moving its Adjournment after giving a definite Notice of what they were to be asked to discuss.

MR. E. JENKINS rose to order. He had carefully abstained from giving the Notice.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, the hon. Member began by giving Notice. The Government was carrying on delicate negotiations. ["No, no!"] Anyhow, he only wished to draw attention to the contrast between the conduct of the two Oppositions, for now, when the hon. Member took the course he had adopted that evening, he was backed up by a right hon. Gentleman on the front bench. The Government had recently gained a diplomatic triumph, and it had secured for this country a feeling abroad to which it had been a stranger for 40 years, that they had a Ministry who were capable of upholding the dignity and honour of the nation.

DR. KENEALY thought the discussion was very inconvenient. It was brought before the House without Notice and without the sanction of the Leaders of the Opposition, who seemed to be Leaders without united followers. He sympathized with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) in the hope that the Government would not lead the country into a Russian war as the Whig Government did in 1854. The country was not prepared to repeat the folly committed on that occasion. He knew a little about the East. He had no sympathy with what was called the religious question in the East. He believed the Christians of the East were about the worst specimens of humanity extant. He had, however, great sympathy with the feelings of the people of this country, and he believed their feelings were that such an anachronism as the Turkish Power in Europe ought not any longer to be supported by British blood and treasure. Turkey must fall, let the right hon. Gentleman opposite do what he pleased. It might be supposed that Ministers were able to read the signs of the times, and the right hon. Gentleman must see that it was impossible to maintain Turkey in Europe. He agreed with the right hon. Member for Birmingham that the discussion of this question should not be postponed till the end of the Session, and he hoped an early opportunity would be afforded the House of considering it. At the same time, he was sorry to hear what the Prime Minister had said upon the question, for it was new to him, and he believed new to the country, that a Minister of England would not lay upon the Table of the House of Commons diplomatic documents of the greatest importance without first asking the sanction of foreign Powers. That was not an English or a great policy, though it might be a convenient policy, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would lay the Papers on the Table regardless of what other Powers might think, consulting only the honour and interest of England in the matter.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I only rise, Sir, to say a few words, and I do not propose to detain the House more than a minute or two. There is undoubtedly considerable inconvenience in a discussion of this sort, brought forward without Notice and without materials on which a judgment can be formed. I wish, therefore, to express a hope—of course it would be presumptuous to express more than a hope—that the debate may not be carried very much further. But, Sir, although there is some inconvenience in the course that has been taken, it may not have been taken altogether without advantage. I do not suppose that the Government have ever at any time been under the delusion that the country was not watching the course of events in the East with the utmost anxiety, or that they were prepared to accept with a blind confidence the policy of the Government until they had larger opportunities than they have had of forming an opinion of what that policy has been. But this short discussion, even if it proceeds no further than it has hitherto done, will have removed all possible misconception on these points, and will have shown—will have convinced the Government that there is a strong feeling in this House—but not stronger, I am sure, than that which it represents out-of-doors—a strong feeling of the deepest anxiety on this subject and the utmost eagerness to have an opportunity, as soon as possible, of knowing what that policy has been. Without incurring the strictures of the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Cumberland, which, I think, have been hardly deserved, I may appeal to Members of the Government themselves whether they have suffered the slightest embarrassment in these negotiations from hon. Members sitting on this side of the House. It may be true—I do not know whether it is strictly true—that during the course of the American negotiations no formal discussion was ever initiated on the Opposition Benches; but my recollection deceives me very much if the Government of that day was not put repeatedly and very minutely to the question upon points arising in the course of those negotiations. And I believe that this is the first occasion since the opening of Parliament on which any discussion has arisen upon these recent negotiations. It appears to me unreasonable and impossible to expect—to require from the Government any statement of their present policy which they are not disposed at this moment to volunteer to give to the House. Undoubtedly, if the Government thought it would be conducive to the public service, and if they had any information to give to the House as to the course they are at this moment pursuing, that information would be received with the utmost pleasure and satisfaction. It is, however, quite impossible for us who sit on this side of the House to ask the Government to tell us what is the policy they are now pursuing, while we are in ignorance as to the policy which they have been pursuing. All we are entitled to require from them—and on that point I think they do not require any pressure—is to urge on them that these Papers should be presented with the least possible delay, and that the House should be allowed an opportunity as soon as possible of expressing its opinion on the subject.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I must claim the indulgence of the House to explain an expression I used, which to hon.

Members who sat in previous Parliaments would not have been necessary, but seeing that the expression I used has been misconstrued by several hon. Members, I should like to explain. I said that the Papers were voluminous, and that there were some Papers which we could not lay on the Table without previous communication with foreign Powers. That is the procedure which has always been adopted, as the noble Lord opposite and any hon. Members of this House who have any acquaintance with the conduct of affairs must know. That, however, does not mean that we cannot put on the Table of the House despatches in answer to our own. All those Papers are public records of the feelings, policy, and views of the different countries, and can always be produced; but in the course of negotiations of this kind there are confidential communications made by foreign Powers, and it is very often highly necessary for the vindication of our course and as illustrative of our policy that these documents should be published; but the House will see at once that the ancient custom which has always been observed of consulting foreign Powers before confidential communications on their part are laid before Parliament is a very proper and very wise one. The House must feel that otherwise there would be an end to all confidential intercourse with any foreign Power. When we are told that all that the Government have to do is to consult the House of Commons, and not under any circumstances to consult those who are our allies, the only consequence of such a policy would be that all the Papers we could lay on the Table would be documents which the House would soon find were wanting in light and information on many points of the most interesting character. I thought it right to explain the use of a particular phrase which is customary in Parliament, and to vindicate a practice which has been most salutary, and which has been observed by every Minister who has been entrusted with the conduct of affairs in this country.

(Mr. Secretary Cross, Sir Henry Selwyn-Ibbetson.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [22nd June]. "That the Bill be now read a second time:" and which Amendment was

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, whilst recognizing the necessity of measures being adopted to secure economy and efficiency in the management of Prisons, is of opinion that it would be inexpedient to transfer the control and management of Prisons from Local Authorities to the Secretary of State" (Mr. Stansfeld.)

—instead thereof.

Debate resumed.

THE LORD MAYOR (Mr. Alderman Corron) said, the Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council of the City had passed resolutions against the Bill, which resolutions had their origin in the feeling that the Home Secretary already possessed sufficient powers to carry out all that was useful in the measure. He had, since the Bill was last under consideration, carefully considered its provisions, and had watched the manner in which it had been received by the municipalities which had held meetings on the subject, and also by the magistrates at quarter sessions. Of the municipalities but few meetings had been held; but as far as he could analyze the results, from a statement in The Times of the number of meetings held for and against the Bill by various municipalities and courts of quarter sessions, it appeared that 25 meetings had been held, of which 13 had voted against the measure, 10 had been indifferent, and two had been neutral. It could, therefore, hardly be said that the measure had been very favourably received by those whom it would most immediately and directly affect. With regard to the magistrates, it was difficult to understand why it was attempted to remove them from the offices which for so many generations they had so well and efficiently filled, and when, as he contended, they constituted the machinery by which the good order and management of the prisons had been carried out. They were constantly replenished by new blood, and as they went with the times they were sure to take the lead in the improvement of prison management. He feared that the Bill would destroy the efficiency of the magistracy, and it would, at any rate, impair their self-respect. The working of the Bill would be confided to five Commissioners, to be appointed by the Home Secretary, to work under his sole control. They would have the appointment of sub-Commissioners, and the magistrates would only be allowed to meet and to act when the Home Secretary and the Commissioners thought fit, and to visit the prisons when they might so determine. ["No, no!"] It was, at any rate, as he had stated, so in the Bill. Their decisions would have no force until reported upon by the sub-Commissioners, and submitted to the Commissioners and the Home Secretary. They all knew what the result of such a mode of dealing with business would be. In that House they were accustomed to receive Reports and to make Reports, and when the actual management of prisons was transferred to sub-Commissioners and Commissioners, and to the Home Secretary over all, they could easily imagine the result of such a vast centralization. The indifference and apparently submissive manner of the magistrates was inexplicable to him, and he could only account for it by remembering the late period of the Session and the glowing terms in which the Bill was introduced by the Home Secretary. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would not press the Bill forward during the present Session, as proper time had not been allowed to consider a measure of such magnitude and importance. If, however, the Government should determine to proceed with it, he trusted that the House would not allow the liberties of the people to be absorbed and neutralized by any Secretary of State. In a letter to The Spectator more than 100 years ago a correspondent advised the editor of that celebrated publication to take care how he meddled with the country squires, for they were the ornament of the English nation—men of good heads and sound bodies. Such advice, however, appeared to be thrown away at the present day, and for the magistracy to have to submit to the action of sub-Inspectors of Prisons was, he thought, a very serious matter. His own opinion was, that the course which was about to be pursued must lead to the destruction of the magistracy, and thus far in a very great degree to the destruction of English liberty. Indeed, the attack which was made, through the Bill, on the magistrates of the country astonished him beyond measure, seeing that no censure had or could be passed upon them for anything which they had done, for they had administered the prisons under their charge economically and well. As a magistrate he had no objection to receive the recommendations of the Secretary of State, and he could not conceive why any prisons which ought to be closed might not be closed under the existing authority. He should like to ask, too, if the present was a fitting moment to transfer any charge whatever from the rates to the Consolidated Fund, seeing that that fund was so heavily burdened at the commencement of the Session that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to increase the Income Tax, and trade at the present moment was so terribly depressed. Another very great objection to the Bill was the enormous amount of patronage it would place in the hands of the Home Secretary. When the appointments of governors of gaols, chaplains, and other officers, with salaries ranging from £150 to £1,200 a-year, was distributed among a large body of magistrates, it was very different to concentrating the whole of the appointments in the hands of the Home Secretary, and that plan seemed almost certain to lead to great abuses, which were sure to cause great discontent. Such patronage would be far better exercised by the magistrates than it ever could be by the Home Office. Neither was it necessary to sweep away so many prisons, and to introduce so much centralization in order to effect some at least of the objects of the Home Secretary, for a uniform scale of diet and clothing could be introduced in the prisons that were retained. As to Newgate, it was the most convenient prison for the trial of criminals, who came there from all parts, and who were frequently of the lowest class. Notwithstanding that, however, the total cost for food per week for each prisoner in Newgate was only 2s. 7d. per head, and he defied the governor of any other gaol to feed the prisoners under his charge for a less sum. In the face, he might add, of the report that the Home Office was already greatly overworked, he was surprised to find the Government introducing a measure which would throw upon it so much additional labour. Some municipalities had already notified their objection to such a measure, and if time were allowed he felt sure that many more would do the same thing. The plumage of the Lords Lieutenant of counties had been lately to a great extent plucked away from them, for they had been deprived of the right of appointing officers for the Militia and the Volunteers, and it seemed as if they and the magistrates were to be put on one side altogether. For his own part, he was of opinion that, instead of pressing on the Bill, it would be well if a Select Committee were appointed to inquire into and report upon the management, expenditure, and patronage of the Government convict prisons, before Parliament was called upon to take a step which would seriously interfere with the liberties of the people, with the rights long enjoyed of appointing unpaid magistrates, and thus maintaining throughout the whole of the land a zealous, efficient, and influential body of administrators, respected and looked up to in their respective localities. Let it be seen how the work had there been done, and the House would then be better able to judge whether it would be safe to hand over such powers as were now asked for to the Secretary of State. He believed that the complaints of the prisoners would not receive so much consideration if the visiting justices were not interposed between the officers of the gaol and the Home Secretary. They gave considerate attention to those complaints, and at the same time they certainly did not pamper them. He opposed the Bill in the interest of liberty, in the interest of the country generally, and in the interest of the municipalities, which must feel that the measure was a direct attack on their privileges. If a magistrate had no power over the inmates of a gaol, he would soon cease to take any interest in their management. In conclusion, he must express a hope that the House would reject the Bill.

The Lord Mayor

MR. WHITBREAD, in opposing the Bill, said, he thought it had been put forward as a bait. It had been introduced for three distinct purposes—first, in order to secure uniformity of punishment; secondly, in order to do away with the present duality of government; and, thirdly, in order to secure a more economical management; and he would in regard to these three points read the Bill according to answers given to the deputations which waited upon the Home Secretary, and according to the discussions which had taken place upon it during the debate. As he understood it, the right hon. Gentleman argued that the visiting magistrates were not aware of the present position; that if they were, they would see that the Bill left them nearly the same authority in prisons as they possessed now, save that they would have a new master; that instead of making their report as now to the court of quarter sessions, they would in future have to report to the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department. But how was the patronage to be exercised? He was told that the Secretary of State would appoint the governors, and that the visiting magistrates would have in their hands the appointment of the warders. Well, if that were so, who was to deal with the complaints which the governor might make against the warders? Would the magistrates, or would the Secretary of State, have the power of dismissing the offending warder? If the magistrates, then they would again have the evils of duality of government, which it was one of the objects of the Bill to remove, intensified. These and many other points ought to be cleared up before the House assented to the second reading. In reality, the visiting justices were to be left much in the same position that they at present occupied. [MR. ASSHETON CROSS: No.] Well, if not, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would tell them so, for they were entitled to know distinctly what their position would be. There might be a great saving in prison administration if the system of centralization were thorough; but the Home Secretary bound himself by the Bill to maintain a prison in every county, leaving out of mind, seemingly, the fact that it was impossible to commence the attainment of real economy or perfection in the classification and treatment of prisoners, unless there were between 300 and 500 prisoners in a gaol. But out of the 40 counties of England there were 8 in which the average number of prisoners under detention was less than 100, while there were 13 other counties in which the average number was between 100 and 200. Thus, in 21 out of 40 counties there would exist the necessity of maintaining a very small prison. Again, in matter ought not to be left to rules; it should be provided for by statute. It was said that the Secretary of State might be disposed to leave the appointment of subordinate officers to the visiting justices. He thought that would be unpopular, and would tend to set up two authorities without any direct responsibility. There was another point on which he felt strongly. He lived in a county where there was comparatively little crime, and where the prison accommodation was considerably more than double what was required. The natural result would be that their prisons would be filled up from less fortunate districts. Nothing could be more mischievous than bringing a surplus criminal population into prisons such as he had described. Some 12 months ago such a proposal was made to take prisoners from a different county. He then said, whatever was done, they should take care, not only to secure plenty of cell room for their own prisoners, but that in the means of labour also they should keep the two sets of prisoners entirely separate. He did not think it would be fortunate to bring a criminal population among another slightly tinctured with crime. They heard a good deal about education, but they did not want the education of an innocent population in crime. These were the reasons—great as the money bribe was—that disabled him from giving his assent to the principle now proposed, without having a longer period for consideration, and he thought the principle ought not to be affirmed by the House until the question could be considered in all its bearings. If they took such a step in this matter, there would be no going back. For these reasons, though he said so with great reluctance, he was unable to support the second reading.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY said, he was glad to hear the independent testimony which had been given to the fidelity and discretion with which the magistrates had exercised their duties. The Bill under the notice of the House was an illustration of the saying that we did not know the value of a thing properly until we were about to lose it. He thought the House had to ask themselves how it was that such a measure, which certainly seemed at first sight to take away from the efficiency of the magistrates, was proposed by a Conservative Home Secretary, apparently with the consent of a large portion of his Party? When they inquired how that was brought about, hon. Members should put themselves in the position of his right hon. Friend, and then they would be reminded that the present Government came into office pledged very largely to remove the inequalities of local taxation, and to alter its unjust incidence, so that charges of an Imperial nature should not be locally levied in the manner of which complaint was made. This Bill had been introduced in accordance with the Resolution moved by the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes); but that was not the only motive that weighed with the Home Secretary. He had been urged to undertake the reform of prison management. The last 10 years had brought about a very different state of things. There had been a large emigration, and, on the other hand, there had been a great increase of trades. They had the experience of the Act of 1865, and the Home Secretary told them that greater reforms might be carried out. They had also to consider the utilization of the labour of prisoners, and the mode of its disposal. Matmaking had been almost universally adopted in prisons; and the practice had caused great complaint in that particular trade as being most unfair to them. Under that system, they wanted for governor not only a man who could maintain order, but a man who knew also how to dispose of the produce of the gaol. Under the Bill the matter would be remedied; for the Government itself would purchase the numerous articles which they wanted from the prisons. They already had the police clothes made in prison, and he trusted that their efforts would to a further extent be successful in this direction. It had been said that all the proposed improvements could be carried out under the existing law, if only the Home Secretary would issue some strong edicts and institute a thoroughly uniform system. But he (Sir John Kennaway) could not agree that that would be possible. The matter was really in the discretion of the magistrates at quarter sessions, and if they were asked to submit to a system of strict rule, they would decline to be responsible for the administration of the prisons. He was glad that by this Bill the Home Secretary had shown himself desirous to avail himself of the local knowledge and high character of the magistrates, of whose powers the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) was afraid they were to be deprived. On the contrary, the visiting justices would be in a position to advise upon a great many matters of importance. They would, as before, be responsible for much that was connected with the prison management, and also for the appointment of the minor officers. They had also to thank the Home Secretary for the consideration which, under the Bill, he had shown to the Prisoners' Aid Society. He had no fear that the Bill was inflicting any serious blow upon local self-government, for there would still be ample scope in school boards, highway boards, and county boards for those who desired to serve their country in that way. He was, however, anxious that those who had hitherto borne the burden of prison management should continue to interest themselves in it; and he trusted, therefore, that the Government would consider the suggestions for giving those persons a somewhat more extended patronage both in connection with patronage and also with management. He protested against handing over the whole matter to a central despotism, and it was because the Bill did not involve that result, and for the other reasons which he had given, that he should support the second reading.

MR. PEASE said, that the Bill was divided into two parts; one of which referred to the discipline in prisons, whilst the other included the financial part of the question. Of these, that which related to prison discipline was much the more important, but the two portions touched each other very closely, and neither could well be dealt with to the exclusion of the other. It might be perhaps necessary for the Government to contribute to local burdens, and he believed it was right sense, and it possibly might be right sense, to have the prisons transferred to them; but he did not think that it would be wise to meddle with this question of prisons without going a great deal further into the question of local authority and local areas than they had at present done. Further, he did not believe that the mode in which that was proposed to be accomplished by the Bill was a judicious one, or that the other results which it proposed to have in view would be obtained by it. The Bill proposed that, with some small exceptions, the Government should manage all and pay all; but he (Mr. Pease) contended that the Home Secretary had not shown that the evils he desired to get rid of could not be remedied under the present system, nor had he shown that the advantages of the proposed change would not be counterbalanced by corresponding disadvantages. As to removal, it was said that changes could then be made which could not now be made; but under Clause 5 of the Act of 1865 the Home Secretary had very considerable power to remove prisoners from one gaol to another, and, if he required more power, the House would gladly give it to him. The right hon. Gentleman recommended his Bill on the ground of the greater classification of prisoners of which it would admit; but the statistics relating to prisoners afforded but little hope of that. There were, he found, 18,000 prisoners in the borough and county gaols of the country, and of those only about 3,000 were in gaol under sentences of above six months. On the other hand, out of the 9,000 committals in the year, only 6,900, or in round numbers 7,000, were for periods of less than six months, while of the latter portion, those sentenced to imprisonment for terms ranging from six months to a year formed by far the larger proportion. They had the large number of 142,000 prisoners annually committed on short sentences, for offences which, to a great extent, were too widely different to admit of much classification. Out of the 6,900 committals to which he referred, there were nine gaols in the kingdom that had received 2,800 of that average of prisoners on long sentences, and there could therefore be only 2,000 prisoners distributed in the gaols throughout the country under sentence for offences which admitted of any classification. That being so, they could not hope for any great classification under the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman; but even if there were room for it under the existing system, the right hon. Gentleman could effect it under the provisions of the existing law, or, if those were insufficient, the House would gladly make them more complete.

He thought the right hon. Gentleman's calculations on the increased value of the productive work of prisoners were equally unsatisfactory. Another object which the Bill was to accomplish was to make uniform the cost of maintenance of prisoners in the different gaols; but the cause of the discrepancies which existed in that respect was nothing else than the want of intercommunication between prison authorities and of a little central supervision. For that defect there was also a cause, which could be readily ascertained and remedied without the necessity for this Bill. The next point on which he based his Bill was uniformity of treatment. That was one of the objects of the Act of 1865, and it was the first time he (Mr. Pease) had heard that that Act had very much failed. There were Inspectors, and if they had anything to do it was to secure uniformity of treatment. He had read the Reports of the Inspectors, and while they were full of microscopic details, they were very empty indeed of matters touching on the great branches of prison discipline. He wanted to know if the new Inspectors would do any better than the old. It seemed to him they were left exactly in the same position with the new as they were with the old. Great cost was to be saved in prison management by turning the whole thing into a high Government Department; but there was no reason to suppose that the Government could manage the matter so much cheaper than the justices had done. They had not shown any great economy in the management of the Post Office or the Telegraph Department. Upon investigation Government prison economy vanished just the same as prison classification vanished, and he had not seen anything to make him believe that the Inspectors would do more duty to the Board than they did under the right hon. Gentleman. He wanted to know how this change of the administration of prisons would affect the numbers in the prisons. There were many cases in which it was a nice question whether there should be fine or imprisonment, and the decision might be somewhat affected by the knowledge that a prisoner would be kept at the expense of the country generally instead of being a burden upon the county rate. If so, he believed the tendency of the Bill would be to increase the number of persons sent to gaol rather than decrease it. He was strongly opposed to Government contracts, and he held that if the prisons contracts were all to be managed in London, instead of being shared by the different counties, it would lead not only to centralization of the contracts, but to a decrease in the value of the commodity supplied and an increase in price. He therefore doubted whether the Government could contract for what was wanted in gaols nearly so advantageously as the justices had done. The right hon. Gentleman said the Bill would close about 50 gaols, and there they would effect considerable economy. That was true enough, he believed; and no doubt it might be done, for in Buckinghamshire, for instance, there were two gaols with but 90 prisoners between them, but it was not requisite, he contended, to pass a Bill like the present to provide for the closing of gaols. A very slight change in the existing system giving the Secretary of State the necessary powers would effect that object, and reforms and economies might in that way be satisfactorily carried out. The Commissioners and Inspectors, he might add, who would be appointed under the Bill would have to be paid, and it would, he thought, be very unfair to the Secretary of State and his successors in office if, when so much additional work would be thrown upon them, their salaries also were not increased. In whatever direction he looked, indeed, he saw very great objections to the Bill. It would produce no improvement in the management of our prisons, and give rise to very great increased cost. The visiting justices had very little feeling upon the subject of patronage, but were they prepared to hand it over to the Home Secretary and those who might come after him? He, for one, was not, and under the proposed arrangement the double patronage of the Home Secretary and the visiting justices would not work well. One of the results would be that the Home Secretary would be everlastingly troubled with hungry half-pay officers applying for gaol appointments. All the reforms that had taken place in our gaols had not come from the Government. They had been commenced by a Howard, a Fry, a Buxton, a Gurney, and had been followed up and carried out by the visiting justices. He was in favour of reformation, but he was entirely opposed to revolution and to the system of double government which would be created under the Bill, which, besides, would trench upon the great principle of local self-government and departmental control, to which they owed so much of the independence and greatness that characterized Englishmen and the English nation throughout the world.

Mr. J. R. YORKE said, the evils of the present system of prison management were great and patent and were becoming intolerable, and the question was whether the Bill was the best remedy for those evils. It had always been pressed upon the Government by local taxation reformers that relief should be given to the local taxpayers; and it was because the Bill was a step in that direction that he considered it both opportune and worthy the support of hon. Members on his (the Ministerial) side of the House. Everyone was agreed in affirming the principle of the Bill, and many of the objections urged against it by the hon. Member for South Durham were applicable to the details of the measure, which he thought could be disposed of in Committee. It secured efficiency, economy, and uniformity of prison discipline, while the ratepayers were satisfied with the financial prospect opened up by the measure. It was, in fact, a continuance of our recent policy in the same direction. A Committee of the House of Lords inquired in 1864 into the discipline and management of our prisons, and the Bill of 1865, founded on their Report, had practically superseded the visiting justices, as far as their individual discretion was concerned. There were three points of view from which the Bill was to be regarded—the point of view of the justices, that of the ratepayers, and that of centralization as compared with local self-government. As to the justices, the Bill had undergone a searching ordeal at quarter sessions; but from a statement handed to him he found that it had been approved definitely at no fewer than 20 quarter sessions, while it was only disapproved, or partially disapproved, at seven. In his own county (Gloucestershire) Mr. Barwick Baker, a most eminent prison reformer, opposed the Bill, among other reasons, because it would put an end to voluntary efforts in the matter of prison reform and the treatment of criminals, because country gentlemen would be intruders where they were now lords and masters, and would thus cease to attend to those matters as heretofore; and also because uniformity in prison management was not desirable, crime having its local characteristics, and the criminals of different localities requiring different treatment. These arguments prevailed, and Gloucestershire was one of the counties opposed to the Bill. But if every county were like Gloucestershire, and if every magistrate were like Mr. Barwick Baker, there would be no need for the Bill. In his opinion, every county ought to be brought up to the same standard, a result which could not be obtained without some such measure as this and without uniformity. The Home Secretary had manifested, by the concessions he had promised, a desire to consider the susceptibilities of the visiting justices, and had shown an anxiety, as far as was compatible with the principle of the Bill, to retain among them an interest in their work. The right hon. Gentleman had considered the importance of having the services of an independent body of local men to whom prisoners could have access, so that the public might be satisfied that any complaints of ill-treatment which the prisoners had to make would be looked into. Governors of prisons, however, would very much prefer one central authority to the many masters they had at present, and they would thereby obtain a better prospect of promotion and a readier recognition of any services they were able to give. As to the ratepayer, the Bill was a further step in the direction of relief to this poor beast of burden, now so overlaiden. Some relief had already been afforded to him by the present Government in the matter of police and lunatics, and the administration of justice was a matter in every way deserving to be dealt with by the central authority. Coming to the constitutional point of view, he denied that the magistrates were in any sense representatives of the ratepayers, except so far as they were ratepayers themselves. They were appointed by the Lord Lieutenant, and therefore in that respect owed nothing to the ratepayers, and were perfectly independent of them. He declined to regard the Bill as a blow to local self-government. No doubt principal complaints against the Bill, except that they were to be called "a visiting committee of justices" instead of "visiting justices," he failed to see that the Bill would make any substantial alteration in their functions or powers, for the Bill conferred upon the visiting committee all the powers that were now vested in visiting justices by the Act of 1865, and under their new name the same persons would retain all the disciplinary authority which they now exercised, and from which he should have thought they would be glad to be relieved. The only power which would be interfered with was the power of expenditure, and this had belonged to them in theory rather than in practice, and it certainly was not one which falls within any proper definition of self-government, or one which hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House should be desirous of maintaining. Moreover, he was doubtful whether the justices ought to be anxious to retain it. No doubt there were signs of strong opposition to the Bill. Some of the objections the Home Secretary had foreseen, and he had rightly anticipated that they would come from places where prisons are maintained. Among others, the Town Council of Nottingham had presented a Petition against the Bill, and a very instructive document that Petition was. The framers of it seemed to think that an appeal to the memory of our ancient liberties would always find favour with the House, and they therefore raised the cry of no interference with local self-government, but they could not fail to see that government by magistrates appointed by the Crown hardly came within that idea, and so they suggested that it was for the interests of the community that some men of merit should be entrusted with certain powers over their fellow-citizens, provided they exercised them under the eyes of a Town Council; and in this way they alleged that they now had some power of controlling the expenditure, and they expressed a belief that the administration of gaols by visiting justices acting under the eyes of town councils would be far more economical than by the Government. That and similar Petitions had confirmed him in the belief that a good deal of the opposition to the Bill was based on the interference which it would exercise with the purveying of meat and stores for these prisons, but he hoped that the Home Secretary would not be discouraged by that species of opposition. Then it was said that this plan would tend to centralization, and to some hon. Members this was sufficient to condemn any measure. But they must not be misled by names. Many functions of Government were better discharged by a central authority, and was not the management of prisons one of them? Certainly, the question of prison management was in no sense one of local self-government, and in what sense could it be said to involve self-government at all? The Act of 1865 prescribed a code within which the visiting justices were obliged to move, and they formed, in fact, the local machinery for carrying out the Act. Doubtless that Act left a certain amount of discretion within the general rules which it prescribed, but that very discretion had resulted in the discrepancies in discipline which called for the present Act. The administration of justice was in every respect an Imperial function. Our criminal law was administered in the name of the Crown, and the Courts of Quarter Sessions were the Queen's Courts, and administered justice in her name. By the Common Law, all prisons were vested in the Sovereign, the legal estate of the gaols being, according to Blackstone, in the Crown. The gaoler had always been the officer, not of the county but of the Sheriff, and the Sheriff was the servant of and was appointed by the Crown. That the prisons should ever have passed under local management was, to a certain extent, an anomaly, and was probably adopted by Parliament, with the consent of the Crown, merely for greater convenience and for facilitating the discharge of the administration of the law, which had always been the first duty of the Sovereign power. What substantial difference would be effected if this Bill should pass? He could not find a single point, except in regard to the question of patronage, and that could not be really an essential matter of self-government. The officers who would have to carry out the Act ought to be, and under this Bill would be, trained men, and, as there would be opportunities for promotion and a much larger field for selection, he could not doubt that the civil servants whom this Bill would provide would be much better qualified to carry on the government of a prison than the present prison staff. He wished to say nothing disrespectful of any persons connected with any gaol in the country; indeed, he could bear testimony to the efficiency and zeal of many governors of prisons: but still he thought that a better officer would probably be secured by selection from trained employées, than by an active canvass on behalf of some retired colonel or captain at quarter sessions. In regard to the minor appointments, the Government had shown a disposition to give way. No arguments against the Bill had been used which could in any sense counterbalance the great benefits of economy, efficient management, and last, but not least, relief of local burdens. At the last General Election a great and powerful Party came into office so intimately connected with the landed interest that it was hoped they would be able to deal with matters of local self-government and local taxation more successfully than the somewhat heterogeneous Party which had previously occupied the Ministerial benches. The latter had, indeed, great ideas and grand schemes which he hoped they would one day be able to carry out; but in their very greatness would be found the chief difficulty in carrying them. He and others, however, had hoped for some consolation in their Party defeat, in the expectation that the Party opposite, who out of office had made this question a Party cry, would in office seriously grapple with it. They could do what the Liberal Party could not do. Hon. Members opposite would follow the present Prime Minister wherever he would lead them, and no more powerful Government for such questions as these was to be hoped for. Well, then, when this Government, after a long delay, fairly attempted to take a step, which if simple was at least effective, and if not comprehensive was at any rate practical, the Opposition would have none of it, because it was only a small measure and not part of a great scheme, and hon. Gentlemen opposite either possibly supported or opposed it because it interfered, forsooth! with their vested interests in patronage and power. Before long the establishment of County Boards would be a practical and a pressing question, and could any one deny that their establishment would be facilitated by the transfer of the prison jurisdiction to the State. That would be one element removed from the chaos with which the Minister, whoever he might be, who took up that question would have to deal. If the Bill went into Committee there were one or two points of detail to which the Home Secretary would probably give his attention. Amongst others he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would adopt Clause 53 of the Act of 1865, which allowed any magistrate acting in his jurisdiction to enter any prison at any time to make a report. He regarded the measure as a Bill not merely to relieve the land from burdens, but as one for the improvement of our prison laws, and he hoped the Government would be able to pass the measure during the present Session, because he, for one, could not find in it any of those dangers of centralization which hon. Members had denounced.

MR. HARDCASTLE said, that the question raised by the Bill was whether the magistrates had done their duty in respect to the prisons well or badly. If they had done their duty well, there could be no pretext for passing this Bill; if badly, there could be no question that it was a slur and rebuke upon them. In his opinion, they were not deserving of either. It certainly could not be argued that the business of the magistrates had been badly managed universally; and although a saving might be effected by the union of small gaols generally, yet in certain districts, and especially in those counties the prisons of which were now well conducted, the result of the Bill would, he was afraid, be anything but economical, as the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department expected. In the county of Lancashire, in particular, with which he was connected, that measure would, he feared, inflict a very considerable fine on a large section of the taxpayers. The expenditure under that Bill would probably amount to a farthing in the pound on the income tax, whereas at present in Lancashire the corresponding burden was less than a farthing in the pound on rateable property. There was a great difference between paying a farthing in the pound on a rental of, say, £40 and paying a farthing in the pound on, say, £200 of one's yearly income, even allowing for the new exemptions from the income tax. The Bill took the management of the gaols from the magistrates and transferred the patronage connected with them to the Government. The minor appointments, it appeared, were still to continue to be vested in the magistrates; but he was inclined to think that so much inconvenience would arise from dividing the patronage, that he doubted whether that arrangement would work well. It was said that the services of the visiting justices would be retained, but such experience as they had was opposed to this hope. At Lewes they had been invited to visit the Government Prison, and had done so; but the result was that they practically found themselves so much snubbed by the Government officials that they had all, with one exception, declined to perform that duty. If they were to have independent governors and officers appointed by Commissioners and superintended from London it was obvious that magistrates who took an interest in their duties would feel that their power for good was taken from them, and that henceforth they were to be virtually set aside as regarded the management of prisons. In conclusion, he regretted that he was compelled to take refuge from the startling Radicalism of the Home Secretary in the unexpected and reassuring Conservatism of the hon. Member for Burnley.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that immediately after the last debate on the second reading had taken place the Home Secretary received a deputation of justices, and he told them that he was glad to see them, and that he was sorry he had not been able to say what he had desired to say in the House when the second reading was moved. What was the meaning of that? Surely, if the right hon. Gentleman had really made up his mind on the previous evening to make the concessions which he made to the justices when they called upon him, he might easily have announced the fact to the House through the mouth of one or other of his Colleagues who then addressed it, even though he might himself on that occasion have been suffering from what might be called "suppressed speech." Then the House would have been able to discuss the new and altered phase of the measure with advantage. But the real explanation was, that the concessions which he made to the justices were the result of after consideration. The debate had shown him that he could not carry the Bill as it stood when he introduced it, and upon reflection he agreed to alter it. The right hon. Gentleman had taken to himself the appointment of governors, chaplains, surgeons, and superior officers, and had left to the justices the appointment of warders, servants, and cooks. Many hon. Members had spoken of the dualism to which that would lead. But the House had not simply to deal with a question of privileges and patronage. The justices did not think of the petty patronage attached to their office. Leaving that out of the calculation, he (Mr. Goschen) said that the question raised by the Bill was not a question between the justices and the Government, but a question between the State and local authority. And it was a question of self-government generally. The Bill would take away the power of the latter, and put it into the hands of the former, and therein lay its great danger. His right hon. Friend the Lord Mayor would forgive him if he said he regretted some portions of his speech, because he accentuated more the privileges which attached to local authorities than the duties which they had to perform. Many men belonging to the non-professional classes were harnessed to the work of the State and did the work of the State. There were many hon. Members on both sides of the House who felt it was of great importance that those men should continue harnessed to that work. He believed it was admitted that this Bill would effect the transfer of one great branch of local Government to the central Government; the quarter sessions would have to retire from the position of being responsible for the gaols, and the Commissioners were to take their place and occupy that position. The heading of the 4th clause was "Maintenance of prisons and prisoners out of public funds." The heading of another clause was "Prisons to vest in Secretary of State"—that was centralization. And as a result of that there came this heading, "Appointment of Prison Commissioners"—that was patronage, and the whole system of bureaucracy, with assistant Commissioners and all that appertained to them. After the Bill became law, who would be responsible for the gaols, and who was to have the credit of the gaols being well or badly kept? The gaolers. But the gaolers would be appointed by the Government, and although the justices would endeavour to do their duty they would not be responsible for the conduct of the gaols. The argument set forth on behalf of the Bill was that it would promote economy, efficiency, and, last not least, relief to local taxation. It was a fair inquiry in what degree these considerations were likely to influence the majority that might possibly pass the Bill. Was it efficiency or economy that would be appreciated — or the three farthings in the pound that it would save the ratepayers? There were no statistics to refer to with regard to the points of economy and efficiency; but suppose the Bill had not offered a relief of three farthings in the pound to local taxation, could the eloquent arguments as to the advantages of superior discipline and uniformity of arrangement, and the great argument with regard to the remunerative character of mat-making, have persuaded hon. Members to support it? Suppose, again, that this saving of three farthings in the pound to the ratepayers had been offered, without the lack upon quarter sessions — he believed that the Bill would then have been accepted with acclamation; and therefore the real origin of the Bill was not those considerations which had been put forward. He knew that the question of local taxation must be dealt with; but he hoped that it would not be constantly popping up in all their legislation, so as to induce the Government to introduce Bills that they would not otherwise have introduced, and to postpone Bills that they would not otherwise have postponed. As to the statements in respect of efficiency and economy, they had not seen the statistics upon which those arguments were said to be founded. He wondered, however, whether they were as convincing as those upon which they ought the telegraphs, or as those upon which the Licensing Bill was founded. Even if the statistics proved that there could be increased economy and efficiency, did it follow that the increased economy would continue for many years? Was that their experience of Government administration? Could any figures persuade them that Government management would be a cheap management? The late Government had introduced a Bill which would cut away one of the chief functions of quarter sessions in order to save £50,000 or £100,000, would they not have been denounced upon every hustings? Therefore, to those who sat on the Opposition side of the House, it was perhaps a little diverting to hear the Home Secretary discussing the question whether he would be able to do the very same thing. He did not think that this question turned entirely upon the point whether or not the State would be able under the provisions of this Bill to show a good balance sheet at the end of each year as the result of its management of our prisons. He might, however, observe that it was remarkable that in some of our large prisons in Lancashire the cost per head of the prisoners was only £16, whereas the Government estimate put the cost under the proposed State system at £21 per head. He did not know how far the opinion was shared by hon. Members near him; but his view was that it was not merely because the State could do something cheaply and efficiently that therefore such duties were to be cast upon it. He believed, on the contrary, that if such a principle were acted upon, it would lead to changes of a most dangerous character which we might live to repent. It might lead to the transfer of the police to the State. If the Government could manage the police more cheaply and better than the local authorities, would the House be prepared to place them under the Government? ["Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches below the Gangway.] He called the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the cheers which came from below the Gangway on his side of the House, which showed that in the opinion of hon. Members who sat there this Bill contained but an instalment of that which had been asked for, and there was no knowing how much further they might be asked to go. Were those hon. Members really ready to hand over the police to the Government? ["Hear, hear!"] Then the police would become mere Government officials, and instead of the local authorities the State would be answerable for public order. Before he sat down he asked the Government most earnestly to let the House know whether this measure was an exceptional piece of legislation in the direction of centralization, or whether it was intended to carry into effect the view of the hon. Members who had just been cheering? Those who now sat on the Opposition side of the House had often been charged with false economy, but they had never been so falsely economical as to hand over the police to the State, and make them an Imperial constabulary, in order to save the local rates. He regretted extremely that the question of local taxation appeared to have reached a phase in which it induced hon. Members opposite to set aside all constitutional principles for the sake of a small annual saving. The hon. and learned Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Rodwell) stated the other evening that this was not a centralizing Bill, because the local justices were, under the existing system, simply acting under regulations, and could not exercise any self-government at all, their duties being prescribed for them by statute. But in putting forward that argument the hon. and learned Member appeared to have fallen into a confusion of ideas as to what was meant by self-government. Government consisted not in passing laws, but in executing them; and he wished to know whether those which affected the localities should be executed by the local authorities or by Imperial officers? The principle of self-government was that the State looked to others besides its own servants to perform the duties required to be discharged in the various localities. The distinction between privilege and duty had been too much kept out of sight all through the debate. In the English public service were included not merely those who were representative and elective, but even those local authorities, such as the Lords Lieutenant and the High Sheriffs, who were appointed by the Crown, but whose local connections made them to all intents and purposes local authorities. The State said, and was wise in saying—"We will press into our interest the strongest bodies in the localities, and we prefer to use those persons rather than our own paid officials." He, therefore, differed from the hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Thomas Acland), who always spoke so well on these local taxation subjects, when he said that what was an Imperial concern became a national duty. Why, at that moment, that great statesman, Prince Bismarck, seeing the great advantage England was deriving from this system, was decentralizing, and was anxious to press into the service of his country that principle which in this country had so long held society together, and stood between the population and the State in times of dangers and at critical junctures. It was not a slight thing to hand over the police and the gaols to the Imperial Government, so that the people could no longer say—"These are our servants whom we pay ourselves." The distinction was not fanciful; it was real. He heard with pleasure the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) speak of the importance of the connection between the criminals and the custodians of the gaols, for he thought the right hon. Gentleman was not alone in that opinion. He had not gone into statistics in reference to this branch of the subject, but had contented himself with calling attention to a few of the general considerations which in his view bore upon the main principle of the Bill. He felt sure that there were many hon. Members sitting on the opposite side of the House who agreed with him in the view that with regard to this Prisons Bill decentralization had been pushed too far. They were against centralization, against increasing the patronage in the hands of the Government, against diminishing the work to be done by the county authorities; and it was only for the very strong exceptional case made out by the Government in dealing with the prisons that they would now support the present Bill. It had been said that the counties could be better organized if they parted with the administration of their prisons. The hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Evans) said that if they parted with the prisons the Government would be more able to frame a Bill to deal with County Financial Boards; but the public did not want County Financial Boards, but strong county institutions. Why was the Bill brought in? He would tell them. The House was called upon to inflict this serious blow upon self-government, because the Government was under a pledge to deal with local taxation; but was this the only mode in which they could give relief? He appealed to the House whether it was not time some authoritative statement was made as to what relief was still due, and how far this system was to go. The first year they subsidize; the second year they do nothing; and the third year they centralize. It was a system of biennial sops. The candidate who was now fighting West Worcestershire said the other day—"At the same time I regard the measure as only a small instalment of that to which those engaged in agriculture are entitled." The Government had already given £1,000,000, and now £300,000, and he wanted to know what were the acceptances held by the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes), and how much he yet expected to get from them? Nothing could be more unsatisfactory than that, and he believed he spoke the unanimous sentiments of the whole House when he bade the Government to make a clean breast of it, so that hon. Members might know what they had yet to pay for the relief of the local ratepayers, which would be far preferable to this system of annual doles, granted in a manner which was not approved of by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and many hon. Members on the Government side. He had observed that the Government Bills had precedence according to the amount of public money to be paid under them. Let them look at the Bills before the House at that moment. All the Local Government Bills were put together in a heap, although they did not press on very many of them. The Minister, like the hero of the old nursery rhyme, "put in his thumb, and pulled out a plum" now and again, like a good boy; but where was the Valuation Bill? It was shunted—it carried no money with it—it was run into a siding to let the Prisons Bill pass. Where was the Pollution of Rivers Bill? It carried no public money, and it was shunted to make way for the Prisons Bill. Where was the Highways Bill? Shunted to let the Prisons Bill pass. It had no money in it—nothing but an income tax Inspector to screw up the valuation—and therefore they did not push on that Bill, that the Prisons Bill, with its $\frac{3}{4}$ d. in the pound, might be introduced, and pass safely on its way, a measure which was open, he considered, to very serious objections. He had no objection to the relief of local taxation, but he had, he thought, a right to ask the Government, "What is your policy with regard to local taxation?" If they had such a policy the House would be grateful for some frank exposition of it, instead of seeing the Government introducing Bills the only tendency of which could be towards centralization, and that for the sole reason that the Government appeared to be unable otherwise to deal with local taxation. He put those views before the House, which, he submitted, were entitled to serious attention, both as regarded the interests of the ratepayers and the reform of their local institutions.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that one great advantage, at all events, had followed from the adjournment of the debate the other evening—they had got rid of all that had been so forcibly pressed upon the House by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands)—namely, that there had been great exaggeration on the part of the Government in stating their case against the present system of prisons. Hon. Members on both sides had had time since to refer to the facts stated in the Blue Books on the Table of the House, and had found that, so far from the statements of the Government being exaggerations, they were, if anything, practically within the mark, and the result had been that evening they had not heard a word from any opponent of the Bill to bear out that assertion. He was happy to say also that in the few days which had intervened since the adjournment of the debate they had got rid of another long-sounding and ugly word—the word confiscation. That word, which had formed the staple of the speech of his hon. and gallant Friend behind him, had that evening also totally disappeared. He had refrained from addressing the House on the former evening as he knew the debate was to be adjourned, but it was in reference to the word confiscation he was anxious to address them. The right hon. Gentleman the Lord Mayor had stated that the Bill was replete with centralization, and therefore it was that he (Mr. Cross) was glad he had since received and addressed a deputation on the subject of the Bill; and the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken (Mr. Goschen) had taken the trouble to cut his speech to pieces, not by argument, but physically—the only way he could cut it up—and in reading the speech he was led astray by not having put the pieces together properly. It was not on the question of patronage he wished to speak, as had been represented, but on the question of confiscation. When he said that the State would undertake the management of the prisons for the future, they declined totally to relieve those who at present held jurisdiction over the prisons of the obligation which rested upon them to provide gaols—every prison authority was bound by law to provide its own gaols for its own prisoners. The gaol might be provided in one of several ways. The local authority might build a gaol and pay for it, or they might build it and borrow the money to pay for it; or they could provide it by letting out the prison to some third person who would build it for them. But when a gaol was built it could never be used by the local authority for any other purpose than that of a gaol. They had no power to get rid of it. They could not sell it; and if with the consent of the Secretary of State they were allowed to pull it down, it was only on condition that they built another elsewhere, entirely to his satisfaction. Their obligation was permanent, and they could not get rid of it. But if the State stepped in and relieved them of what he had before called this white elephant, the State should have the use of it so long as they maintained the prisoners. They must have power to enlarge the prisons, and of adapting them to those particular plans which were best suited to carry out improved prison discipline. It was for that purpose the State required to have possession of the gaols. But they held them not as private property, but as a trust. The State would hold them for State purposes. The authorities at present held the gaols as trustees for State purposes, and so it would be in the case of the Secretary of State, who would hold them precisely for the same purposes and on the same trusts as they were now held, and when he ceased to do so he would have to restore them back on certain payments to the local authorities. That was not confiscation, but putting it precisely on its old footing. Although technically the property was transferred, the legal estate becoming vested in the Secretary of State, it was put on the same footing as that mentioned by the hon. Member opposite, when he said that the old gaols were practically vested in the Crown. They now reverted to that practice, holding them for like purposes and no other. The right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down certainly made a strong speech in answer to his right hon. Friend the Lord Mayor. For his part, he (Mr. Cross) was surprised at the statement of the right hon. the Lord Mayor; and he could not see anything more calculated to do harm in a matter of this kind, or to injure more those who were doing duty so well throughout the country, than to say that the office of a magistrate was not worth holding when such slight privileges and advantages as those to which the Lord Mayor referred were discontinued. How could that in any way lower the dignity of the office? As a magistrate of a good many years' standing, he could not see how the Bill threw the slightest slur upon the magistrates. His hon. Friend (Mr. Hardcastle) also, who represented a division of the county for which he (Mr. Cross) had the honour of sitting, said that where the magistrates were doing well the Bill did them injustice; where they were not doing well, the Bill threw a slur on them. He denied both of those assertions. He spoke for the magistrates of his own county, where the gaols were administered economically, efficiently, and with zeal for the public service. But that was not the question. The question was as to the managing the gaols from one end of the kingdom to the other. He ventured to say that, owing to the conflict of local jurisdiction which at the present moment existed, it was absolutely impossible for the magistrates, however good might be their intention, however hard they might work, to carry on prison jurisdiction effectually throughout the country. An hon. Member opposite (Mr. Pease) had said, "Why don't you accomplish your object in another way? Why not take further powers? Why not remove prisoners from one prison to another, and exercise the powers you have with regard to the amalgamation of the several gaol jurisdictions?" The answer to that was complete. The local jurisdiction, as at present constituted, would not allow him to do so. He might, no doubt, remove prisoners from one prison to another, but he had no power to compel another prison to receive them. He defied any Secretary of State to carry out an efficient system of prison discipline if things were left as they were at present with regard to small gaols. It was not the fault of the men. He believed the justices did their utmost to secure efficiency and economy, but a staff which was necessary for a small prison with half-a-dozen or a dozen prisoners in it would serve for a very much larger number of prisoners. What was the result? In the first place, from want of actual duties to perform, the officers deteriorated; and, in the second, from want of a sufficient number of prisoners, they could not find proper instructors to teach them the work they ought to do. They could not have a proper system unless they had a total change from one end to the other. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goschen) said by this Bill they struck a great blow at local self-government. That he (Mr. Cross) entirely denied. When they talked of local self-government they thought of bringing up people independently to govern themselves. Did they mean to tell him that in the matter of prison discipline a single man besides the visiting justices had the slightest voice in the matter? The people had no voice in it. He did not say it was right that they should; he thought it would be very wrong if they had. But the local magistrates themselves had no power. Their hands were tied by the Act of 1865. The strictest rules were laid down under that Act in its Schedule; and, further, the visiting justices were subject to the quarter sessions, which had the power of making additional rules for their guidance. The power to make these rules was now to be vested in the Secretary of State, and the first thing he would have to do would be to draw up a code of rules for the guidance of visiting justices, who would exercise all the powers of managing prisons under those rules. It also had been said that the Bill interfered with the privileges of the municipalities, and would destroy their self-respect. But very few of the municipalities had separate gaols, and with reference to them, speaking of his own county, could it be thought of such towns as Preston, Oldham, Rochdale, and Warrington, that their self-respect and power of self-government were not just as great as any other town which had a gaol to manage? Towns like Bolton and Wigan, which might have a gaol to-morrow if they chose, had never thought it necessary for their dignity or authority to go and build a gaol. They had wisely sent their prisoners elsewhere, and had no jurisdiction over them. This question had nothing to do with local self-government, and to tell him that the looking after 18,000 miserable prisoners was necessary to preserve the dignity of local self-government or the self-respect of local authorities, was really an insult to his common sense. What, then, was all this fuss, disturbance, and row about? They had at the present moment 28,000 people who were undergoing punishment in prison, of whom about 18,000 were in prison under the management of certain gentlemen up and down the country, and 10,000 were under the hands of the Government. Did any hon. Gentleman suppose that the dignity of the counties or of the towns or cities was infringed because a prisoner was sent to a convict prison and not to an ordinary gaol? He saw a statement the other day in a Welsh paper reporting a conversation between the grand jurors of a Welsh county. One of the grand jurors asked—"If this man gets six months' imprisonment, will the cost fall on the county or the State?" He was told it would fall on the county, when he said—"He had better not find a bill," and the grand jury then ignored the bill. Was a Judge to say—"If I sentence this convicted prisoner to five years' penal servitude I shall lessen the dignity of the mayor, who is sitting by me; and therefore I will send him to the county gaol?" Surely the principle of convict prisons had a direct bearing on this question; and if the monstrous argument which had been put forward were to be followed out to its logical result, the prisoners sent to penal servitude must be chargeable to local jurisdictions. He put the argument which he had just mentioned, therefore, out of the question, and the point to which he would specially direct the attention of the House was that Secretary of State after Secretary of State, though a Gaol Act had now been passed 10 years, found he was powerless to promote efficiency, uniformity, and economy. It was true, indeed, that in many counties and boroughs that Act had worked well; but in how many, he would ask, had it not failed? That was not owing, as he had pointed out, to any want of willingness or ability on the part of the magistrates to do their duty, but to the impossibility of carrying out the Act because of the multiplicity of jurisdictions. The main features of the present measure ought then, he thought, to command the assent of the House and of the country, for under its operation we should be able so to classify our prisoners as to instruct them better when in prison in industrial labour, which would be of use to them when their period of confinement came to an end, and also secure that essential point, punishment by imprisonment; for when a man was sent to prison in a county for three months, it would make no difference whether the county were A or B, the punishment would be the same. He had been talking, he might add, to a very illustrious foreigner since the Bill had been introduced, who had said to him—"I observe, Mr. Cross, you stated that in different counties men sentenced to undergo three months' imprisonment are subjected to totally different treatment. Is not your law the same throughout the length and breadth of England?" His reply was—"Nominally, yes; but, practically, no, because three months' imprisonment in my own county is a very different thing from the same period of confinement in another." It was, then, for the purposes of securing uniformity of discipline, diet, treatment, and the classification of prisoners mainly that the Bill was proposed. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) had been good enough to raise a laugh at his expense by referring to something he was supposed to have said the other day; but the right hon. Gentleman was entirely mistaken as to what fell from him on the occasion to which he alluded. He believed it was absolutely necessary that all the superior officers in our prisons should be appointed by the Secretary of State; but he cared very little about the inferior posts, for it was very likely that persons living in a locality might know a great many who would be fitted for the inferior posts, and it would be a great advantage that an officer who had served well in a gaol should not be confined to the gaol for the whole of his life, or until he was superannuated, but that he should have the chance of being promoted in case a vacancy occurred to a larger gaol, and in that way reap the benefit of his good conduct. Therefore the officers would gain largely by the Bill. But the right hon. Gentleman said—"We want to know whether this is the end of all things?" The right hon. Gentleman was like a celebrated clergyman who always set up a man in the pulpit for the purpose of knocking him down. From the beginning to the end of his speech the right hon. Gentleman made observations which proved that he had not read the Bill at all. [Mr. Goschen: I read the clauses.] It was true the right hon. Gentleman read the headings of the clauses in the index, which were not part of the Bill, and therefore he (Mr. Cross) was strictly correct in saying that the right hon. Gentleman never dealt with the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman summarily dismissed this question of the gaols, because he knew he was treading on delicate ground. Every hon. Member in the House felt that, although a great deal had been made of the question of centralization, the right hon. Gentleman himself did not really think there was much centralization in the matter after all that had been said. But in order to impress upon the House the arguments which he would have used if the Bill had been one of centralization, the right hon. Gentleman said—"I will tell you what you are going to do. If you pass this Bill, it will be necessary to have the police under the control of the Government." Then some hon. Member cried—"Hear, hear," whereupon the right hon. Gentleman said—"I call the Chancellor of the Exchequer's attention to that cheer;" and so the right hon. Gentleman starting off again said—"When the Government have got the police just think what a blow that will be when we see the policemen walking up and down every town all over the country and hear people say, pointing to them—"Look here, those are not our own men now, but they are Government officers that have come down as spies." Thus, the right hon. Gentleman had described a state of things that had no real existence. The right hon. Gentleman did not want to convince him (Mr. Cross), because he knew he could not do so. There was no ground whatever for that line of argument; and the right hon. Gentleman seemed to adopt it only because he was not able to press the danger of centralization, confiscation of the gaols, or the fatal results to the magistracy. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) had pointed out, with his usual acuteness, that if the prisoners had any grievances they would lose their present right of appeal through the visiting justices. But they would really not do so. In introducing the Bill he (Mr. Cross) had stated, and now repeated, that if the gaols were to be in the hands of the Secretary of State it was absolutely necessary there should be a body of independent justices who should be able to look after the interests of the prisoners. This was precisely what the visiting committee would do under the Bill, and what any body of English gentlemen would gladly do. There would be vested in the visiting justices all the powers of Sections 58 and 59, but the diet tables and other like matters would be settled by the central authority, and the visiting justices would see that the regulations thus laid down were properly carried out. That would be their position, and he was sure they would accept it. He had now explained the main grounds upon which the Government based the Bill, which, as he submitted, struck no blow at local self-government, or at the duties of the magistrates, but, on the contrary, showed every wish to recognize what the magistrates had done and would do. The Government were of opinion that the Bill involved no question of centralization, while it offered the greatest possible advantages in securing greater efficiency, greater economy, and better discipline. In order to arrive at these results it was imperatively necessary that the Government should have possession of the gaols. The right hon. Gentleman complained that he had placed on the Table no statistics as to the advantages and economy of the Bill. But such statistics had really been on the Table for years. They were contained in the Blue Books relating to prisons, which showed what the cost would be, and might be made to be, by proper classification. From the reports of the proceedings at quarter sessions, it was clear that the magistrates, as a body, did not think the Bill a slur upon them. If ever a Bill had gone through a severe ordeal it was this measure, which, in the middle of a debate, before the responsible Minister had spoken, and without any thorough discussion in the House of Commons, had been discussed by the visiting justices and courts of quarter sessions throughout the country; and any person who read the resolutions adopted at these sessions must come to the conclusion that the magistrates did not see the dangers which had been pointed out as the result of the Bill. Those resolutions contained no word of confiscation or centralization; they merely claimed a little more power for the visiting justices. If, on the other hand, hon. Members looked at some of the municipalities which had memorialized the Government at the Boards of Guardians and the Chambers of Agriculture, they would find a unanimous opinion in favour of the present measure. In conclusion, he would express a sincere hope that the House would not only read the Bill a second time, but that it would consent to pass through all its stages a measure which, in his opinion, and he believed in the opinion of the magistrates also, would prove to be of great advantage to the country.

MR. CHILDERS said, he had carefully read the Bill, and would point out what it really did. It transferred from the different courts of quarter sessions that were not overpressed with work to the Secretary of State, who was so overpressed with work that he did not know where to turn, the charge of above 100 prisons and 18,000 prisoners. Moreover, as if we had not enough public Departments already, it created a new public Department, with five Commissioners, he knew not how many assistant Commissioners, and a large body of Inspectors. Within the last few years two important measures had been passed on the subject of prison discipline. In 1863 a measure relating to penal servitude was introduced after a careful inquiry by a Royal Commission, of which he was a Member. That Bill made slight changes in comparison with those which would be effected by the present measure. In the following year a Bill was brought in relating to the prisons dealt with by the measure now under consideration. That also was considered very carefully by a Select Committee before it was allowed to pass, although the changes it effected were not great. But the present Bill was introduced late in outside the measure itself. He trusted that the House would consider the Bill on its merits. Upon what did it rest? It might be considered in its economical and administrative aspects, and one could not be dissociated from the other. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Childers) had challenged him to say that the Bill would be productive of very great economy, and to discuss the savings that might be effected. But at that hour of the night he would not again go over the statistics, and the question did not rest on statistics. The economy did not depend upon the £100,000, or whatever the sum might be, which it might be thought would be saved, but upon the introduction of a system of administration which was in its nature more economical than that which had hitherto prevailed. If he might recall a saying of his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government which was much applauded at the time, and had often been quoted since, it was one of those cases in which "expenditure depended upon policy." And if they desired that prison discipline should be effective and under economical management, they had better get rid of the complications and difficulties that had led to the introduction of this Bill. The question of prison discipline had been under the consideration of Parliament for many years. There had been Select Committees and discussions in that House, and they were not approaching a new and untried subject. It was, therefore, the less necessary that, at the end of these discussions, the House should take further time to consider a Bill that was the outcome of what had gone before, and the principle of which had met with general approval. The great matter was to be able to carry out a system of prison administration with economy. The Government did not say crime was increasing and that the measure was required to repress it. On the contrary, the improvements of late years in prison discipline had tended to reduce crime, and the Government now proposed to take a step further in that direction. Nothing was more conducive to the repression of crime than certainty of punishment and uniformity of punishment. And nothing was more likely to bring about that state of things than central action, which could most effectively bring the system into harmony. Well, admitting that central action in such matters was the best, the magistrates, if charged by the Government to carry it out, would be in a most embarrassing position with respect to the ratepayers at whose expense the change was to be made. He knew from his own experience how frequently it happened that magistrates saw the necessity of some improvement, but refrained from carrying it out, because the ratepayers whose pockets were to suffer had no voice in the matter. He remembered sitting as chairman of quarter sessions when there was an even division, and he gave the casting vote against the expenditure, not because he thought it unnecessary, but in order that the question might be reconsidered. Some persons said—"Bring in the ratepayers to have a voice in the expenditure." Did the Government think that ratepayers would furnish them with the best system? Would it be wise to give the ratepayers control over prison management? There, to his mind, lay the whole question. If bodies elected by the ratepayers could be safely entrusted with that business well and good. But if, as the Government believed, that was a matter of administration which ought not to be left to bodies of that kind, the only resource was to treat it from the point of view of the central Government, which was what the Bill proposed to do. He believed this system would greatly hasten and facilitate reform in prison administration, and indeed in the local administration of the country generally. The Government, he might say, were desirous as far as possible in connection with this subject to avail themselves of the assistance of the local magistrates, whose patriotism and public spirit he was sure would not be found wanting. In matters connected with administration, it was the earnest wish of the Government to facilitate and not impede their proper and useful action. He believed that that proposal of the Government was one which would have for its primary effect a great improvement of the prison discipline and the penal system of the country; secondly, that it would greatly facilitate the improvement of our system of local administration; and, thirdly, that it would take a very important step towards the settlement of the question of contributions to local burdens. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract had done injustice to his (the Chancellor lor of the Exchequer's) former statements on that subject. He had never said that that matter was not within their purview. What he stated in 1874 was that the Government then proposed as much as they could at that time propose in regard to two or three of the subjects embraced in the Resolution of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes), and he remembered in that Session pointing to reasons, not merely of a financial character, why they should put off dealing with the administration of justice, because inquiries were then going on for the result of which it was desirable to wait. Certainly, last year, when speaking of the expenses of prosecution, he said that was a point to which they were looking, and it never had been out of their consideration. It was a measure which had not been casually taken up and introduced, and when it was asked why they gave precedence to it over others which had been introduced before it, he answered because it had been mentioned in the Queen's Speech, while other Bills had not, and therefore it formed part of their programme of legislation for this year. He hoped the Government had dealt fairly and frankly with the House in that matter. The explanation of the measure lay on the face of it, and the Government were not actuated in regard to it by any desire of grasping at power, still less was it their intention to cast any reflection on a class of gentlemen who had rendered valuable services to the country, and if any further vindication besides that already given had been wanting for that measure, it would have been found in the arguments of those who opposed it.

SIR THOMAS CHAMBERS moved the Adjournment of the Debate.

MR. WHALLEY seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Sir Thomas Chambers.)

MR. DISRAELI said, he was sorry that the hon. and learned Common Serjeant had made that Motion, for he could not help thinking it was somewhat unreasonable. Considering that the second reading of the Bill had now been discussed for two nights, and, that night especially, with great variety and vigour on both sides, he thought the question had been fairly exhausted. Moreover, at that period of the Session they must feel as practical men that the Motion for further adjournment was not justified, and therefore he must give it his opposition.

MR. RYLANDS appealed to the Government to agree to the Motion, as many hon. Gentlemen on both sides were still anxious to speak, and it was only reasonable they should have the opportunity.

MR. NEWDEGATE supported the Motion for Adjournment. He contended that the discussion was by no means exhausted.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, if he could regard this Bill as the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary regarded it, mainly as a departmental measure, he should be entirely disposed to agree with the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government that it had been fully discussed. But he was of opinion that this Bill raised very important questions besides those departmental questions to which the Home Secretary had referred. Those points had, he thought, been very ably laid before the House by his right hon. Friends the Member for the City of London and the Member for Pontefract. He thought those points had scarcely received sufficient attention from the Government or from hon. Members who had addressed the House on this subject. He was therefore very much disposed to think that the discussion which the measure had received was inadequate, and that the House would do well to consider it further before giving it a second reading. He was disposed to think that it would be perfectly impossible at that period of the Session that the measure could receive the attention which it ought to receive, looking at the various important subjects which it opened up, and that the Government and the House would do well to come to the determination not to proceed with it that Session any further. For those reasons, though he should be sorry to enter into a conflict with the Government, yet if his hon. Friend should proceed to a division on his Motion for Adjournment he should be disposed to support him. When the Motion of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) was put from the Chair, he admitted that he should give his vote with some doubt and hesitation, for though he agreed thoroughly in a great many of the objections that had been taken on that (the Opposition) side of the House, he was disposed to admit that there was a good deal in the Bill which possessed considerable merit. He thought, however, the Bill dealt with a most important subject in a very fragmentary manner. He must repeat, that as he did not think the subject could receive that Session the attention which it ought to receive, the Motion for Adjournment was one that he could vote for without any doubt whatever. If that Motion were negatived, he should be obliged to vote, although with some doubt, for the Motion of the hon. Member for Burnley.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he would move the Adjournment of the House. His reason for doing so was that the Bill was to be followed by one of a similar character for Ireland, and experience had shown them that the discussion of the question would be taken altogether on the English Bill. As an Irish Member, and having had some experience as a magistrate in county business, he had insuperable objections to the Bill, and wished to have an opportunity of stating them.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Mitchell Henry.)

MR. DISRAELI said, after the significant majority against the Adjournment he hoped the hon. Member for Galway would not persevere with his Motion. He had certainly given a rather fanciful reason for proposing it. He (Mr. Disraeli) could not recall an instance of the kind where an Irish Bill was not fully discussed, because a similar measure relating to England had already been considered. The House having by an almost unprecedented majority expressed its opinion, he hoped they would be allowed to proceed to a decision on the second reading.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON also hoped that the hon. Member for Galway would not press his Motion for the Adjournment of the House. He (the Marquess of Hartington) had himself voted in the minority just now, not from a wish to oppose any factious opposition to the Government proposal, but merely to give effect to his view that such a measure as that should not be proceeded with at that period of the Session. He did not think that any large number of those who voted in the minority were opposed in principle to this Bill, which contained many excellent provisions. He, therefore, trusted that the hon. Member would withdraw the Motion. It would be for the Government to consider, after the Bill had been read a second time, whether the time remaining at their disposal would enable them to pass the measure in the present Session.

MR. RYLANDS joined in the appeal of the noble Lord to his hon. Friend the Member for Galway to withdraw his Motion for Adjournment.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he would accede to the request; but, at the same time, he must say that he had moved the Adjournment of the House at the instance and request of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) himself.

UNION OF BENEFICES BILL.

(The Lord Bishop of Exeter.)

(Nos. 64-147.) COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee, read.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER, in moving that the House do now go into Committee on the Bill, reminded their Lordships that it had been referred to a Select Committee, by whom it had been returned with important alterations which he thought would make it more acceptable—especially in respect of the increased representation of the parishioners on the commission. There was also a new clause in lieu of Clause 19 (Site of any Church to be sold to be first offered to Town Council), which applied the machinery of Provisional Orders by the Secretary of State, to be confirmed by Act of Parliament, to the sale of the site of any church pulled down. He hoped their Lordships would pass the Bill, as amended, through Committee.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK appealed to the most rev. Prelate whether, at that advanced period of the Session, he could hope to carry through both Houses of Parliament this year a Bill of considerable importance in a form very different from that which it bore on the second reading.

Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly.

Clauses 1 to 17, inclusive, agreed to,
with Amendments.

Clause 18 (Scheme may provide for erection of new Church or parsonage, removal of old Church, sale of site,

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in answer to a noble Lord who objected to the clause on the ground that it involved the desecration of consecrated places, said, he had some slight responsibility in that matter. He entirely agreed with

of those sites, on the ground that it was a blow to that reverence for the dead which still existed among us, and which it was desirable to preserve. In the Select Committee he had therefore made a Motion the effect of which would have been to prevent the sale of sites; but when they came to a division upon it the Committee was equally divided, and therefore by the technical rule the decision was against him. But in that division he found against him two noble Lords on his own side of the House who were both earnest and distinguished Churchmen. In the circumstances, knowing how the Committee was composed, it was evident to him that in some form or other the dominant feeling of their Lordships' House would be in favour of permitting, under whatever safeguards and restrictions, the sale of sites. As the law now stood, any one could introduce a Private Bill into Parliament to authorize the sale of the site of a church which had been pulled down. The Bill, as altered by the Select Committee, substituted the Provisional Order for the Private Bill; and as the clause provided that under the new system all such sales were subject to all the checks and safeguards formerly required—such as the consent of the Bishop and of the Home Secretary, he conceived that if such sales were to be permitted at all it would be impossible to surround them with greater precautions.

Clause 19 agreed to.

Clause 20 (Site of Church pulled down may be sold under Provisional Order of Secretary of State, confirmed by Act of Parliament), agreed to.

Clauses 21 to 31, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 32 (Union of Benefices elsewhere than within any city or municipal borough).

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY explained that the Bill would extend the union of benefices from boroughs to counties, or to benefices one of which was situated within the borough, the other in the county. The Bishop must consent to a scheme for a union of county benefices, and there would be a commission, as in the case of a borough. On that commission would sit two laymen selected by the vestries of the two benefices which were proposed to be united, and a third layman would be appointed by the chairman of the quarter sessions of the county. The majority on the commission would consist of laymen appointed by those who were interested in the matter. The evil which this Bill proposed to remedy was one very familiar to many of their Lordships. It was the case of a rich living outside a town, from which probably under the action of the old system of Poor Laws all cottages had been got rid of, and of a poor living inside the town with a large and poor population. The Bill proposed that in such a case the rich benefice should be combined with the contiguous benefice. He was of opinion that the guards proposed by the Bill against abuses were quite sufficient.

Clause agreed to.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Monday next.

METROPOLIS (WHITECHAPEL AND LIMEHOUSE) IMPROVEMENT SCHEME CONFIRMATION BILL—(No. 120.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee, read.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he did not interpose for the purpose of delay or of moving any Amendment in the Bill before them—he rejoiced to see it, and heartily approved the alterations introduced by the Secretary of State upon the scheme as propounded by the Metropolitan Board of Works. But as this was the first Bill of a long series which would come before the House for the improvement of the dwellings of the working classes, he desired to make an observation on the provisions of it. First, he desired to press upon the promoters of the Bill the necessity of making provision for those who were ejected from their dwellings while the improvement was in progress—without first ascertaining whether there was sufficient accommodation for them in the neighbourhood. This was a great evil. Since he first brought the subject to the attention of Parliament, 24 years ago, probably not less than 1,000,000 of persons had been turned out of their holdings in consequence of metropolitan improvements—he himself had witnessed the misery caused thereby. Now this might be avoided if they adopted the plan pursued in Glasgow. He was acquainted with that city before it was improved, and having recently visited it, he could say that it was improved in a manner and to an extent which he had witnessed in no other city. Well, that great municipality had made very extensive improvements, and in no case did they remove the people until they had ascertained that there was lodging room for them all within easy distances. Now, if they were to proceed on the principle of entirely new construction in every case (putting aside altogether the improvement and adaptation, when possible, of existing tenements—a system far better suited for convenience and economy to the poor) the erection of houses in blocks, ugly and inconvenient as they were, seemed to be unavoidable, so great was the value of the land in London. They were to rise to heights of even five stories. This, again, might be unavoidable; but then there should be on every storey everything that could be required; water should be laid on, and a dust-bin provided on every floor, for if these poor people had to go up and down these high flights of stairs for these accommodations, it amounted to real infliction and infinite toil. Now this by the Bill was provided for each block, but not for each storey. Health and cleanliness imperatively demanded an amendment to that effect. In the distribution and character of the holdings the Secretary of State had acted with much judgment and consideration for the poorer classes. His scheme stood thus:—Provision was made for 3,870 persons in 888 tenements, consisting of 121 single-room, 650 double-room, and 117 three-room tenements, each room being constructed for the accommodation of 2·5 persons. This was a mighty improvement on the plan of the Metropolitan Board, which was very objectionable. Some single rooms were unavoidable—indeed, they were necessary; but here a difficulty arose—if the numbers in each room were to be limited according to the proportions laid down in the scheme, the expense of living in them would be far beyond the means of the poorer classes, and if they were not limited, we should have a repetition of all the moral and physical evils of overcrowded apartments. Therefore, unless they had single rooms at moderate rents poor families must be crowded into unhealthy lodgings. There was a very large population in this metropolis who lived from hand to mouth, and who earned wages averaging not more than from 12s. to 14s. a-week, and of course it was impossible for them to pay 5s. or 6s. a-week for their tenements. It was not easy to see their way out of these embarrassments. Doubtless the best had been done. But he must revert to what was really practicable, and which would tend to moderate, to a great extent, the troubles and losses of displacement. Long and ample notice should be given to the inhabitants; by ample he meant something beyond the mere legal notice—every one should be made acquainted with it. The demolitions should be gradual; not more than 500 persons should be removed at one time, nor until it had been ascertained that adequate lodging was to be had in the neighbourhood. The modern systems of displacement in London had increased the evil that many wished to remove. The people had been driven into houses which already contained more than their due; and the suburbs had begun to be as crowded and filthy as the interior of London itself. With these precautions immense good might be done. The law would effect a revolution—a revolution as beneficial as ever was effected among 4,000,000 of people.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he was glad to have the advice of one who was so well acquainted with this subject, and who was so greatly interested in providing dwellings of an improved character for the poorer classes as the noble Earl. All the topics which the noble Earl had brought forward should be carefully considered, and as far as they were practicable his suggestions should be adopted. If this measure were properly carried out, it would prove a considerable boon to the working classes.

House in Committee accordingly; Bill reported, without Amendment, and to be read 3^d on Thursday next.

SLAVE TRADE BILL—(No. 135.)

(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in moving that the Bill be now read a third time, said, there seemed to have been a strange misconception last evening in the mind of the noble Earl who was recently Governor General of India (the Earl of Northbrook) in reference to this Bill. The noble Earl stated that the present Bill had not been referred to the Government in India, which was perfectly correct; but he also appeared to be under the impression that the substance of the measure had not been considered by the Indian Executive. The truth was that, substantially, the proposals contained in the Bill were suggested by the noble Earl himself, and the Papers which he proposed to lay on the Table of the House would show that this was the fact.

On Question? Resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read 3^a accordingly, and passed, and sent to the Commons.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF BELMORE, in asking the Lord President, If the type of the Return of Owners of land in Ireland is still standing; and, if so, whether any steps can be taken to amend the inaccuracies in the Return? said, the names of persons had been inserted as owners though they were merely trustees of property; and in other cases persons had been defined as owners in fee though they merely held leases for 99 years, or were renewable, or were rent-charges. He thought that the definition of owners would lead to many mistakes. There were errors in the case of his own property. If the book was intended to be of any real value the numerous inaccuracies should be corrected, and if the type were not broken up that might be done without any very great cost. He should be glad to hear that the type had not been broken up, and that the errors could be corrected.

LORD SELBORNE, referring to the Returns of owners of land in England, said, he could hardly conceive a document of less value. It was full of mistakes, instances of which the noble and learned Lord pointed out.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that in his own case he was put down as owning 600 acres of agricultural land in Staffordshire, and that he derived an income from it of £10,000 a-year, or £16 an acre rental, which was certainly the highest rental for such land that he had ever heard of.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY was understood to say that in his case the Return was altogether erroneous; but it was not surprising that there should be inaccuracies, for there was the greatest difficulty in getting the Returns, and very often they had to be got as they best could from vestry clerks and other parish officers not of the most educated class.

LORD BLACHFORD said, it was the same as regarded himself.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON regretted extremely that the Irish Return was inaccurate; but from what they had just heard it was not singular, as the same injustice had been perpetrated in regard to the Return for England as for Ireland. The type had not been broken up; but he understood that it would be inconvenient to correct the Blue Book as it now stood. It was now proposed, after some time had elapsed and all the errors had been brought to light, to print an addendum, showing the corrections which had been made.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK said, that there could be no doubt that there were very great inaccuracies in the Return for Ireland, and he referred particularly to the Return for his own neighbourhood.

VACCINATION ACT — BOARDS OF GUARDIANS.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES FORSTER asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the case of W. Sampson Benton, against whom proceedings have been authorised by the Guardians of the Walsall Union, after six previous prosecutions for non-compliance with the Vaccination Act; and, whether he considers such repeated prosecutions to be in accordance with the instructions contained in the letter addressed by the Board to the Guardians of the Evesham Union on the 17th of September last?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, his attention had not been officially called to the case referred to by the hon. Member; but his attention had been recently drawn to cases of a similar character where repeated prosecutions had been instituted by the Guardians for non-compliance with the Vaccination Act. On a former occasion, he had placed on the Table a Letter which he caused to be sent to the Guardians of the Evesham Union last year, and which laid down the policy of the Local Government Board on this subject. It was difficult for him to say, as he had not the exact facts before him, whether the conduct of the Guardians of the Walsall Union was in accordance with the directions of the Board; but under the Act of Parliament it was absolutely necessary that the final discretion in these matters should be left to the Guardians, and it would not be proper for a Government Department to issue authoritative directions as to what the procedure should be. It did seem to him to be unfortunate that repeated prosecutions occurred in so many cases, and the Local Government Board had suggested to the Guardians that after having procured two convictions under the Act, they should consider whether under the circumstances of the case they were likely by repeated prosecutions to ensure the vaccination of the child. If that was likely to be the result, no doubt further proceedings should be taken, but whether the Guardians were justified in the present case depended on the circumstances.

UNITED STATES—EXTRADITION—CASE OF CALDWELL.

QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will lay upon the Table the Correspondence which passed between the English Government and the Government of Canada on the subject of the extradition of Caldwell in the years 1870-71, who was indicted in the United States for an offence different from that in respect of which he was surrendered; and, when the recent Despatches and Correspondence with reference to the extradition of Winslow will be laid on the Table?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the Question having only appeared on the Paper that morning he had not had the opportunity of consulting the Secretary of State for the Colonies upon it; but no doubt any Correspondence which had taken place between our Government and the Government of Canada on the subject would be laid on the Table. He believed that the Papers relating to Winslow's case had either been laid on the Table, or would be in the course of that day or to-morrow.

TURKEY—THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE PAPERS.—QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he can name a time within which he believes he shall be able to lay upon the Table of the House the Papers he has promised to produce in reference to the Eastern Question?

to be made in the office staff of the Irish Education Board; if one of the secretaries is to be abolished; and, if so, which one; if the office of accountant is to be abolished; and, if so, how are its duties to be henceforth provided for; and, whether a communication from the Treasury in reference to these or other changes was addressed to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland on or about the 15th of April last; and, if so, whether there is any objection to laying a Copy of that communication on the Table of the House?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that owing to circumstances which indicated the existence of grave defects in the management of the details of financial administration under the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland, the Treasury had, in the Spring of this year, suggested certain alterations in the office Staff of the Commissioners. Those suggestions had been forwarded to the Board of Education for their consideration. As they were still under the consideration of the Board it was not desirable for any correspondence to be produced at present, or for any further statement to be made concerning them; but he might mention that they did not include the abolition of the office of one of the secretaries.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: I will take this opportunity of making the Financial Statement with respect to local income and indebtedness which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer promised that I would make on the second reading of the Bill. Before I do so I will state that the object of this Bill is to authorize the Treasury to place funds at the command of the Public Works Loans Commissioners to enable them to meet the demands made upon them by the local authorities during the current financial year. The Act of last Session was to provide that the local authorities should give notice before the 31st of December, 1875, of the sums they would probably require from January 1, 1876, to March 31, 1877; and a Parliamentary Paper has been circulated within the last few days stating that the total sum with respect to which notice was given amounted to a very large figure, more than double that which the present Bill seeks to place at the disposal of the Commissioners. Nevertheless, hon. Gentlemen will observe that the Estimate has been framed by the Treasury after six months' experience of the total period to which the applications related. The Treasury know how much was required or how little between January 1 and March 31 in the last financial year, and we have now passed through the first quarter of the current financial year, and have therefore the best reason for knowing that £4,000,000, which the Bill proposes to place at the disposal of the Commissioners, will be amply sufficient to meet the requirements of the case. On this first occasion, when the local authorities were asked to send in their estimates, perfect accuracy could hardly be expected. What I propose now to do is to make a short statement, showing the indebtedness of the local authorities and their current expenditure. As regards local indebtedness, I do not propose going further back than the year 1872-3. Previous to that time certain local authorities were required to make various financial Returns, which were made partly to the Home Office and partly to the Poor Law Board, and there was no obligation whatever to return the amount of outstanding loans. When Sir George Lewis was at the Home Office in 1860 he brought in a Bill, in which provision was made for returns of the expenditure of local authorities, but not as to outstanding liabilities, and although, in point of fact, some information had been received under that head, there was no means or opportunity of classifying or analyzing the accounts properly. In 1872 various incidents occurred which render that year important as the commencement of a new system. The duty of collecting these Returns was transferred to the Local Government Board exclusively, and an identification of functions and duties took place between the Urban Sanitary Authorities and Municipal Town Councils which led to the clearing up of difficulties. In 1873 my hon. Friend who is now Secretary to the Local Government Board (Mr. Salt) procured a Return which shed a good deal of light on the indebtedness of the local authorities; and my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) also procured some valuable and comprehensive Returns. These, together with the information collected by the Department, furnished the foundation of the statement made in 1873, that the local indebtedness of the country at that time amounted to £72,000,000. About 12 months later the Return was made at £84,000,000; and according to the Returns obtained during the last few weeks the total amount of indebtedness at the present time might be set down at £92,191,281. But these figures require considerable correction before it can be assumed that the difference between them represents the addition to local indebtedness between the three years referred to. In 1873 the outstanding loans which were returned amounted to £72,000,000; but subsequent information has shown that large sums of money were not included, which we now know ought to have been included. For instance, from Liverpool there was owing £2,200,000, which was not included in the Returns, from Manchester, £2,300,000, from Blackburn, £300,000, and from Oldham, £500,000, and from other places sums making a total aggregate of £8,000,000 which had been omitted, so that the total aggregate for 1872-3 should have been £80,000,000, instead of £72,000,000. In 1873-4 the Return of outstanding loans was given as £84,000,000, and for reasons similar to those which I have just adverted to, there should be added to that figure the sum of £1,500,000, so that the correct total of last year would be £85,500,000. From that total we have the sum of £5,500,000 to be accounted for as the net increased amount of indebtedness for that year, within which about £3,000,000 of loan would have been paid off. The information and Returns we have from other sources show that there was received during that year, of borrowed money, £8,173,000. The chief item of which this amount is made up is a sum received by Town Councils and Urban Sanitary Authorities, £3,500,000; the Metropolitan Board of Works, £1,500,000; Harbour Authorities, £1,500,000 — making a total of £6,500,000. The difference probably consists of sums borrowed under existing powers, which had not been fully availed of. Up to the present time the amount of indebtedness may be taken at £92,500,000. Deducting from that the corrected Return of last year—namely, £85,500,000, we have an apparent difference of £7,000,000, but to that should be added £4,000,000, which may be estimated as the amount of loans paid off during 1874-5, and this would show a difference of £11,000,000 as compared with the indebtedness of last year. The amount raised on loan in 1874-5 was about £11,500,000, which was for the most part thus distributed—Town Councils and Urban Sanitary Authorities, £5,000,000; School Boards, £1,500,000; Metropolitan Board of Works, £2,500,000; and Harbours, £1,500,000—making a total of £10,500,000. Thus the increase on the net indebtedness, after deducting the repayments, between 1872-3 and 1873-4 was £5,500,000, and the similar sum between 1873-4 and 1874-5 was £7,000,000. Of this sum, the Metropolitan Board of Works, Harbour Authorities, and School Boards raised £5,500,000. If we look at totals of loans under various heads, we find that Poor Law Authorities stand for £3,500,000, County Authorities for £3,144,000, Municipal Authorities for £5,900,000, Metropolis Local Management for £1,888,000, Metropolitan Board of Works for £11,174,000, Urban Sanitary Authorities for £33,274,000. The result is that this £92,000,000 is composed of £63,000,000 charged upon rates, and £28,000,000 charged upon tolls and dues. This sum, which I may put at £92,000,000, which is due from local authorities in England and Wales, strikes one as enormous, but it is worth while to analyze it to see of what it consists. About one-half of the whole is owing—by the Metropolitan Board of Works, £12,000,000; and the Urban Sanitary Authorities, £33,500,000; making together £45,500,000. This represents substantial value—works which either of themselves are valuable property or which add to the value of property—namely, sewers, street improvements, gas, and water. Some persons may say that this is not local taxation in the strict sense of the word, but is rather

Bill Committees of both Houses of Parliament. And there is no security that those who direct the action of Committees of both Houses will take the same views of the subject. Indeed, within the last two or three years there have been cases where the money proposed to be borrowed has been spread over such a long series of years as certainly would not be sanctioned by any Government Department. As a general rule, the re-payment of a loan should be coterminous with the estimated duration of the works for which the money is required; but I do not say that that should be a rule without an exception, for there are some works or objects which are almost permanent. My right hon. Friend has been good enough to refer to the statement that I should have to submit as one that would be of an interesting character; but I can hardly claim for it that epithet, though I have endeavoured to make it as clear as I could. I think that I may fairly say that this is a subject that requires and deserves the attention of the House, and ought from time to time to be brought under their notice. On the other hand, I see no reason for alarm or for anxiety in the extent to which borrowing powers have been exercised, though some localities may have gone beyond what they should have done; yet, looking at the question generally, we cannot but believe that a vast increase in comfort and happiness has been brought about by this great expenditure. As to the total of the figures, I do not think that we have any great reason to complain. I omitted to state that I have endeavoured to make a calculation as to the average amount of rates which are now levied over the whole country. My right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty some time ago made certain calculations as to rates, and he stated that in 1867 the average rate over the whole Kingdom was 3s. 3½d. We in our calculations make the average rate over England and Wales, including the Metropolis, 3s. 8½d.; that for the Metropolis, 4s. 1½d.; and for England and Wales, exclusive of the Metropolis, 3s. 7½d. My right hon. Friend estimated that for the whole of the rural districts in the Kingdom the average rate was 2s. 9½d. in the pound; and I believe that if we could now arrive at the exact estimate we should find that the average rate of the rural districts is from 2s. 6d. to 2s. 9d. in the pound; therefore, the pressure of the rates upon the rural districts has not increased, but is rather inclined to retrograde. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) is about to move an Amendment as to the relative incidence of the rates upon owners and occupiers. No man is better qualified to discuss such a matter than the hon. Gentleman; but I hope that the House will not be delayed from going into Committee until that knotty question has been settled. I have no doubt that the greater part of the current rates in the urban sanitary districts are in the nature of rent for increased value, and if these rates could be placed directly upon the landlord he would recoup himself by demanding an increased rent from the occupier. In the country the case is different, for there the rates fall ultimately as a charge upon the landlord. I am not aware that the occupiers of this Kingdom have desired to see a change in the mode in which the rates are levied; and there are many reasons why it would be inconvenient to the owners as well as to the occupiers to have the system altered, though the mode of levying is a totally different question from that of the actual incidence of taxation. I shall listen with interest to anything that may be said upon the subject; but I think that any discussion upon questions such as these may well stand over until after this Bill has passed.

MR. FAWCETT, in rising to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice, said, that nothing was further from his attention than to offer any unnecessary obstacle to the passing of the Bill; but, as the introduction of it had been chosen by the Government as a convenient occasion for making a most important and valuable statement, he thought it would not be considered inappropriate if he availed himself of the progress of the Bill to point out what he conceived to be the peculiar injustice associated with the present mode of borrowing money and the hardship it inflicted upon occupiers of houses and other rateable property as distinct from the owners. They had been told that the total indebtedness amounted to £92,000,000, and that the amount had increase £7,000,000 within the year. He should like to know what proportion of these loans was to be paid off at 20, 30, and 50 years; and beyond this they had not heard what was the rate of interest which was payable upon the loans. Yesterday the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that the Government were considering whether they could advance money to local authorities at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. It was evident that pressure was being put upon them to do this, and he was anxious to learn whether they were likely to yield to it. The evidence given before the Public Works Loan Commissioners last Session by Mr. Welby and others connected with the Treasury conclusively showed that lending money at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent was not in the long run a paying investment for the Government, and, therefore, the making of these advances was one way of relieving local burdens. The local taxation of this country, which a year since was only £24,000,000, was now £26,500,000, so that, while the Government was constantly giving public money in aid of local burdens, yet, in spite of these subventions from Imperial funds, the amount levied from the ratepayers was increasing at the rate of more than £2,000,000 a-year. In reference to the Resolution which he had placed upon the Paper, he might say that he did not intend to enter into any complicated economical discussion as to the incidence of rates, but would make his remarks as practical as possible. The President of the Local Government Board spoke of it as an advantage connected with our present system of borrowing that the principal and interest of loans were paid off now in a shorter term of years than before; but the shorter the term the greater was the injustice inflicted upon occupiers in respect of the repayment of heavy loans incurred for such purposes as the building of county lunatic asylums and the carrying out of main drainage works. If the money were borrowed for 21 years and involved a rate of 1s. in the pound, for example, a farmer whose rent was £1,000 a-year would pay £50 a-year in extra rates, a clergyman with a living worth £800 would pay £40 a-year, and the occupier of the mansion of the proprietor, rated not upon its cost but upon its letting value, and let, or capable of being let, at £250, would pay £12 10s. a-year, so that the owner of the estate, with an income perhaps of £10,000 a-year, if he were non-resident, would not contribute a farthing to the cost of a great improvement, which improved the health of the district and improved the value of the property. The farmer would contribute four times as much, and the clergyman three times as much, as the proprietor if he resided on the estate. This injustice deserved the special attention of those who professed to be the friends of the farmers and of the clergy. In inducing the farmers to clamour to save a halfpenny in the pound on the local rates—which went only into the landlords' pockets—was to cause them to run entirely on the wrong scent; but if the farmers and the clergy wished to remedy this great injustice in connection with local taxation, they would obtain for England what was already done for Scotland and Ireland, where all new local charges were borne equally by the landlord and the occupier. In the rural districts ratepayers were in a more unfortunate position than they were in towns which had local representation, for county rates were imposed by authorities who were not responsible to the ratepayers, and those authorities could borrow money for public works which would improve their own property, and the principal and interest might be repaid by leaseholders and tenants without the proprietors contributing a shilling. The right hon. Gentleman said it was right that the occupiers should contribute towards the cost of improvements, but it was not right that they should pay both capital and interest as they did at present. Even in the metropolis, if £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 were borrowed for 21 years for an embankment or main drainage works, an occupier who had taken a lease for 21 years just before the new rate was imposed would have to pay it during the continuance of his lease, and at its expiration he would have paid for an improvement of the property which would make it worth a higher rent, and which would be paid by some one else if he declined to pay it. Much had been said of compulsory tenant right; but this was what he called compulsory tenant wrong. This injustice would be remedied to a certain extent if new charges were borne partly by the owner, for re-valuation and increase of rent could occur only at the expiration of leases. It was contended by the claimants for Imperial subventions that what was saved in rates was saved to the tenants at will, and if that were true the converse or reverse must be true, that new charges came out of their pockets. The injustice could be remedied, and the 38th clause of the Bill recognized the principle for which he was contending, for it said that if any new charge were imposed by carrying it out one-half might be deducted by any occupier from the rent he had to pay. The unpopularity of the school rate in England, which was swollen by the repayment of money borrowed for the building of schools, was partly owing to the fact that the rate fell exclusively upon occupiers, but the school rate occasioned less unpopularity in Scotland, where it was often heavier than in England, because in Scotland one-half was paid by owners, who also paid one-half of the poor rate and all the county rate. In Ireland there was a similar recognition of the principle for which he contended. There half the poor rate, which included the sanitary rate, was paid by the owners and occupiers, and the same with regard to the rate for the payment of the national school teachers in Ireland. If the reform which he advocated was carried out it would be a recognition of an important principle based on justice, and when this question was understood a great demand would be made which the Government would not be able to resist, both from the country and the town occupier that this justice should be conceded to them. For every reduction of local rates obtained at the expense of the Imperial Exchequer the public had to pay the price of seeing centralization interfering more and more in local affairs. In future new charges must be borne partly by the owner and partly by the occupiers, which would carry with it no disadvantage, but transfer the charge from one individual to another. The owners of property had the power to effect this, and, in doing so, they did nothing more than carry out the principle of self-sacrifice on behalf of those they represented, and who claimed to be peculiarly their friends. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Amendment.

MR. RATHBONE, in seconding the Amendment, said: I can assure the right hon. Member opposite, in common with the hon. Member for Hackney, that I should be sorry to delay the carrying of this Bill further than is necessary to discuss the various points which have been clearly laid before the House. I wish, however, that the President of the Local Government Board had not drawn quite such a coulour de rose picture of the state of our local government and the prospects of our local funds. But before going into the questions raised by his speech I wish to say that I support the view that the rates should be divided between owners and occupiers, because I believe that none are so deeply interested in the management of our local affairs as the landowners of this country. I think it desirable also to remove everything that should create any sore feeling between landlord and tenant. There is a feeling of soreness in the mind of the tenant, in periods of distress, which would not exist if his burdens were shared not merely as a matter of charity, but as a right. I am very glad that the hon. Member for Hackney has called the attention of the House to this subject, for I believe that the hardship and injustice which the present system inflicts upon the occupiers at times of distress are very serious; but, serious as this is, it is as nothing in comparison with its injurious effect in impairing the efficiency and economy of local administration. I was speaking only the other day to the Chairman of the Board of Guardians of a large Union in the South of England—a very wealthy landowner, a clergyman, and a Conservative. He has taken a most active part for many years in the management of his Union, and he spoke as strongly as the most Radical reformer could do of the pressing necessity of the reform of our local government. He said that he found it impossible to persuade a single landowner to join him in his efforts; they did not seem to feel that the rise or fall of the rates concerned them, because those rates did not directly fall upon them. In these, as in other matters, once put things upon an unfair and unjust footing, and you never know how far the inconvenience and evils resulting therefrom will extend; and the unfairness of the incidence of our local taxation is not confined to the want of fair apportionment to occupiers and owners. There is equal unfairness in the incidence of our present system of taxation as between occupier and occupier. This unfairness meets us at every turn, whether we try to obtain suitable areas for local government, efficient local authorities, or in any way to deduce something like order out of the present admitted confusion of our local organization. This is the most serious evil of all, for, important as is the relative incidence of local taxation, it is even more important that the proceeds of that taxation should not be wasted, but should be so spent as to give value received for its expenditure, and that our local taxation should not be in excess of what is necessary. The confusion and weakness of our local administration, the inefficient and excessive expenditure, the rapidly and dangerously increasing liabilities of our local authorities, are intolerable. There is an increase of over £10,500,000 in the indebtedness of our local authorities last year; and if something is not done for improving the conditions of local government, the burden will become so intolerable that the country will demand more stringent and radical treatment, and require that it should be confided to other hands. I hope, however, that this Government will show that it conceives that the truly Conservative mode of dealing with this question is to do so in time, before a drastic cure has been demanded by popular clamour. Not only the last and present Prime Ministers, but almost every statesman of eminence, has asserted in the strongest manner the importance of strengthening, simplifying, and giving renewed vitality to our system of local government; yet no Government has taken even the preliminary steps necessary to make an orderly and well-considered reform possible. Both sides have, to use the common cant phrase, which is only too expressive, introduced measures touching what they call the fringe of the question; but it is evident to any one who has interested himself in the subject that no Government has yet framed anything like a comprehensive plan, or, I repeat, taken even the preliminary measures necessary to enable it to frame even a comprehensive plan, of which the measures it proposed were calculated to be a consistent part. I venture to think that if the late Government, had they when they came into office told off one of their ablest Ministers, giving him the best professional assistance and the aid of a Royal Commission, to obtain trustworthy information, and to enable him to mature his plans, they would have been able, when they had passed their Irish Church and Land Bills and their Elementary Education Bill, to undertake with effect the reform of the local government of this country; and I am not alone in thinking that had they taken this course they would have been in power at this moment, with the general assent of the country. It appears to me that the present Government are committing exactly the same blunder committed by their Predecessors. Perhaps I may say one word as to the great assistance which might be rendered to the Government by a Royal Commission consisting of four or five Members of each House of Parliament, and three or four able men, not Members of either House, but bringing official and legal experience and knowledge to the task. Such a Commission would materially aid the Minister in maturing his plans; especially would it help in the practical details necessary to combine the greatest efficiency with the least disturbance; and, moreover, the Members of such a Commission would in the course of their inquiry become so thoroughly acquainted with the different bearings of the subject that they would afford most efficient aid to the Minister in carrying his measure through the House. No reform since the new Poor Law is more important to the character and future welfare of the country; but, like that beneficent enactment, it must be no Party measure, but carried by the concurrence of the statesmen of both sides. Such a Commission as is suggested, by combining leading Members of both sides, would facilitate this desired co-operation. The hap-hazard legislation of the last 40 years has been wrong and pernicious in two ways. Whenever anything was required in the direction of social or sanitary reform, a fresh rate was imposed, without regard to the justice or injustice of its incidence, and a new Board was created; and, if the injustice was too strong to be borne, the sop of a loan was thrown in to mitigate the feeling of injustice therefrom resulting, creating, as injustice always does, complications and difficulties, often producing evils far more serious than mere pecuniary inequality. The multiplication of local authorities and elections diminished public interest and vigilance, and weakened the dignity and attraction of local authorities. Just when more good men were rendered necessary, fewer good men were willing and available for the duties of local administration. Every year while reform is delayed, the number of local authorities and their official expenses and liabilities are rapidly increasing, and create a rapidly increasing expenditure and difficulty in the way of reform. I appeal to those who are best acquainted with this subject; I appeal to the Ministers themselves who have had charge of matters of this kind, whether there is not wanting that exact and comprehensive knowledge of the facts of local organization, as it now exists, which is an essential preliminary, not merely for devising a remedy, but for knowing what the disease itself is. We are in the dark about the incidence of taxation itself. We do not know, and the Government cannot tell us, into whose pockets the relief will go which is promised even by the Bills of this Session. The right hon. Gentleman has made a most interesting, and, on the whole, valuable statement on the subject; but it is not possible for him to tell us, for instance, how much of the subvention of half the cost of the police will go to the town ratepayers, and how much to the farmer. The Returns relating to local taxation and expenditure now published do not furnish the necessary materials, either for comparing the ordinary expenses of local administration in urban and rural districts, or for determining either in urban or in rural districts the relation between the expenditure for particular purposes, and the incidence of the burden of that expenditure, or for ascertaining the ordinary urban expenditures for the different heads of the so-called sanitary purposes. For example, there appear to be no means of discovering how much of the £6,000,000 spent on the relief of the poor outside the metropolis is borne by urban and how much by rural ratepayers, unless in the few cases where the boundaries of a town are conterminous with those of a union; how much of the millions spent on county police represents the police employed in urban districts other than boroughs; how much of the £6,000,000 of urban expenditure for "sanitary purposes" belongs to new works, and how much to ordinary expenditure; or how much of ordinary expenditure for "other purposes" belongs to the several heads of lighting, water, and sewerage. And since the totals do not distinguish between places where gas and water are supplied by private companies, and places where gasworks and waterworks are provided by the local authority, they would, in any case, fail to give any real account of the cost of these important items. Further, there are £3,000,000 of receipts, and £2,500,000 of expenditure, with respect to which no indication whatever is given of the sources of the receipts, or of the objects of the expenditure. It is, therefore, impossible either to discover the present incidence of taxation, or to calculate with any precision how far it would be disturbed or altered by the operation of any new scheme which may be proposed. Nor is it probable that any Return which could be obtained, under the present condition of areas and authorities, would furnish the desired information. The right hon. Gentleman has told us the grand total of local indebtedness. The rapid growth of that total may startle and alarm this House; but it will probably not give a moment's uneasiness to a single ratepayer. Why? Because, in the existing condition of things, the ratepayer does not, and cannot, know how much of the burden affects his own town or parish. If the ratepayer's district were the same for all purposes, and were governed by one body, he would know the total debt of his district. He would jealously watch its growth. He would know the reason why for every increase; but, as things are now, the truth is concealed from him. For some purposes he is governed by the County Justices, who have a debt for asylums and prisons; for other purposes he is governed by Guardians, who have a debt for workhouses, and perhaps for drains; for other purposes he is governed by a school board, who have a debt for schools. So with highways, and perhaps with cemeteries, and so on. The ratepayer could not find out the grand total of the indebtedness of his district, if he tried. In fact, he does not live in one district, but in many districts. He could not bring pressure to bear upon his various governing bodies, if he tried. How can he influence all at once the Justices, the Guardians, the School Board, the Highway Board, the Burial Board? This evil of growing indebtedness can only be dealt with locally; but it will not, and it cannot, be dealt with locally until its existence and its tendencies have been brought home to the ratepayer, and they cannot be brought home to the ratepayer until you make simpler areas and simpler governing bodies. More than this, the debt will never be brought under control until owners as well as occupiers are made to feel the burden while it is being created, and are both empowered and induced by interest to take an active part in economical administration. And really such reforms as the measure before the House, and the Act which it proposes to amend, and even the relief offered by the Government to local taxpayers, are, in the absence of reform of the administration, of very doubtful benefit. Your facilities for borrowing and your contributions to local taxpayers are very apt to be swallowed up by the expenditure of local authorities too numerous to be vigilantly watched or efficiently organized. The very creation of these loans on unsatisfactory areas is a most serious obstacle to their rectification. Just let me give a few instances of the anomalous, unjust way in which our local taxation is at present levied. Take the case of highways, and the House must not consider that I am wandering from the question even of loans, for I know a case in which the excessive charge for highways on a district has led to borrowing money for work that really ought to have been paid out of current taxation. Take a district lying between one district containing coal mines and a manufacturing town. A road runs through it, which passes through this district which is not relieved by the rates levied on the mines or the town. The tax upon that intermediate district is enormous, and the benefits which it derives are very small indeed. In some instances as much as 5s. in the pound will be levied for the support of that road, of which the inhabitants make very little use, and from which they derive only an indirect benefit. I am aware that the Government have made a very creditable attempt to remedy that grievance in the Highway Bill; but if that Bill ever comes on it will be perfectly easy to show that, for want of well-arranged areas and County Boards, it is a very imperfect measure, and could only half meet the injustice which it seeks to remedy. Take another case
